

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. PHILADELPHIA ABOLITIONISTS.

NO NATION on earth has quite the capacity for forgetting injuries that characterizes the American people. Where the brooding, sullen Saxon temperament is strongest, the clear sky, the swift winds and wide horizons of the new home, and the busy life as well, have altered hereditary characteristics and the capacity for resentment has lessened. Even when most deeply stirred the brutal element has, save in the lowest class, almost totally disappeared. Persistence to the point of doggedness until the end is gained, and then a good-humored shaking of hands and a taking for granted that all differences are buried and the future to hold a common purpose and a common progress to the same end, characterizes the American of to-day. And in the fear that his adversary's feelings may be wounded he refuses to preserve records of strife, and almost forgets himself how the quarrel went on or why it began at all.

The capacity for apology increases year by year. In the reaction against the intolerance and bigotry of our fathers, we forget the sturdy virtues such traits covered or represented. Some one has summed up the American character as a "mush of concession," and our treatment of offenders—whether the criminal pardoned out while the sound of the sentence to just punishment is still in his ears, or the condoning of all offenses against social law and life—would seem to confirm the verdict. That an emergency finds always determined and resolute men and women ready for it, does not hinder the fact that the arising of such emergency could often have been prevented, had common sense or any wise forecast been used in the beginning. The eagerness to avoid offense and the determination to have every one as comfortable as possible stand always in the way of any review of past differences or future possibilities of difference. Reminiscence is frowned upon, and thus one of the most effectual means of developing manhood and genuine patriotism is lost. The boy's blood may tingle as he hears

"How well Horatius kept the bridge,
In the brave days of old;"

but the brave day that is but yesterday is a sealed book, its story, if told at all, given in a whisper subdued enough to prevent any possibility of discomfort for sensitive or squeamish listener.

"What was it all for, anyway?" asked a boy of twelve not long ago, who, in his school history of the United States had come to the civil war, and who, like a large proportion of the boys of this generation, found it of more remote interest even than the war of the Revolution. His father had been one of its volunteers, and the family record held name after name of friends fallen in the conflict we are all forgetting, yet the child, true to our American theories, was growing up with no sense of what the issue meant, and with an impatient disregard of worn-out details.

We "love mercy" so well that we forget that the first clause of the old command is to "do justly," and so year by year the capacity for justice lessens. Keen moral sense is blunted, and life becomes more and more a system of shadings, and black and white, simply clouded, uncertain and dirty gray.

Such word seems necessary in beginning any mention of a party to whose unconquerable and marvelous persistence is due every result of good in the conflict which ended forever all need of their further work. That the early Abolitionists were often bitter, fierce, intolerant, was the inevitable consequence of an intense purpose, and the narrowness that, save in the rarest exceptions, is the necessary accompaniment of intensity. It is never the broad and quiet lake, knowing no obstruction, that rushes on to the sea. It is the stream shut in by rocks and fed from hidden sources that swells and deepens till no man's hand can bind or stay the sweeping current.

It is possible that the time has not yet come for dispassionate statement, but it is also a question if dispassionateness be the only quality it is worth while for Americans to cultivate. Too often it ends as indifference, and when that stage is reached progress becomes impossible. In spite of our modern tendencies, it is still worth while to feel strongly, to believe intensely, to live as if life had meaning, and there is no stronger incitement than the knowledge of earnest lives lived through difficulties of which we have but faintest conception, and ending often without any consciousness that their purposes had been recognized or their dreams become realities.

Quiet but always untiring and undaunted workers, these steady, clear-eyed men and women passed over to the majority, and, like the workers of an earlier day, they "received not the promise, God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." Comprehension of their principles, loving remembrance of every faithful act is the only method in which through us they may have full sense of what their labor meant, and thus find the heart of the old words, which, if they mean anything, mean surely that till we do understand, their happiness lacks its full completion.

Philadelphia and Boston represent the most earnest work of a period, the fire and fervor of which are now almost incomprehensible. With Philadelphia, the first step taken was by William Penn, who, in his second visit, labored anxiously to undo certain results of his action which he had not foreseen. In 1685, sending over various directions to his deputies concerning servants to be employed, he had written: "It were better they were blacks, for then a man has them while they live." At this time negroes had been brought in in some numbers, and the most conscientious Friends held slaves, though as early as 1671 George Fox had advised the Friends in Barbadoes to "train up their slaves in the fear of God, to cause their overseers to deal mildly and gently with them, and, after certain years of servitude, they should make them free."

The necessity for such measures had become evident to Penn; and the German Friends who settled Germantown, and who, in 1688, brought before the Yearly Meeting the question "concerning the lawfulness and unlawfulness of buying and keeping negroes," pressed it still further upon his attention. By 1696 so many evils had resulted that advice was issued at the Yearly Meeting "that Friends be careful not to encourage the bringing in any more negroes; and that such that have negroes be careful of them, bring them to meetings, have meetings with them in their families, and restrain them from loose and lewd living as much as in them lies, and from rambling abroad on First-day or other times."

From this date began a very gradual emancipation, but eighty years passed before the entire prohibition of slaveholding was made part of the discipline of the society. In 1700 Penn brought before the Provincial Council a law for regulating the marriage of negroes, but it failed to pass, and the record tells how "he mourned over the state of the slaves, but his attempts to improve their condition by legal enactments were defeated in the house of Assembly."

In his own religious society he was more successful, the minute of the Monthly Meeting in the same year having this item: "Our dear friend and governor having laid before the meeting a concern that hath laid upon his mind for some time concerning the negroes and Indians; that Friends ought to be very careful in discharging a good conscience toward them in all respects, but more especially for the good of their souls, and that they might, as frequent as may be, come to meeting on First-days; upon consideration whereof this meeting concludes to appoint a meeting for the negroes, to be kept once a month, and that their masters give notice thereof in their own families and be present with them at the said meetings as frequent as may be."

Though charged with having died a slaveholder, it was certainly not because no proper means were taken for liberating his slaves, for in his will, made in 1701, Penn liberated every slave in his possession, the will being now in the hands of Thomas Gilpin, of Philadelphia, and containing this clause: "I give to my blacks their freedom as is under my hand already, and to old Sam one hundred acres, to be his children's, after he and his wife are dead, forever."

His intentions were not perfectly carried out, as is evident from one of James Logan's letters to Hannah Penn, written in 1721, and now to be seen in the Historical Society's rooms, in which he says: "The proprietor, in a will left with me at his departure hence, gave all his negroes their freedom, but this is entirely private; however, there are very few left." Any failure in action on his executors' part need not, however, be charged upon Penn himself, who must, without question, rank as the first Philadelphia Abolitionist.

Only an occasional remonstrance was heard at rare intervals for many years. The love of money and of power was too strong among the wealthy merchants of the city or the large planters in the outlying country, and nothing could be obtained from the Yearly Meeting but a mild suggestion that further importation of slaves was undesirable, while many a serious, drab-coated member argued with glibness in the same line of defense of oppression and avarice followed by Presbyterian and Episcopalian doctors of divinity, and, indeed, by the churches in general. Nothing could well be darker than the outlook, yet in that darkness a force was working unknown and unseen, the first visible spark showing itself at a point so remote and inconspicuous that it held no suggestion of the steady light soon to shine out with a glow and intensity that even to-day is as powerful as a hundred years ago.

Few souls since the Christian era began have held more of the spirit of the Master than that of John Woolman, living and dying in poverty and obscurity, yet leaving in his journal a record of self-denying labor so simple and tender, not only in spirit but in language also, that one need not wonder at Charles Lamb's enthusiasm as he wrote: "Get the writings of John Woolman by heart." Born in 1720, his first action against the principles of slavery was not taken till 1742, when, in drawing up an instrument for the transfer of a slave, he felt a sudden and strong scruple against such desecration of anything owning a soul. From this dated a life-long testimony against slavery, and for many years he traveled from point to point, never vehement or denunciatory, but pleading always, with a gentleness that proved irresistible, the cause of the oppressed.

In the meantime a quaint and curious figure had entered the same way, but with small thought of persuasion or consideration. Coming to Philadelphia from the West Indies where he had become deeply interested in the condition of the slaves, Benjamin Lay, furious at finding the same evil existing there, shook off the dust of the faithless city and took up his dwelling a few miles out. Here he lived in a natural cave, slightly improved by a ceiling of beams, drinking only water from a spring near his door and eating only vegetables. He refused to wear any garment or eat any food whose manufacture or preparation involved the loss of animal life or was the result of slave labor. On the last point John Woolman was in full accord with him, but found it a struggle to wear the undyed homespun which he finally assumed, as the necessary badge of the simplicity he preached.

No concern for the prejudices or feelings of others hampered the career of the irrepressible Benjamin, whose figure was no less eccentric than his life. "Only four and a half feet high, hunchbacked, with projecting chest, legs small and uneven, arms longer than his legs, a huge head, showing only beneath the enormous white hat, large, solemn eyes and a prominent nose; the rest of his face covered with a snowy semi-circle of beard falling low on his breast," this fierce and prophetic brownie or kobold made unexpected dashes into the calm precincts of the Friends' meeting-houses, and was the gad-fly of every assembly. A fury of protest possessed him—a power of energetic denunciation absolutely appalling to the steady-minded Quakers. At one time when the Yearly Meeting was in progress, he suddenly appeared marching up the aisle in his long, white overcoat, regardless of the solemn silence prevailing.

He stopped suddenly when midway and exclaiming, "You slaveholders! Why don't you throw off your Quaker coats as I do mine, and show yourselves as you are?" at the same moment threw off his coat. Underneath was a military coat and a sword dangling against his heels. "Holding in one hand a large book, he drew his sword with the other. 'In the sight of God,' he cried, 'you are as guilty as if you stabbed your slaves to the heart, as I do this book!' suiting the action to the word, and piercing a small bladder filled with the juice of the poke-weed (phytolacca decandra), which he had concealed between the covers, and sprinkling as with fresh blood those who sat near him."

John Woolman's testimony was of quite another character, but Benjamin Lay was the counterpart as well as forerunner of many less rational agitators who in later years could never separate the offender from the sin often ignorantly and innocently committed. Offensive as his course was felt to be, it was one of the active forces which no doubt had aided in paving the way to the decisive action of 1758, a date important not only in the history of the anti-slavery cause but as one of the most important religious convocations the Christian church has ever known. Through the general business John Woolman sat silent, and silent, too, as one and another faithful Friend gave in their testimony against any further toleration of slavery as a system. Then he rose and made an appeal, whose solemn tenderness still thrills every reader, and which, when eye and voice and all the influence of the gentle yet intensely earnest presence were added, rendered more than momentary opposition impossible. Then and there the meeting agreed that the injunction of our Lord and Saviour to do to others as we would that others should do to us, should induce Friends who held slaves "to set them at liberty, making a Christian provision for them," and four Friends—John Woolman, John Scarborough, Daniel Stanton and John Sykes—were approved of as suitable persons to visit and treat with such as kept slaves, within the limits of the meeting.

Naturally, outside these limits there was steady opposition. The record gives many years of effort in which only a proportion could be brought to admit the injustice or wrong of slavery, but it was a proportion that increased yearly. Through all weariness and discouragement John Woolman went his patient way, journeying on foot wherever in the widely-separated settlements the voice of the oppressed seemed to call, and leaving always behind him a memory of pitying love and devotion, before which all defenses fell. But the practice, though abating, required more active measures, and in 1776 came the final action of the Yearly Meeting, all subordinate meetings being then directed to deny the right of membership to such as persisted in holding their fellow-men as property. Four years before this consummation for which he had spent his life, John Woolman had passed on to the unhampered life and work of a country where bond and free are equal. Deep hopelessness came for a time on those who had worked with him, and who, as he passed from sight, murmured again the sad old words, "we thought this had been he who should have redeemed Israel."

But the thread in this apostolical succession was not lost. If transmigration were an admissible theory, one might say that the soul of John Woolman sought some fitting medium to continue its work, and found lodgment in the baby that in December, 1771, opened its eyes on a world through which it journeyed with all the energy and purpose that had led the elder man—with all his sweetness too, but with a courageous cheer the frailer body had never known. For Isaac Hopper came of sturdy stock, and, though Quaker on one side of the house, did not become a member of the Society of Friends till he was twenty-two, and then through the preaching of William Savery and Mary Ridgeway, two Friends who were often heard in the Philadelphia meetings. Through William Savery's agency Elizabeth Fry turned to the work which he had prophesied would be hers, and which in later life became Isaac Hopper's also. Already the Pennsylvania Abolition Society had been formed, and in his early boyhood Isaac Hopper had had his first experience in aiding a fugitive slave to elude pursuit, and find quarters where none could molest or make him afraid. Married in 1795 and settling permanently in Philadelphia, he became at once a leading member of the Pennsylvania Abolition Society, as well as one of the overseers of a school for colored children, a memorial of Anthony Benezet, a French Huguenot by birth, whose house remained standing on Chestnut street until 1840. Anthony is described as "a small, eager-faced man, full of zeal and activity, constantly engaged in works of benevolence, which were by no means confined to the blacks, and who was an untiring friend to the unhappy Acadians, many of whom were landed in Philadelphia by the ships which brought them from Nova Scotia."

In this school, and in one founded later for colored adults, he taught two or three evenings each week for many years, and had become known throughout Philadelphia as the friend and legal adviser of colored people under every emergency. From 1795 to 1829, when he removed to New York, each year held its record of courage and zeal in a work more and more necessary as time went on. Runaways were constantly passing through the city, and the laws of that date were neither understood nor attended to. Whenever a negro arrested as a fugitive slave was discharged for want of proof, no fee was paid, but if the verdict made him a slave, and he was surrendered to his claimant, from five to twenty dollars were given to the magistrate. Naturally they made the most of any facts in favor of slavery, and thus there was never wanting opportunity for the efforts of men like Hopper, who took delight in suddenly confounding and upsetting the best-laid plans. A volume would be necessary for the stories which Father Hopper in later years told to all who questioned, and many of which were printed in the Anti-Slavery Standard and other organs of the society, a mine for all who would know the spirit and purpose of one of the most intense and persistent struggles ever made on American soil. Appeal was seldom resorted to, for Father Hopper's wit was as keen as his heart was big, and his personal presence so strong and impressive that even his enemies looked with an admiration they could not repress on the noble face and figure of this smiling marplot of all their schemes. With a sense of humor that seemed always to conflict slightly with his Quaker garb and principles, he had also the power of an indignation that could scorch and shrivel; and like all men who have the courage of their convictions, made enemies, who in some cases, after a fury of opposition, turned about and became the strongest of friends.

The yearly meetings of the Anti-Slavery Society brought together a list of names each one representing individualities so marked and positive that only the fervor of a common purpose could have made working together practicable. In that early group women were as prominent as at a later day, and among them all none was more completely oblivious of self than Abigail Goodwin, who lived to see the last chain broken, after seventy-four years of unwearying effort. Her own clothes were patched and forlorn far beyond those of the average beggar, but worn with a calm unconsciousness of their extraordinary character: and, indeed, few who looked on the earnest face, with its half-sad, half-humorous intensity, stopped to consider what garb was worn. She worked for the slave as a mother works for her own children, begging garments which she mended or made over indefatigably; knitting bag after bag of stockings, and sitting up half the night to earn some petty sum turned over instantly to the society. She wrote for every anti-slavery journal, begged in every direction for money, implored friends to take stock in the Underground Railroad, and to the last day of her life burned with an actual passion of good-will; and, it must be added, an equal inability to conceive that a slaveholder might also have some conception of justice and humanity.

Her belief was shared by another woman, equally notable and among the earliest organizers in such work—Esther Moore, the wife of Dr. Robert Moore. The passage of the Fugitive Slave bill necessarily intensified all feeling and made dispassionate thought impossible, and though nearly eighty when this crowning iniquity became a portion of United States law, she worked against the results with the eagerness of her youth. For many years she had begged that special notification should be sent her of every fugitive who passed through

Philadelphia, and during the whole time made it her business to supply to each one a gold dollar, the Society being barely able to defray their expenses on to the next station, with no provision for wants when the final one was reached. With larger personal means than Abigail Goodwin, she denied herself in all possible ways that the little coin might be always ready for the empty hand, and almost her last injunction was: "Write to Oliver Johnson, and tell him I die firm in the faith. Mind the slave!"

"Mind the slave!" was the watchword for all. Depression seems to have been unknown. In fact, there was no time for depression, for between the opposition, which is always a stimulant, and the actual work of providing food, clothing and means for the throng of fugitives, there was unfailing and unceasing occupation for all. High-hearted courage and self-sacrifice inspired all alike, and the mere coming together of men and women animated by a profound conviction was in itself almost a Pentecost.

In removing from Philadelphia Isaac Hopper's interest was in degree transferred to the New York society, and the work he had done passed into the hands of Thomas Shipley, for many years President of the Pennsylvania Abolition Society, of which he became an active member in 1817. Opposition made no impression upon him, and he devoted every energy of his powerful and judicial mind to defense not only of the principles he held, but of every one who needed their application, the thousands who followed him to his grave, in 1836, being the best witnesses of what his life had done for both black and white. Almost the same words might be said of Thomas Garrett, who, though living in Wilmington, was a familiar figure in every public meeting at Philadelphia, and who, while as unobtrusive as Daniel Gibbons, another of the earlier worthies, fought to the end with unceasing vigor, not only for the slave, but for every cause affecting the public good. To give the complete roll of these names, each one deserving full biography, is impossible in present limits, but there is ample material and opportunity for a series of lives, which, if properly given, should hold no less power and fascination than those of Plutarch.

As one by one the names on the society roll received the significant asterisk, new ones, to become no less honored and honorable, took their places. Popular feeling, which, contrary to received belief, is by no means always the voice of God, became more and more embittered against the movement. Riots had taken place not only in Boston and New York, but in the more law-abiding Philadelphia. Abolitionists were regarded as disturbers of the public peace, interferers with private business and profit, and murmurs of indignation turned at last to veritable howls. The passage of the Fugitive Slave bill did more to intensify conviction on both sides and to precipitate the issue of ten years later than any act of the fifty years of steadily increasing oppression by which it had been preceded. Fanaticism had lessened and the society held names representing the broadest and deepest culture of the time, that of Dr. Furness holding a power hardly less than that of Dr. Channing. A man consecrated to the scholar's life, both by inheritance and personal tastes, he turned from "the still air of delightful studies" to a conflict, endurable only because its failure or success meant the failure or success of every moral question. The men who banded together in that pregnant ten years, Furness, Charles Cleveland, Miller McKim, Tappan, the Burleighs, Birney, Peirce, and the "honorable women not a few," Lucretia Mott, Mary Grew, the Lewis sisters, did a work in which lay the seed of every reform we complacently regard as the effect of our republican institutions. There were years in which these much-vaunted institutions covered as absolute a despotism as that of Russia, church and state uniting to preserve established order, and threatening with the terrors of the law any rash soul who questioned their justice. Such fate overtook Passmore Williamson, who accepted imprisonment as the price of free speech; and who, though pelted with abuse as abductor, rioter and disturber of the public peace, left his prison with the knowledge that the months, so far from being lost time, had worked for him beyond any power he alone could have ever had.

Day by day stories more thrilling than any page has ever held were poured into the ears of the society. The Underground Railroad worked day and night transferring fugitives, and covered its operations so perfectly that until the time came when the need for concealment ended no one outside the organization knew its officers or its methods. The full story has been told by William

Still in a book which ought to be far better known than it is, holding, as it does, the record of the Philadelphia branch of the road, and giving the results of all the years of organization. The incredible perils and hardships of the innumerable fugitives are only exceeded by the self-denying lives of the men and women who, for the sake of a principle, sacrificed ease and wealth and all personal ambition, and gave themselves and all they had to the work of redemption. No name in the long list shines with purer light than that of Lucretia Mott, who united absolute fidelity to every private responsibility with a devotion to the highest public duties that has had hardly a parallel. Protestation was her birthright, for on the mother's side she was descended from old Peter Folger, also the ancestor of Franklin, who sent out from Nantucket, in 1676, a vigorous testimony to the need of religious toleration for all. His "A Looking-Glass for the Times" is "one long jet of manly, ungrammatical, valiant doggerel," and at the end, determined to evade no responsibility, he "wove his name and his place of abode into the tissue of his verse," that all might know who he was and where he could be found if need arose.

This blood, tempered by that of the Coffins and Macys, and subdued by generations of Quaker discipline, never lost a certain effervescing quality, and to the day of her death Lucretia Mott's lambent eyes were witness to the nature of the spirit that dwelt within. The "consecration and the dream" were never divided. An almost perfect marriage—a life that dwelt in her home and children, yet opened wide to every noble thought and aim, assured her personal happiness and made inevitable trials light. She could denounce, but her mind was judicial, and she saw always both sides of a question, presenting them with a candor that at times enraged the more narrow and prejudiced members. Her life is still to be written, but in the long line of Philadelphia Abolitionists no name can ever hold more honor or dearer remembrance. The old days are past and the generation that knew them is passing too. They die, but their work is immortal, and whether forgotten or remembered, without it the republic would have been a failure and social progress a vain dream.

THE HEART'S ANGEL.

Across the sea, the shining, Southern sea,
Is one with whom I am so fain to be,
Though well I know her heart has turned from me.

Fly through this misty, rainy, Northern air,
Fly, Love, to her! fly, eager Love, even where
The purple South smiles warm and flushed and fair!

Speak to her of the days, the by gone days,
When light was on us from thy godlike face,
When two hearts triumphed in thy sovereign grace.

Bring buried twilights round her till she feel
As once she felt; through all her sweet heart steal
That love that sealed my life as with a seal.

Blend for her ear in magic symphonies
The roar and thunder of wild, wintry seas
With drowsy humming of September bees.

Stand by her, Love, where fast in sleep she lies,
And drop for me on her dear mouth and eyes
A kiss which for my longing may suffice.

Be thou to her as song and scent and shine—
Let all thy dearest memories combine
To turn again that queenliest heart to mine.

"FOR PITY'S SAKE, A LITTLE EARTH."

POOR Mrs. Carlyle! Mrs. James Carlyle, not Mrs. Thomas. What she may have had to endure is another thing. But the mother of Carlyle, how is she to be commiserated! By one remark of hers furnishing a text for her son's condemnation, by his chosen biographer—"Gey ill to live with"—a remark made, we are not told when, under circumstances we are not told what. A mother, with a love unbounded for her son—a love which, in spite of her own strong belief and unswerving orthodoxy, no amount of speculation or unbelief on his part could chill. A love, too, which was returned in as extraordinary a manner by her son, based on thorough respect, and heightened by that very faith he to the last so highly extolled.

"A woman to me," is his first record of her, "of the fairest descent, that of the pious, the just and the wise." "To her care for body and soul" he never ceased to acknowledge that "he owed endless gratitude." "Oh, for faith!" he cries; "Truly the greatest God-announcing miracle always is faith. I often look on my mother (nearly the only genuine believer I know of) with a kind of sacred admiration!" . . . "True belief has done some evil in the world, but it has done all the good that was ever done in it from the time when Moses saw the Burning Bush, and believed it to be God appointing him deliverer of his people, down to the last act of belief that you and I executed. Good never came from aught else." . . . Had we read the closing paragraphs of Froude's life of Carlyle before we began the book, it is possible it would have been read with less pain. "It is the nature of men," he says, "to dwell on the faults of those who stand above them. They are comforted by perceiving that the person whom they have heard so much admired was but of common clay after all." Remarkable words! For those who delight in flaws, and search for them as record-reading geologists search for insects in amber, no doubt the avidity with which every smallest fly is seized upon and held under a focus that will remit no deformity, will add zest to the perusal of the book. "No better than we after all! Common clay! We may lie upon our oars," they can exclaim. "The nature of men!" And must it be pandered to?

To any reader who is enough of a man not to be "comforted" by perceiving the faults of those above him, the very first words of the preface are painful to the extreme.

"Mr. Carlyle expressed a desire in his will that of him no biography should be written. I find the same reluctance in his journal. No one, he said, was likely to understand a history, the secret of which was unknown to his dearest friends. He hoped that his wishes would be respected." Then his gathering of his wife's letters, himself preparing them for publication, with "added notes and introductory explanations," as a "last sacred duty," and which he intended as "a monument to a character of extreme beauty," he thought "would be sufficient for the public as a record of himself." "Had he rested here," says Froude, "my duty would have been clear." But "two years later, soon after he had made his will, Carlyle discovered that, whether he wished it or not, a life, or perhaps various lives of himself, would certainly appear when he was gone."

Perhaps Mr. Froude, with diligent research, could have given the names and possibly shown some defects in other great men who were waiting, scalpel in hand, their chance at "one above them." Would he have censured them? Does he not rather sanction their audacity? He says: "When a man has exercised a large influence on the minds of his contemporaries the world requires to know whether his own actions have corresponded with his teaching, and whether his moral and personal character entitles him to confidence. This is not idle curiosity; it is a legitimate demand." Then naming Byron, Burns and others in proof, he closes with this Froudish inference, "showing that the public will not be satisfied without sifting the history of its men of genius to the last grain of fact which can be ascertained about them." Future aids and helpers to the biography of Froude! Have you letters in your possession? Keep them under locks that cannot be picked. The time is coming when the last grain of fact in the most familiar of them may be worth "to the public" its weight in gold. "Carlyle knew that he could not escape," adds Froude. Poor man! He had a friend, however, to whom to turn. A friend, not "an enemy," to "write a book for him!" Had it been an enemy "we might have borne it." His autobiographical documents, "with his journals and the whole of his correspondence, he made over to me, with unfettered discretion to use in any way that I might think good." Royal trust! Worthy of a royal keeper. But what arose before the biographer? Carlyle? No. "The public!" And in the public all that accrues from success!

"In the papers thus in my possession," he continued, "Carlyle's history, external and spiritual, lay out before me as a map. . . . By selecting chosen passages out of his own and his wife's letters, by exhibiting the fair and beautiful side of the story only, it would have been easy, without suppressing a single material point" (mark the expression) "to draw a picture of a faultless character." What an admission! And yet he goes further. "When the devil's advocate has said his worst against Carlyle he leaves a figure still of unblemished integrity, purity, loftiness of purpose and inflexible resolution to do right, as of a man living consciously under his Maker's eye, and with his thoughts fixed on the account which he would have to render of his talents." After this wonderful panegyric, how much strength can we find, with the largest charity, in the excuse he gives for not having, as he says he could have done, "produced a portrait as agreeable, and at least as faithful, as those of the favored saints in the Catholic calendar." The excuse is, "it would have been a portrait without individuality." Then are all men so pure, so full of integrity, so saintly, as well as so original and grasping that such a character would have been absorbed in the great mass unnoticed! Again, he draws a further sanction for this flaw-hunting and magnifying from poor dead Carlyle himself. Not remembering that possibly the recollection of shortcomings and sharp sayings under stress of pain, vexation, poverty and toil from his first childish recollection until Froude is done with him, might have been the cause of his desire and "will" to have no biography, his biographer says: "Least of all men could such an idealizing be ventured with Carlyle, to whom untruth of any kind was abominable. If he was to be known at all, he chose to be known as he was; with his angularities, his sharp speeches, his special peculiarities, meritorious or unmeritorious—precisely as they had been given." Ah, that is Mr. Froude's ideal! If those had been Carlyle's own words we might have come nearer believing them. He does, indeed, try to prove them by quoting what Carlyle wrote as to his own idea of biography, when speaking of Lockhart's "Life of Scott." But it is a very different one from his own, after all. Broad as is Carlyle's idea of a biographer's privilege, he still says, in the same connection: "In speaking of the man and men he has to do with he will, of course, keep all his charities about him, but all his eyes open. Far be it from him to set down aught untrue; nay, not to abstain from and leave in oblivion much that is true." Does that imply the "last grain of fact"?

A quotation from Carlyle's "Life of Schiller" shows the same spirit. He says, near the close of that fair and beautiful life: "Such were the prevailing habits of Schiller: that, in the mild and beautiful brilliancy of their aspect, there must have been some specks and imperfections, the common lot of poor humanity, who knows not? That these were small and transient, we judge from the circumstance that scarcely any hint of them has reached us; nor are we anxious to obtain a full description of them. For practical uses we can sufficiently conjecture what they were, and the heart desires not to dwell upon them. This man is passed away from our dim and tarnished world; let him have the benefit of departed friends; let him be transfigured in our thoughts, and shine there without the little blemishes that clung to him in life." And in his "Life of Cromwell," after trying to make the best of some unproven charge against him, he ends with the heart-wrung exclamation, "Alas, all calumny and carrion, does it not incessantly cry, 'Earth, O, for pity's sake, a little earth!'"

Had Froude chosen to use as a refrain some of the good and praiseworthy expressions, repeating them even once, not to say half as many times as he has the fatal "Gey ill to live with," it would have seemed a little less the work of a harsh and bitter pen. Had he enlarged on the fact that when a very little boy his mother taught him to read, and Carlyle adds, "I never remember when"—he might have concluded it was not as a little child he was "Gey ill to live with." Some mothers' sons who have been taught to read remember it. Nor when, at fourteen, he leaves home, need he quote it, when we have the touching picture of "both father and mother walking with him in the dark, frosty November morning through the village to set him on his way." Nor, after this, when "constant presents" went from mother to son and from son to mother—butter and cheese and "well-knitted socks," with "scarfs," "shawls," and other gifts from the city, from his own scant purse. If hard to live with, he seems to have been harder to live without. Then, when his health failed, when "Dyspepsia had him by the throat" and "doubt" crept in, and poverty stared him in the face, one vocation and then another falls away, disappointments follow one another, articles rejected, people turning cold shoulders, "everything growing hopelessly darker and darker," how does Froude speak of him then? He appreciates the situation. He says, "He was attacked with dyspepsia, which never wholly left him, and in these early years soon assumed its more torturing form, like 'a rat gnawing at the pit of his stomach.'" The "D'Alembert's teachings" gnawing at more important vitals and "the Margaret Gordon business"—a trio of troubles, without the added poverty—one would think enough to demand the greatest charity. But no! After admitting them, he adds: "Reticence about his personal sufferings was at no time one of his virtues. . . . Even the minor ailments to which our flesh is heir, and which most of us bear in silence, the eloquence of his imagination flung into forms like the temptations of a saint." But when he had written home to this mother of his illness and troubles, what was her message in reply? Anything about the "imagination"? Her son at home writes him she wishes him to come home, adding, "She esteems seeing you again and administering comfort to you as her highest felicity." This message we do not notice repeated.

So much for the life before marriage. Again we may say: Poor Mrs. Carlyle—this time Mrs. Thomas Carlyle. It is not to be denied that her life was one of frequent and peculiar trial. Yet there are here many and great occasions, had they been improved, for a biographer to show charity and fine theme for praise. First, the candor and extreme frankness with which he stated to her his own case—his disposition, ill-health, want of regular income. And she chose freely to accept the situation. Froude allows Carlyle the utmost truthfulness, and in that most touching of all sad records which he gives after her death, Carlyle uses these remarkable words: "She had from an early period formed her own little opinion about me (what an El Dorado to me, ungrateful being, blind, ungrateful, condemnable and heavy-laden, and crushed down into blindness by great misery as I oftenest was), and she never flinched from it for an instant, I think, or cared or counted what the world said to the contrary (very brave, magnanimous and noble truly she was in all this); but to have the world confirm her in it was always a sensible pleasure, which she took no pains to hide, especially from me."

There is no need to go over what is familiar to all; but in it all and through it all the work (often by sheer force of necessity and will) accomplished—the tender conscience he ever manifested, the pride, almost reverence, with which his wife looked up to him; the effort to please, and joy in success in pleasing, in spite of weariness and loneliness, which she freely chose to share, and in which his own shoulders were always put to the wheel—in and through it all glows and burns, in spite of hasty words or seeming neglect, a strong, true, reliable love, that was an anchor to both their storm-beaten souls. And after she, who was the "light of his eyes," was suddenly snatched away, and the iron, a sense of inexorable separation, had entered his soul, were not his expressions of self-condemnation over any remembered act of selfishness or thoughtless neglect sufficiently poignant to satisfy any fair biographer and lead him, in very pity for the failures and remorse, as well as in honor to the long and noble struggle, to draw some slight veil over the silent dead, instead of looking to a "Public who demand the last grain of fact"?

"When the devil's advocate has said his worst against Carlyle, he leaves a figure still of unblemished integrity, purity, loftiness of purpose and inflexible resolution to do right, as of a man living consciously under his Maker's eye, and with his thoughts fixed on the account which he would have to render of his talents."

SILENT and bowed and with averted face,
 His sceptre broken—throneless and discrowned—
 He waits the severing of the slender cord
 That binds him to the living. A little while,
 And gathered to the ages he will sleep
 Among the centuries. What though he gave
 To human thought and purpose high reward,
 And crowned with living bays th' elect of Fame ;
 What though he wrote his name on History's page

In lines of vivid flame with pen of fire,—
 Yet must he sink, as sinks a grain of sand
 In the broad current that resistless bears
 Its atoms to the sea. And they whose brows
 He crowned, whose bosoms filled with sheaves,
 Into whose cups he poured the oil and wine,
 Inconstant, turn them to the young and new,
 And greet the Coming Monarch with "All Hail !"

ART IN THE QUAKER CITY.

ART at the present time is in a transition stage. Methods and ideas which commended themselves to a former generation with the force of immutable laws are no longer regarded as of vital consequence, while the experimental efforts of a new departure have not as yet entirely established themselves in the public esteem. The artists of the present day do not, perhaps, address themselves to the study of nature with any more lovingness than did their predecessors, but they do approach nature from a somewhat different standpoint, and limit their regard to a different order of pictorial facts. In truth, it is in the distinction which is made in our time between facts that are essentially pictorial and those which have what might be called a scientific value, that the art of this latter part of the nineteenth century departs most widely from the art of the early and middle periods of the century, and from the art which preceded it, and which had its inspiration in the renaissance of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. This later nineteenth-century art has emancipated itself almost as completely from the direct influences of this renaissance as our literature has from the classical influences which once dominated it. The obligations of the art-workers of the present day to those of the renaissance is, of course, none the less in that they have succeeded in rejecting arbitrary codes built upon renaissance practices, and have taught themselves to consider nineteenth-century tastes from a nineteenth-century standpoint. The new departure means nothing more and nothing less than that the artists of the present day have learned that they cannot see with other men's eyes nor think with other men's minds; and that if we are to have a living art which shall be able to make any proper appeals to the public at large, and which will deserve any large public appreciation, the artist must be, in the most literal sense of the term, a man of his own time, and must know how to use his faculties in accordance with the spirit of the time.

It is very true that the art of our time has not proved itself by any great monumental works. Perhaps it will never prove itself in this way, although while such a building as the Capitol at Washington—to say nothing of other monumental structures—fails to offer the true artists of the country any real opportunities, it cannot be said that later nineteenth-century art fails to be monumental because of the incapacity of its practitioners. If, however, the art of their times has accomplished nothing that can fairly rival the great works of the past, it assuredly has accomplished much that art in other times failed to do. If something has been lost much has been gained by the production of easel pictures and book illustrations. It is no small gain that superior artistic performances are scattered broadcast as they now are, for, to have such carefully-executed works as those which adorn the pages of the best illustrated periodicals go into innumerable homes which would never be brought under the influence of great monumental achievements, is of itself a matter of no little importance.

The Philadelphia Society of Artists is a very representative body of art-workers—representative from the point of view of the preceding remarks. Its membership embraces the principal Philadelphia artists, old and young, although there is a preponderance of young and active members, who are in more or less cordial sympathy with the advanced ideas of the day. This society in a particular manner represents the business tact and enterprise which is a distinguishing feature of the artistic brotherhood of our time. It is worth saying, in this connection, that for an artist to be possessed of business enterprise does not necessarily imply that he sacrifices anything of the artistic spirit to the commercial idea. The time has never been when artists have not been willing and anxious to secure the largest possible pecuniary returns for their labors; but many a time and oft it has happened that the artistic fraternity has shown an incapacity to deal with the public on proper and business-like terms which distinctly recognize an intimate relation between value rendered and value received. Business talent and tact, in fact, represent public spirit and genuine esprit de corps, rather than sentiments less praiseworthy, and the peculiar success which the society under consideration has achieved very effectually demonstrates that the true interests of art are advanced rather than retarded when the artists are able to bring themselves into cordial business relations with their public, and are disposed to ask nothing for which a full valuation cannot be returned.

Nothing is more noteworthy in exhibitions of modern American work than the reflex influence of the now half-forgotten pre-Raphaelite movement of twenty years ago, together with the direct teaching acquired in the European schools. The painstaking care which was the first visible outcome of Mr. Ruskin's writings had its day. The present writer recalls certain New York drawing-rooms whose walls were at that time covered with impossible landscapes, which linger in his memory as a sort of nightmare dream. He recalls, too, subsequent auction sales, through which, at not infrequent intervals, these same pictures found their way back to an omnivorous public at prices which, in some cases, but not always by any means, covered the original cost of canvas and frames. Some of the enthusiastic young painters of that day, who gave themselves over to the new gospel, have worked out of it into modern methods; only one is now remembered who adheres to the faith as it was then taught, and his pictures are rarely seen outside of his own studio. If he had been obliged to depend on his brush for a living he would have fared hardly, unless, indeed, the stern teaching of necessity had developed his noble native talent in a different direction.

The reaction came for really progressive artists in a leaning toward the opposite side of the scale, and the impressionists have gone as far toward mistiness as did the pre-Raphaelites toward microscopy. It is this swinging of the pendulum which is largely the life of art, and which lends its characteristics to any given period. So many Americans have studied abroad that they have largely acquired the French and German mannerisms. Some foreign critics of high standing have said that they have learned all that the European schools can teach. Certain it is that at the present time exhibitions in the larger cities afford marked examples of Paris and Munich, and experts can even tell where an artist has studied by a glance at his work.

This is all as it should be. We have sent our children to the best schools to learn the rudiments, and now they are coming home to teach and be taught, for no artist ceases to learn while he can work intelligently. Already the results of this teaching are making themselves apparent in the work of the youngest artists. The travelers have come home and established schools, where it is possible to learn much that a few years ago could only have been acquired by a long residence abroad.

Out of this, sooner or later, will grow the long looked for American school. Not that such a school—distinctively speaking—is especially to be desired, but it is inevitable. Technical skill cannot long be coupled with intelligent study and not produce something worthily original.

The Philadelphia Society of Artists was organized on March 30th, 1877, and it was incorporated on July 14th, 1879. It started with a membership of seven, the fact that many similar attempts to secure co-operation among the art-workers of Philadelphia had failed to achieve results of consequence preventing many of the artists from participating at the start in the new venture. The seven original members, however, were enterprising and active, and they soon succeeded in demonstrating to the majority of their fellows that it was worth while to join hands with them, and the result was that the society grew and prospered, until it now numbers fifty active and two hundred and fifty contributing members. For the purpose of bringing the artists and the picture-loving public together, the society held a series of receptions at the Academy of the Fine Arts. These were so successful that, in 1879, it was decided to try the experiment of holding an autumn exhibition. This exhibition was a great artistic and popular success, while that held in 1880 was even more so. The directors of the Academy of the Fine Arts having decided to hold their annual exhibitions in the autumn, instead of in the spring as had been customary, the society was unable to procure the use of the galleries, and consequently obtained quarters of its own at 1725 Chestnut Street. The galleries of the society are three in number, and although not of large size, they are conveniently arranged and well-lighted. In them was held the annual exhibition of 1881, which was followed by a short combination exhibition, and this again by a water-color exhibition. For the present winter an exhibition has been brought together which the members of the society regard as superior in many respects to any that has been exhibited under their auspices, and which is a better representation of the finer qualities of American art-work of the present day than has ever been made in Philadelphia.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

Father Time. His Twelve Children.

CHORUS OF THE MONTHS.

Father, in reverence humbly kneeling,
Be our dear love for thee confessed ;
But tell us which, thine heart revealing,
You love the best.

FATHER TIME.

My father-love an ocean seething,
Its mingled currents rise and fall,
Is ceaselessly the answer breathing :
I love you all.

JANUARY (coarsely).

You love me best ; white-wrapped and hoary,
I am thy eldest, thy first born,
I am the herald of thy coming glory—
Of years the dawn.

When years are young, hearts laugh as lightly
As does my snowy softness fall,
Which covers cares and keeps souls whitely.

FATHER TIME (smilingly).

I love you all.

FEBRUARY.

My snow-bound days are deeply freighted
With high-piled drifts of joyousness ;
Each frosty moment overweighted
With happiness.

My life is short, yet in a single Attar-drop from roses pressed,
A thousand perfumed flowers mingle,
And please thee best.

MARCH.

My boisterous days have cause for gladness :
Chuckling in every breath that blows,
They laugh away frost's cheerless sadness.
And melt the snows.

With breezy steps I dance a measure,
Scattering seeds for future growth,
My work is, best of all, a pleasure
And duty both.

APRIL.

You love me best ; each frown that lowers,
Each tear that courses from my face.
Serves but to better sue the flowers,
The earth to grace.

Pleasure from pain must largely borrow ;
Each kingdom, separate, is small ;
Joy rules but with a crown of sorrow.

FATHER TIME.

I love you all.

MAY.

With gentle sighs, on tiptoe creeping,
I woo her who has silent lain,
And Beauty, who has long been sleeping.
Awakes again.

She touches Earth, to make things worthless,
Worthy at touch of her caress—
To meet her kisses—sweets now birthless
Their life confess.

JUNE.

You love me best ; each throbbing hour
Leaps through my pulse a burning stream—
An ecstasy of living power—
A luscious dream.

Eternity were feeble measure,
A love of life does so enthral,
Viewed through my garland haze of pleasure.

FATHER TIME.

I love you all.

JULY.

My lazy days sail on as slowly
As vessels on my breezeless sea,
Borne with the wind of fancy solely
And memory.

With thing that are, things wished, not granted,
Are forged in thought a linked chain,
Till castellated realms enchanted
Spring from the brain.

AUGUST.

The æolian harp of summer flying,
My loving breezes play upon ;
The few notes left are like the sighing
Of dying swan.

Those days of joy, whose mocking fleetness
Woo to pursuit with greater zest.
Have more intoxicating sweetness
Than all the rest.

SEPTEMBER.

You love me best ; the happy chorus
Sung by the gatherers of grain,
Echoes from golden fields before us
And laden wain.

From lip to heart the song is creeping ;
Most welcome does the promise fall ;
Reward of labor each is reaping.

FATHER TIME.

I love you all.

OCTOBER.

With gorgeous hours, rainbow-tinted,
Fattened by harvests plenteous,
Nature, alike with man, unstinted,
Grows generous.

The many hopes that youth arranges,
Green, unripened in the days of old,
Become, through fulfilled crimson changes,
At last the gold.

NOVEMBER.

My days are such, their sparkle missing,
Your pulsing blood must sluggish flow ;
The balmy breath of summer kissing
The lips of snow.

Each buoyant spirit, gayly robbing,
Plunders the skies of loveliness ;
And every heart is warmly throbbing
With thankfulness.

DECEMBER.

You love me best ; my shadows lengthened,
Dim not the glory of these festal times,
When harmony of good is strengthened
By Christmas chimes.

"Peace on the earth," peals forth the singing ;
Man's deed and song are rhythmic then ;
While in each heart a God is ringing
"Good will to men."

(They whisper together and look toward December.)

JANUARY.

I yield my claim to thee, December.

FEBRUARY.

I yield mine, too.

MARCH.

And mine.

APRIL.

And mine.

MAY.

Thy spirit breathes, we should remember,
The love divine.

JUNE.

Thy right is mighty.

JULY.

Never falter.

AUGUST.

Thy Christmas gladness be thy key

SEPTEMBER.

To ope love's holiest place ;

OCTOBER.

An altar,

NOVEMBER.

A sacristy.

CHORUS TO DECEMBER.

We love thee best, sweet sister dearest ;
Be thou our queen in heart of Him
Whose praise we chant in anthems clearest,
Like seraphim.

For love of thee, each brings those hours
Most blest to her ; with yours entwine,
And place them all, a wreath of flowers,
Upon your shrine.

CHORUS TO FATHER TIME.

Confess thy love—we are not jealous—
To her thy preference should fall.
Our best beloved is thine? Oh! tell us!

FATHER TIME (radiantly).

I LOVE YOU ALL.

CHAPTER XXXV.

ONE morning Lady Flanders, enveloped in a dressing-gown bought at a bazaar in Damascus, which made her look like the Grand Vizier in the Arabiar. Nights, knocked at the room which her guest, Mrs. Lancaster was occupying. Marion, who had not yet finished her toilet, opened the door, and Lady Flanders stalked in. She merely nodded a good morning, and did not at once explain the reason of this early visitation. With her hands behind her, she began to pace slowly up and down the room, her head bent and her shaggy brows drawn together: altogether rather an appalling spectacle. At length she halted, felt in the pocket of her caftan for her snuff-box, and not finding it there, sniffed, rubbed her nose, and went up to Marion, who had resumed the combing of her hair which the entrance of her ladyship had interrupted.

"How is your health this morning, my dear?" she demanded, scowling down upon her.

"I thank you; much as usual," replied Marion apathetically.

"Nonsense! You are not well at all: you're as pale and peaked as a charity-school girl!" returned the old lady testily. "You haven't improved at all since you came to my house, Mrs. Lancaster: and yet I've paid you every attention. I'm displeased at it!"

"You have been most kind to me, and I—" began Marion; but the other interrupted her with a peremptory gesture.

"You are altogether in the wrong, Mrs. Lancaster," she exclaimed, "and you should have discernment enough to be aware of it. I have shown you no kindness whatever: 'tis a thing I never do any one; I have simply pleased myself, as I always do: and 'tis as likely as not I have got you and your husband into a precious scrape, only for the gratification of my own antipathies. I have always abominated that little devil of a Marquise Desmoines, and I was determined to let her know it! That is the whole secret of the matter!"

"I shall not alter my opinion, madam," returned Marion with a smile, "and I can never forget the sympathy and protection you have given me. But I am unhappy: and I feel, now, that I did wrong to come here. I should have stayed at home with my mother."

"This is assurance, upon my honor! Where are your manners, ma'am? Pray, is my house not good enough for you?" But, having made these inquiries in a haughty and fierce way, the great lady suddenly took Marion in her arms and kissed her on both cheeks.

"I am an old fool, my dear," said she, sitting down with a disconsolate air, and crossing one leg over the other. "I'm not fit to be trusted alone any more. My likings and my dislikings both get me into trouble. I fell in love with you the minute I set eyes on you. For fifty years, at least, I have been ashamed of being a woman, and tried all I could to act as if I were a man—doing as men do, and thinking men's thoughts—or, at any rate, talking as if I thought them. And now, since I met you, I only wish I were more a woman than I am! My dear, you are the finest creature that ever stood in petticoats, and nobody is good enough for you. And when I fancied that that Philip of yours didn't appreciate the prize he had won—which, if he were the best man alive, he couldn't deserve—it made me so angry that I could have cut that handsome white throat of his from one ear to the other. And as if that wasn't enough, he must accuse you of improper behavior—"

"It was my own fault, Lady Flanders," said Marion, interrupting. "I'm sure I behaved very badly, and when I wouldn't tell him what I had been doing, I think he did quite right to be angry. I would ask him to forgive me, if he were here."

"Don't cry, my dear, it doesn't suit your character, and you only do it because you're weak and worn out, and God knows I don't wonder at it! As to asking him to forgive you, you would do no such thing—don't tell me!—until you were convinced he had done nothing to be forgiven for. And now," continued her ladyship, again diving into her pocket after the absent snuff-box, "I've come to tell you that I've begun to think he may not have been quite so bad as I thought. Mind—I know nothing more yet: I only make an inference. You know I pounced down upon that clever little wretch, the Marquise; and from her manner, and some things she said, my suspicions about her and that husband of yours were rather confirmed than disconcerted. So, rather than have you left alone in your house for people to snigger at, I persuaded you to come to me for a few days, until we could know exactly how matters stood. Poor child! You were in a state of mind not to care what became of you; and when I met your husband, that same afternoon, I had half a—"

"You met him, Lady Flanders? You never told me that!" exclaimed Marion, looking up and flushing.

"I know I didn't: why should I? I had no doubt he was on the way to that Marquise; and it was the next day, as I tell you, that I pounced down on her. Well, then . . . you shouldn't interrupt me, my dear; and—I wish you'd touch that bell: I think I must have left my snuff-box on my dressing-table."

The box was brought, and her ladyship took a copious pinch and proceeded. "Last night I heard something that disturbed and surprised me a good deal, and the source it came from was unimpeachable. I saw Mr. Merton Fillmore, and he told me that Madame Desmoines is going to bring an action against Mr. Lancaster to recover the money Mr. Grantley left him. At first I didn't believe it, but he was quite serious, and said that he was her solicitor in the matter. I told him he ought to be ashamed of himself;—but 'tis no use scolding men like him, they only bow and grin, and that's an end of it! I asked him why she hadn't claimed it before, and he tried to make up some nonsense about her having only just received proof that she was entitled to it. I told him it was a scandalous piece of business, and that he ought to have known better than to let himself be mixed up in it; and that I didn't believe the case had a leg to stand on. But between you and me, my dear, I shouldn't wonder if that particular kind of thieving that they call legal justice was on her side; and I fear there may be danger. But what I was going to say is, that if she is actually setting to work to ruin your husband, it doesn't look much as if they were in love with each other, does it?"

Marion clasped her hands together softly in her lap, and her eyes shone. A long sigh breathed from her lips, which smiled tremulously.

"Aye, aye," said Lady Flanders, sighing also, and scowling, "I know how it is! You are feeling happier than if I'd just told you you'd been made heiress of all the money in the Bank of England: and by-and-by, as soon as you're able to think of anything else but Philip, you'll turn round and fly into a terrible passion with me, because I misled you about him. But upon my honor, my dear, it was only your dignity and welfare I was thinking of. And mind you, this may be nothing but a blind, after all."

"No," said Marion, in a tender, preoccupied tone: "it is true; I am sure of it. I have been the wicked one. If he will only forgive me!"

"Never tell a person of my age and character that you are wicked," said Lady Flanders dryly; "it is not in good taste, for it makes 'em wonder what the Recording Angel will call them. As to forgiving you, if he were here, and didn't—"

"Do you know where he is?" exclaimed Marion, springing up. "Is he in the house? Oh, Lady Flanders, is he—"

"My dear, I don't know where he is, any more than you do: but there's no doubt he will be found soon enough, and I hope the lesson he's had will have done him good. Meantime, there's another matter to attend to. Your good mother, Mrs. Lockhart, you know—we arranged that she should be told nothing of all this trouble; and I gave her to understand, when I took you away, that you and your husband were going into the country to visit the Earl, and 'twas uncertain when you'd be back. Now, I got a letter from her this morning, saying that this was the anniversary of her wedding-day, and she wanted to spend it in the old house at Hammersmith. She was going to set out this forenoon; and it occurred to me it might be a good thing if you went with her. As your husband will probably turn up during the next few days, you would probably prefer to meet him in her company rather than in mine."

"Yes, yes," murmured Marion, who had already begun hurriedly to complete her toilet: "I will be ready in a few minutes. Yes, that will be best . . . Oh, I thank God! I could not have gone on living: but now, even if he doesn't forgive me, I am happy."

"I shall contrive so as to see him before you do," said her ladyship; "and after I've done with him, the only person he won't be ready to forgive will be me! Oh, 'tis just as well you both should have somebody to abuse, and I shall answer the purpose as well as anybody else. 'Tis about all an old hag like me is good for. Well, if you are going, I shall go with you, and deliver you safe into your mother's hands: and probably there'll have to be some lying done, when she asks where Philip is; and I'm a better hand at that than you are. You've no idea what experience I have had!"

Here the old lady chuckled rather cynically, and wrapping her caftan around her, stalked out of the room. Marion, left to herself, quickly went about her preparations, singing to herself at intervals, and moving with a lighter step and heart than she had known for many days. The old house at Hammersmith! It seemed like going home for the first time since the honeymoon. It was there that her first happiness had come to her; and if Heaven ever permitted her to be happy again, it ought to happen there. All this fever of wealth and fashionable society was as a dream that is past: freshness and sanity had returned with the morning.

Lady Flanders, with the promptness of an old campaigner, who knows how to concentrate hours into minutes when there is need for it, was ready almost as soon as Marion, and the two immediately set forth for the Lancasters' house in her ladyship's big carriage, with the coachman in front and the footman behind in pig-tails and silk stockings. They arrived just as Mrs. Lockhart was about to depart. She greeted them with her usual gentle serenity.

"My dear daughter," she said, embracing Marion, "your trip to the country has done you good. She has a fine color, has she not, Lady Flanders? though I think she is a little thin. This city life is very trying: I used to find it so before I married your dear father. But no doubt 'tis different when you have your husband to go into society with you. A happy marriage is the best health preserver in the world. Has Philip come back too? Will he come out with us?"

"Your son-in-law, madam," said Lady Flanders, before Marion could command her voice or open her mouth, "is detained, I believe, but very probably he may join you before you return. Madam, that gown suits you admirably; and I can scarce believe, when I look at you, that so many years have passed since you were the toast of Bath."

Hereupon the lovely Fanny Pell of the last century flushed with innocent pleasure, and the color showed through the cheeks of the gentle widow of Major Lockhart: and the difficulty about Philip was evaded for the present. After a little more conversation, Mrs. Lockhart proposed that, as the day was fine, Lady Flanders should accompany them as far as Hammersmith, and perhaps lunch with them there; and in the afternoon she might drive back in time to keep her engagement to dine at Lord Croftus'. Marion added her entreaty to those of her mother: and her ladyship, doubtless perceiving that her presence would be a protection for Marion against the guileless inquisition of Mrs. Lockhart, who was as likely to prattle about Philip and the delights of a happy marriage as about anything else, consented; and the whole party got into the carriage, and rolled away on gently-swaying springs. The brief winter sunshine shown along the streets, throwing the shadow of the tall vehicle behind them; and the pedestrians on the sidewalks stepped out briskly, for the air was crisp and bright. Christmas was not far off, and its jovial influence was already felt. The long year, with all its happiness and its misery, its failure and its success, was drawing to a close; and for the bulk of mankind, the cheerfuller side of life seemed, on the whole, to have come uppermost. Marion, as she gazed out of the window of the carriage (while her mother and Lady Flanders chatted about the London of forty years ago), meditated over all which this year had brought her of good and evil: and tried to determine with herself whether, taking the good and the evil together, she would have wished this year omitted from her life. At first, with the remembrance of recent pain and suffering still fresh within her, and the future still so uncertain and clouded, she thought that it would have been better for her if she had died that day that she saw Philip and Mr. Grant enter the gate of the old house in Hammersmith, and knock at the door. But when she began to recall more in detail all the events that had happened, she thought that, for so much happiness, all the pain was not too dear a price to pay. There was the picture in her memory of Philip telling them how he had cared for Major Lockhart, on the field of Waterloo: his voice had been tremulous as he told it, and his eyes had met hers with a sympathy so manly and so honest that her heart went out to meet it. Then had ensued that period when she withdrew herself from him, as it were, and was harsh and cold, from the untamed maidenhood that had divined its danger, and blindly sought to preserve itself at any cost. But oh! how sweet it had been to feel, day by day, that the struggle was in vain! What fear, what joy, what self-distrust, what hope, what secret tears! And then, that summer ride to Richmond, with Philip at her side; the banter, the laughter, the betraying tones and looks, the swelling tenderness that drowned resistance; and at last, the touch of hands, and the few words that meant so much! Surely, to have lived through such a day might compensate for many a day of pain.

Besides, the season of outward coldness and suspended confidence that had followed this, had been founded on nothing real, and had vanished at the first touch of reality. On that black night when she and Philip groped their way through midnight ways to avert, if it might be, the peril so mysteriously foreshadowed. Their spirits touched and recognized each other, and the terror of the crisis had only made the recognition more deep and firm. On that tragic night, love had avouched himself greater than all tragedy and sorrow; more true than they, and, unlike them, eternal. The flower of this love had she and Philip plucked, and had breathed its immortal fragrance. So much the year had brought her.

But then Marion fell to thinking about the months that had since elapsed, and the significance of their story. And the more she meditated, the more clearly did it appear to her that she, and not Philip, had been to blame. For why had she refused the legacy? From jealousy of Philip. But was her jealousy just? It had been a fancy merely, a vague suspicion, founded upon hints half understood and whimsically exaggerated. A woman who is loved has no right to say, "Because another woman is more beautiful or brilliant than I, therefore my husband will care more for her than he does for me." For love is the divine Philosopher's Stone, which transfigures that which it touches; and, for the lover, there is a beauty in his mistress before which the splendor of Helen of Troy or the Egyptian Cleopatra seem but as dust. And let her beware lest she so far vulgarize the dignity of love as to make it one with her own estimate of herself. As justly might the Song that Solomon sang rate its worth at that of the material forms and substances whereby it was conveyed from his mind to ours. As regarded Philip, moreover, how could he, being innocent of that which she suspected, have done otherwise than he did? For him to have yielded, would have been to acknowledge himself vulnerable. And again, what justification could she plead for the dissipated and reckless life she had led since the difference of opinion between Philip and herself? None, none! It had been the ungenerous revenge which, to requite open defeat, goes about to rob the victor of the comfort of his victory. Still less defensible was this last act of hers, to which the present disastrous state of things was immediately due. To gain an end which she had ostensibly given up, she had put herself in a predicament fairly open to the worst interpretation; and then, when her husband had demanded the explanation which was his right, she had defiantly refused to give it. When a woman like Marion begins to be repentant and forgiving, she allows herself no limits; and by the time the carriage had reached Hammersmith, Marion was disposed to consider herself the most reckless and culpable of wives, and Philip the most injured and long-suffering of husbands. But where, alas! was Philip, that she might tell him so?

They turned down the well-remembered little side street, and in another minute the carriage had drawn up before the iron gate, to which, so long ago and yet so recently, Marion had fastened the card with "To Let" written on it, which had been the means of bringing her and Philip together. The footman jumped down, opened the carriage door, and let down the steps; he assisted Mrs. Lockhart to alight, and gave her his arm up the walk. Marion followed with Lady Flanders. The old house looked forlorn, though a care-taker had been left in charge of it; the windows were dull and bare; the cedar of Lebanon had scattered its dry needles over the path and grass-plot; the knocker was tarnished, the footscraper red with dust. The footman lifted the knocker to rap; but before the stroke sounded, the door was opened from within.

Marion heard her mother give a little exclamation of surprise and pleasure, and then say something, in words she did not distinguish. She raised her eyes languidly: but the broad back of the liveried footman intercepted her view. Lady Flanders, however, whose vision was not thus obstructed, gave a start, and cried out, "Why, d— him, there he is!"

The footman's back disappeared, and in its place Marion's gaze absorbed the vision of a tall dark figure, a white face, black, exploring eyes, disheveled hair,—all suddenly kindled up and vivified by a flash of poignant delight. She remained standing erect on the lower step, and, without removing her wide, breathless gaze, she slowly raised her hands, and clasped them together against her heart.

"Mr. Lancaster," said Lady Flanders, in a high, sharp tone, "help your wife into the house. can't you! she's feeling faint. You ought to be more careful how you play off your surprises on a woman in her condition. Why didn't you let us know you were going to be here? Come, Mrs. Lockhart," she added, seizing the latter by the arm and drawing her in-doors, "let us get up stairs and take off our bonnets. That's the way with these young married people! They can't meet after a separation of twelve hours without going into such heroic and ecstasies as would make one think they had been dead and returned to life again, at least! Leave 'em to themselves, and perhaps in half an hour they'll be able to recognize our existence."

In this way the wise old woman of the world, who had comprehended the situation at a glance, at once parried whatever inconvenient inquiries Mrs. Lockhart might have made, and afforded an opportunity to Philip and Marion to enjoy their explanation and reconciliation in private, away from the inspection of footmen and other ignorant and inquisitive persons. When she got up stairs, and before she removed her bonnet, she took out a large silk pocket-handkerchief, and blew her nose; and for some time made no articulate rejoinder to the serene little observations which Mrs. Lockhart kept offering.

"How did you happen to be here, my dearest?" said Marion, in the course of the interview. "Did you know we were coming?"

"I have been here for several days, I believe," answered Philip: "I hardly know how long, or when the days begun or ended. I did not know where to look for you, darling, and it seemed most natural to come here, where we loved each other first."

"Oh, my Philip! and were you thinking I was wicked all that time?"

"No, thank God! I don't think I ever seriously believed that. But one day, before I came here, I saw Tom Moore; he came up to me, and said he wanted to say something to me in private. So we walked across the park, and pretty soon I found that he was talking about you. From that moment I remember every word he uttered. 'Mr. Lancaster,' he said, 'you'll do me the credit to believe that I'm a man of honor and a gentleman, and the good name of a lady is sacred to me. I have admired and revered Mrs. Lancaster since first I had the honor to be in her presence; and though, to be sure, 'twas mighty small notice she ever took of me, my nature is not so petty that a slight to my vanity can obscure my judgment or dim my perception.' Then he went on to tell me all about meeting you at Vauxhall, and what a state of excitement you were in, and how he hurried you out of sight, and put you into a carriage, and then went and got Sir Francis; and how you all drove to the inn in Pimlico, and afterwards how he saw you safe home with your maid. Then he said that tortures would never have unsealed his lips on the subject: but he had learned that, in some way, a rumor had got abroad that you were seen there. Whereupon he had deemed it due to his honor as a gentleman, as well as to his consciousness of integrity and innocence, to come to me at once, in a frank and manly way, and give me to know at first hand all there was to be known of the matter. It was very eloquent and chivalrous," added Philip, "and at any other time I might have laughed: as it was, I just thanked him, and we bowed to each other and parted; and I came here."

"It seems like coming up out of the grave," said

Marion, musingly. "And now, my poor Philip, after all our quarreling and trouble, what do you think has happened? The Marquise is going to sue for your money; and Lady Flanders says she's afraid the law may give it to her."

"Will the Marquise do that?" said Philip, arching his eyebrows.

"So Merton Fillmore says: and he is to conduct her case."

"Well," said Philip, beginning to smile, "she could not have done anything that pleases me better; for I have gained much wisdom since I saw you last, and am as anxious to be rid of that burden as ever you were. So, if you agree, my darling, we'll give her the twenty thousand pounds, without putting her to the trouble to sue for it: for there's only one kind of wealth worth having, and that is what I have been enjoying ever since I caught sight of you on the doorsteps."

"But, Philip, you know we have spent ever so much money on that miserable house in town. What are we to do about that? for the money from 'Iduna' will not be enough to pay it."

"Why, that is all right, too," said Philip, laughing: "for, though I had forgotten it till this moment, Lord Seabridge, who is not expected to live more than a week, said when I saw him the other day that he put five thousand pounds in his will for me, 'just to buy my wife a present.' We can pay our debts with that, and still have a few hundreds left to begin life again in this old house." He put his arm round her waist, and added, looking down at her, "You won't object to my receiving that legacy, will you?"

"Oh, Philip!" said Marion, with a long sigh, hiding her face on his shoulder; "I wish . . . I think . . . I hear my mother and Lady Flanders coming down stairs!"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE TWO WOOINGS.

In a garden sweet with roses,
Mused a maid one summer day,
Dreaming 'mid the bloom and fragrance
Of the years long passed away.

"In this very garden olden,
I have heard my mother say,
Did my grandsire, proud and stately,
Woo a maiden fair and gay.
Gay and fair, my girlish grand-dame
(I have seen her pictured face).
Pure and sweet as any lily,
With a dainty, old-time grace.
He, so tall and grand and stately,
Powdered hair and quaint attire;—
Yet beneath the garb of manhood
Beat a heart of youthful fire.
And he wooed in courtly phrases,
Murmured low on bended knee.
Like a true and loving subject—
Like a royal princess she.
Scarce he dared, with humble fervor,
Press her dainty finger-tips;
Lower bent his head, and lower,
When he raised them to his lips.
Ah, so grand that old-time wooing,
Timid glance and bended knee!"

"Thus" (so ran her gentle musings)

"Must my lover kneel to me."

In the garden as she lingered.

Dreaming dreams as maidens will.

Down the leafy walks there sounded
Steps that made her pulses thrill.

And a youth of modern aspect,

With a manner debonnaire,
Came with words of careless greeting,
Sought the nearest garden chair.
And he chatted of the weather,
Praised the garden, plucked a rose;
Likened it to her in beauty—
Fairest, sweetest flower that grows.

Not a trace of awe or homage
On his frank and happy face;
Yet the maiden read his purpose
'Neath his mien of careless grace.

"Oh, his heart is true and tender!

Sweet the tale he has to tell!

And" (so ran her happy musing)

"Sure am I he loves me well."

Does he kneel, this modern lover?

Press her dainty finger-tips?

Ah! instead he clasps her closely,

Boldly kisses willing lips;

Eagerly, with eyes love-lighted,

Gazes on her blushing face;

Calls her dearest, best and fairest,

Praises every tender grace.

"Stately was my grandsire's wooing,

On that olden summer day!

Yet" (thus runs her guileless musing)

"Sweeter far the modern way."

CHAPTER XXVII.

NOT WITHOUT HONOR

DAWSON FOX was about to return to Skendoah. It was a long time since he had gone forth, a sturdy child of poverty, to do a man's work and win a name for himself that he might come back and woo pretty Mattie Ermendorf to share his labor and his fame. It was twenty-five years and more since he had learned that the dream of his youth was not to be fulfilled. The little hamlet had never missed the barefoot boy who went away; and it listened with something of wonder and a little self-gratulation to the sermon of the high-browed earnest-eyed young man who had returned. And now again the thriving town that had grown up where had been only the "Drovers' Wayside Home" and the few straggling houses of the old-time corners was about to honor itself by reclaiming an interest in a long-lost son. The town was full of it. The dead walls were placarded with it, and the village newspaper, edited by a man who had come to the village hardly a year before, teemed with glowing accounts of the "gifted and eloquent son of Skendoah," who was said to be "remembered with peculiar pride and affection by all our old citizens." The "old citizens" were very numerous, too, considering what the town had been before Harrison Kortright had restored the lost lake Memmona, and turned its prisoned powers upon the dripping wheels below. Dawson Fox was in everybody's mouth. Almost every man and woman in whose hair there showed a thread of silver, was sure to have some memory of the returning celebrity, or at least some tradition derived from the specially intimate associates of his youth. Men stopped each other on the street to tell tales of his boyhood. Laborers in the factories allowed their machines to run idly on while they talked of the returning prodigy. This is what the handbills said of him:

BLEEDING KANSAS!

A MEETING OF THE CITIZENS OF SKENDOAH

NEXT WEDNESDAY NIGHT,

TO TESTIFY OUR SYMPATHY

AND

DEVISE MEANS FOR SENDING AID

TO THE

SETTLERS IN KANSAS, WHO ARE SUFFERING FROM THE RAVAGES OF BORDER-RUFFIAN HORDES, WHO SEEK TO

DRIVE EVERY FREEMAN FROM HER BORDERS.

celebrated Orator and Missionary, who is known as the "Apostle of Freedom" in Kansas, where he has labored unceasingly for three years, will address the meeting. The distinguished orator is a native of Skendoah, and will be warmly welcomed in his former home, where he has never been forgotten.

The company of emigrants who have been fitted out from Skendoah and vicinity will leave on Thursday. They will be accompanied to the station by a grand procession of all the citizens who favor Free Speech, Free Labor, Free Soil and Free Kansas. Their outfit is not quite as complete as is desirable, but every man has his Sharpe's rifle and plenty of ammunition.

The water will be shut off at 12 o'clock on Thursday, so that all may take part in this demonstration.

By order of the Committee.

Dawson Fox had been a missionary, and had labored faithfully among the people to whom he had been sent, but not with any notable success. All those who knew the man, and how he toiled in his distant field, wondered at this fact. His associates and superiors in the foreign mission work said, after a while, that he was a most brilliant and devoted man, but not suited to that work. It was suggested that he should marry, but it only excited a strange petulancy when he was urged to do so. At length labor and loneliness and the terrible climate brought him a release. His health was broken, and it was decided that only the homeward voyage and home scenes could effect a cure. He had not spent all these years pining for a lost and hopeless love. So he told himself, and he spoke truly when he said so. He was not the man to destroy himself with regret. Few men had ever studied as he had in the position he had occupied, but he had not forgotten. The long years of self-sacrifice and unceasing application, in which he had dreamed only of Mattie Ermendorf, had burned her image into his heart beyond all power of eradication. If he had won her he would have become a part of the world, for she would have led him into it. Without her, however, he was fitted only to be a hermit. His studies were a cell where only he and his love came in those years, and when his hope had died he hid there with his dead, which was more precious than all the living. He wrought in the learning of the land he was sent to enlighten, but came not near the hearts of its people, because his own heart was the sealed sepulchre of love.

When he returned he had half hoped that during his absence time might have wrought some miracle in his behalf; but when he sat at Jared Clarkson's hospitable board and heard from his lips of the prosperity that had fallen on Skendoah through the man who had married the woman he had loved, and learned that Paradise

Bay, now in the outskirts of a thrifty town, had been transformed into an elegant mansion, whose mistress was the good angel of every sorrowing heart within its busy limit, he simply said to himself, "It is well." He felt that the life he would have bound to his own had been made richer in blessing to them that needed, perhaps, and had no doubt been fuller of joy than if he had had his will. So he did not venture near to witness her joy, lest even then he should mar its completeness, but finding a work ready to his hand which ran with his inclination, he gave himself to it, as soon as restored health would permit, and for many years he had been one of the most noted of that class of peripatetic missionaries who were known as Abolition orators.

Of these there were two classes—men who had nothing else to do, and men who did little else. The former class too often became mere ranters, spouters for a single idea. Their sense of fitness and proportion was destroyed, and to their minds the world seemed swinging round a single thought. Dawson Fox was not only too large a man to be thus bounded and absorbed, and life had also brought to him too wide an outlook to permit such subjugation. He felt that the world was not all bounded by the nation whose travail had just begun, though he sincerely believed that here the question of individual liberty was to be fought out for all times and for all peoples. It was that portion of the great world-conflict that filled the present. It was to him also a part of that religion to the promotion of which he had been dedicated—the one element of Christianity which it was given unto our day and times to illustrate and construe for the edification of the ages. To him this idea was a part of a far greater whole. Liberty was a foundation-stone, but the edifice built above was far more worthy and beautiful than that on which it rested. Man was greater, in his eyes, than any of his attributes; God infinitely above the laws by Him ordained. To him the work of establishing freedom was only another form of missionary labor. In his view, religion was made for man, and not man for religion. He had been unable to do a laborer's part in one portion of the Lord's vineyard, but in that which he had now entered his powers had full play, and he found himself strengthened by knowledge and experience for the work. So, it was no wonder that the disappointed foreign missionary became famous as an advocate of liberty and a home missionary on the plains of Kansas. He had crossed its border almost with the first settlers, drawn thither by that fine instinct of its strategic importance in the great conflict, that so often seems more like prophecy than forecast in natures that are strung to a higher pitch of observation than the common herd. Regardless of sect, he had constituted himself at once a pastor of the scattered people, keeping alive, at the same time, the spirit of religion and of liberty in their hearts. He had shared their dangers and sufferings, and had more than once been their emissary to the rich and populous East, whose outpost they defended.

More than once had Mr. Kortright, meeting him at various assemblies of this character, sought to induce him to revisit the home of his boyhood; but it had been in vain. The large-hearted, busy-brained manufacturer had no suspicion of the reason why. He had something more than mere regard for this man of a double life. They had been boys together—not exactly playmates in any familiar sense, but they had known each other—and he fully realized the disadvantages under which Dawson Fox had labored, and honored the success he had achieved. Strangely enough, he did not stop to measure it by any material standard. Perhaps strong natures rarely do. The fact of success is of more weight with the man who has wrought his own way upward than the mere accident of wealth. Dawson Fox had succeeded; so had Harrison Kortright, and they two, in a sense, towered alone above those with whom they had played and fought and with whom they had been wont to compare themselves in the old days. It mattered not that one was rich and the other poor. Both had honored the native soil, and each was willing to accord to the other the meed of credit for his exertion and success. The magnate of Skendoah was no aristocrat. No man had ever accused him of that; but he must have been more or less than human not to have been proud of himself and his work. In a single decade he had transformed the silent hamlet into a busy city. Lake Memnona was his monument—his appeal to the ages—the attestation of his manhood. His life before that had been nothing. So he said, and so every one else believed, forgetful that it is in silence and repose that Nature ripens her best fruits. The years of silence had been years of growth with him. He did not know it; yet he regarded with peculiar pleasure whatever there was of worth and value in those years. The friends of that time were of especial delight to him now. One by one he had found a place for several of them in connection with his various enterprises, and all regarded him still as "the Squire." They said of him—everybody who knew him—that old Kortright had not forgotten what he had come up from. It was a mistake. He was simply unconscious that he had come up. He felt his later life to be no better or worthier than his early manhood. It was only broader and stronger—that was all. The people who wrought with him were not beneath him. They were not his work-people, but his neighbors. The little church had grown in size but not in magnificence. Kortright's Hall, as the people had insisted that it should be called, was the property of the citizens and for their use. All sorts of gatherings were held here in which the citizens or any considerable number of them were interested. Its platform was free. Its seats were free, unless the people by a free ballot put a price thereon for any specific purpose.

It was here that he desired to welcome Dawson Fox, and with that purpose, in order both to gratify the expected guest and his old friends, he had procured the committee to be made up of men whose names he believed the orator would still remember. Among these were our old friend Shields, still the positive, independent, keen-minded farmer, whose estate had felt the impetus of Skendoah's growth until he was now, in his later years, a man of affluence; and Van Wormer, the stirring head of a valuable business that the waters of Lake Memnona had brought into life.

"It's a pity," said Shields, running his hand over the thin, gray hairs that framed his sharp features on either side, when they had met to draft the letter of invitation—"it's a pity old 'Squire Ritner ain't here to take a part in this. It's my notion that he's about the only one that had any special liking for Dawson when he was a ragged boy round here. He did take to him, and I guess he helped him arter he left here."

"I'm sure I don't know," said Kortright, "but there never was a man more likely to do another a good turn than Ritner. We lost a man when we buried him."

"That we did," said Shields. "I've heard him talk about Dawson more'n once since he began to make a figger in the world, and it was easy to see he'd always had a high opinion of him."

"He was always ahead of all the rest of us in finding out good things to be done," said Kortright, with a sigh.

"Except in finding water-power," laughed Van Wormer, with his old propensity to tease.

"Well," said Kortright, "Josiah Ritner wasn't the sharpest man in findin' pennies or dollars that's ever been within a hundred miles of Skendoah, but I've never met a man that knew quite so well how to use 'em. The time was, gentlemen, when that man took me out of about the worst rut I ever got into."

"How was that?" asked Van Wormer.

"Well, you know, I wasn't exactly used to handling as much money as I had to use in starting these things, and I was pretty nervous about the outcome for a time. I worked mighty hard for a year or two, and didn't think of much else day in and day out, till the factories were up and everything running as smooth and easy as water through a pine 'trunk.' Then the habit had got so fastened onto me that I never thought of giving attention to anything else. One day 'Squire Ritner came into the office, and as I was too busy to talk he just sat and watched me for an hour or so. We'd always been fast friends, but I should think it had been two years since we'd said much more'n 'How d'ye do?' in passing. After a while we were alone a minute and the 'Squire came up and put his hand on my shoulder in that sort of petting way he had with everybody, you know, and said:

"Seems to me, Kortright, you're a' forgittin' that you ain't nothing but a trustee."

"I never was so scared in my life, for I thought he'd got hold of something I didn't care about being known; but when I looked up I saw his meaning at once. I got up and took his hand and shook it as if he'd been my brother, as he surely was, and said, 'So I had, 'Squire, but I promise you I won't any more.'"

"Oh, ho!" said Shields, with a twinkle in his eye, "that's what Mis Kortright laughs about yet as your 'second conversion,'—eh?"

"Exactly. I bought a new span of horses and a new carriage, and went home at four o'clock and took her out riding. It was about the first time I'd done such a thing since our courting days, too."

Kortright laughed at the recollection, and it was evident that his friends understood what his "second conversion" meant.

"And, by the way," said Shields, "that reminds me that Ritner once told me that Fox took it very much to heart, your marryin' Mattie Ermendorf."

"Crossed in love, eh?" said Van Wormer gleefully. "Well, well, Squire, I had no idea you were bringing an old rival back here to exult over his misfortune."

"Sho, sho," said Kortright, with a little impatience, but with the hint of a blush on his fine, honest face. "That is just one of Shields' jokes."

"Not a bit on't," said Shields, combing his thin locks with his hand; "it's what Ritner told me—and told it in dead earnest, too."

"Why, man," said Kortright, with an amused smile. "Dawson Fox hadn't been in Skendoah for years before we were married. I don't 'spose he'd seen Mattie since she was a little girl."

"That's jest what Ritner said," persisted Shields. "He said they were great cronies as boy and gal, and he'd set his heart on marryin' her before he went away to school, an' he was mightily broke down when he come back arterwards an' found matters all arranged for her to marry you."

"He did come back just before we were married," said Kortright musingly.

"Jest so, jest so," said Shields. "I thought Ritner wa'n't likely to be very far out of the way on't. He wasn't given to talking what he didn't know about."

Kortright's head dropped thoughtfully upon his breast. A new light had come into his mind. The cryptomerias that still flanked the pathway to his door; his wife's tender care of them; the fact that she had scarcely spoken of Dawson Fox, notwithstanding his own eulogies, all confirmed this story of an early attachment between them.

"I declare, Mr. Shields," said Van Wormer, with a wink toward Kortright, and a shrug of his shoulders meant as a rebuke to Shields for his indiscretion, "I believe you've made the 'Squire jealous."

"Tain't possible," said Shields in surprise, for the first time realizing that it was possible.

"Poor fellow," said Kortright, looking up and smiling gravely at their banter; "poor fellow! I know what he lost, gentlemen, and can't but think how lonesome the years would have been if I had been in his place and he in mine."

There was a tender light in his eye as he spoke, and his lips trembled even as he smiled. The knowledge of this romantic episode in her life clothed the wife of his bosom only with a tenderer reverence. How had he been blessed in her love, while this other better man, this brilliant orator, who had sought it, had been left empty-hearted in the world! The man was too brave and self-forgetful to feel a twinge of pain or have a hint of jealousy.

"We must do all the more," he continued, "to make him feel that we haven't forgotten him. That is, if he will come. I'm afraid he won't; but if he does we'll give him such a welcome as a man don't often get when he comes back to a place he hasn't been in three days since he was a boy."

"Well," said Shields sentimentally, "you know there ain't many such men as he."

"Nor many such as 'Squire Kortright," said Van Wormer with a peculiar warmth.

"Oh, of course," said Shields, with a reproachful earnestness that brought a laugh from both the others.

"Thank you, gentlemen," said Kortright; "but we are not getting on with our business. You just write the letter, Van Wormer, and we will sign it—if it suits us."

The letter was written more than once, and finally sent on its way. When Harrison Kortright met his wife, an hour afterwards, there was a soft light in his eyes and a tenderness that astonished the good woman as he put his arm about her waist and kissed her still fair lips. It was a most lover-like scene that followed, when he told her all that he had heard, and listened to its confirmation from her lips. They were old lovers, and married lovers, too, whom our modern analysts of the human heart count only worthy of sneers and jests; but it was really beautiful to the angel eyes that looked down on Paradise Bay that afternoon and saw the wife, in whom the romantic girl had never died, who had hungered all the years of her married life for the blandishments and caresses of love, cast herself into her husband's arms, kiss the pale, worn face, fondle the gray whiskers tenderly, and declare how she had been blessed above all other women in his fervent devotion. She was a silly old woman, he a weak, feeble old man, whose step still betrayed the touch of disease; yet methinks it were a prettier picture and better to look upon than if love had not been there. It certainly cannot be counted artistic in our modern sense, because there was nothing vile or degrading in it. However, that night there went out from Skendoah another missive to Dawson Fox, full of the fragrance of the girl-love of long ago, which, though it had never ripened into woman-love in the heart of Mattie Ermendorf, had never faded from the memory of Martha Kortright.

In answer to both missives Dawson Fox had said "Yes," and on the morrow he was to come, to be for two days a guest at Paradise Bay, and then to speak at the great meeting to be held in aid of "Bleeding Kansas."

THE HOUSEHOLD—VENTILATION AGAIN.

It is easy to make statements which are tacitly admitted by all, and as tacitly denied whenever practice and theory are compared. Weakened vitality we know as the immediate consequence of defective or vitiated air supply, but there is another consequence far more serious. Scrofula is likely to become fixed upon such constitutions—in milder cases as consumption, in severer ones as actual decay and destruction of bone and tissue. Even the good realized by living for hours in the open air is undone, or at least neutralized by sleeping in unventilated rooms at night. The greatest living authorities on lung diseases pronounce want of ventilation the chief cause of consumption, and more fatal than all other causes put together; and even when food, clothing and general habits are all unwholesome, free fresh air has been proved able and sufficient to counteract in great degree their evil effects.

In the country a compensating power is found in the balance ordained by Nature. The poison thrown off by us from lungs and body as carbonic acid gas is the food of all vegetation, which, absorbing it, returns us instead from every waving leaf or blade of vegetation the oxygen we must have. This same carbonic acid gas we are always told, being heavier than oxygen, sinks to the bottom of the room, and thus makes sleeping on the floor or in a very low bed—as for instance a trundle-bed—unhealthful.

The fact is, that heat lightens and expands it, and thus, being warmed in the body, it rises into the common air, and there is really more at the top than at the bottom of a room. But this gas is by no means the only cause of disease. From both lungs and skin matter is constantly thrown off and floats as germs in all foul air. And as any one long confined to close rooms shivers and shudders at any sudden current of air, taking cold at a breath, the question becomes: How shall we admit pure air yet avoid draughts? Night air is considered noxious, but what air is there to breathe at night if not night air? And as at night gas-jets or lamps are burning, their food the oxygen they love, it follows that instead of less we require a double supply.

There is but one mode of ventilation that will work always and without fail, and that is a warm-air flue, the upward heated current of which draws off all foul gases from the room. This, with an opening on the opposite side of the room for the admission of pure air, will secure the desired end. An even simpler way is to have ample openings, say from eight to twelve inches square, at the top and bottom of each room, opening into the chimney-flue. Then, even if there be only a stove in use, and not set-range or furnace, the flue can be heated by extending the stove-pipe some distance up inside the chimney, and the rising current of hot air will draw with it into the flue all the foul air in the room. This arrangement must, as has already been said, be completed by some opening for fresh air on the opposite side, a window lowered slightly from the top being better than nothing. If the stove-pipe be extended into the chimney, such extension had better be of cast-iron, as not only more durable but holding heat better than sheet-iron. If there is no fire in sleeping-rooms, then the chimney must be heated by pipes from some other fire.

"Fussy and expensive," you say. Perhaps so, but less fussy than the time and attention your sudden illness from bad air may call for, and certainly less expensive than doctors' bills. Cease to fear that night air holds some subtle poison. It is only colder and moister than day air, and an extra bed-covering does away with all danger. Once learn to sleep with open windows and it will be found that taking cold is impossible.

There are cases where long custom or extreme and most unfortunate delicacy of organization occasions great sensitiveness to cold. For such the best course is to have a board made the precise width of the window and five or six inches high. Raise the lower sash and slip this board under. An upward current of air will then pass between the two sashes and, at least in part, purify the room. Remember also that no cause for impure air must be allowed to exist. A vase of withered and forgotten flowers will poison a whole room. In cellar or closet a pile of refuse-vegetables, a decaying head of cabbage, a bone tossed aside, or a neglected garbage-box or pail, are all premiums on disease. Air and sunlight must search every corner and spotless cleanliness rule before the second essential in house and home is secured.

We have all heard the complaint from delicate women that "it takes till noon to get their strength up," and the statement holds tolerably convincing evidence that they slept in a hot and unventilated room. And we have found, too, that the child who went to bed content and rosy after a long day out of doors, often wakes up a little demon, bristling with naughtiness and determined not to be good. And for this state of things the anxious mother, who closed every crack from which air could come, is solely responsible. If life is shut out, death enters and rules, and daily habits mean life or death, both for body and soul.

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

"Can the Household editor tell us what should be the standard weight and yield of eggs for the different varieties of fowls? We have just begun keeping them."—B. F. E., Orange, N.J.

Ans.—The Country Gentleman, a paper on which one may always depend, has lately done this, and we give their figures: Light Brahmas and partridge Cochins, eggs 7 to the pound; they lay, according to treatment and keeping, from 80 to 100 per annum, oftentimes more if kept well. Dark Brahmas, 8 to the pound, and about 70 per annum. Black, white and buff Cochins, 8 to the pound; 100 is a large yield per annum. Plymouth Rocks, 8 to the pound; lay 100 per annum. Houdans, 8 to the pound; lay 150 per annum; non-sitters. La Fleche, 7 to the pound; lay 130 per annum; non-sitters. Black Spanish, 7 to the pound; lay 150 per annum. Dominiques, 9 to the pound; lay 130 per annum. Games, 9 to the pound; lay 130 per annum. Crevecoeurs, 7 to the pound; lay 150 per annum. Leghorns, 9 to the pound; lay from 150 to 200 per annum. Hamburgs, 9 to the pound; lay 170 per annum. Polish, 9 to the pound; lay 150 per annum. Bantams, 16 to the pound; lay 60 per annum. Turkeys, eggs 5 to the pound; lay from 30 to 60 per annum. Ducks, eggs vary greatly with different species, but from 5 to 6 to the pound, and from 14 to 28 per annum, according to age and keeping. Geese, 4 to the pound; lay 20 per annum. Guinea, 11 to the pound; lay 60 per annum.

HELEN CAMPBELL.

Is it too much to hope that the legislature of the great State of New York, now in the first days of its annual session, will do something toward the preservation of Niagara Falls? The Dominion of Canada stands ready to meet any reasonable proposition half-way, and, through a judicious exercise of the "right of eminent domain," secure this stupendous natural spectacle against the encroachments of the avaricious, among whom it is intended to include hack-drivers, peddlers, motive-power men and all the rest. That the average legislator will feel a lively interest in this subject is not to be expected. If the Falls are to be saved, the work must be done by a few men thoroughly imbued with a love of the sublime in nature, and willing to exert themselves in its behalf. If Niagara and its vicinity were once redeemed and placed within the lines of a state or international park, it would not be an easy matter for speculators to regain control. At present, as is well known, it is impossible to get a view of the Falls without paying a fee, and every separate and successive view necessitates an additional douceur to some one. This state of things must continue while the adjacent property remains in private hands. Of course the state would be justified in charging for admission to its grounds if that were thought desirable, but the exasperating board screens would be done away and, under the care of state officers, much of the matchless beauty of the wooded shores could be restored. The motive-power schemers are more difficult to deal with. The argument concerning the waste forces of nature and the plea that the beautiful ought never to take precedence of the useful, has an unanswerable force with probably a large majority of voters. It will not do to ignore this preponderating public opinion, but it can be influenced, and the motive-power men can probably be, in a measure, satisfied by the adoption of some scheme approved by competent engineers which shall prevent the defacement of the banks in the immediate vicinity of the Falls, but which may, by means of sluice-ways, afford opportunity for experiment and enterprise at a safe distance below. It is worse than useless for enthusiasts to speak contemptuously of those who do not value Niagara for its own sake. Let them rather hug the comforting conviction of esthetic superiority in silence, and not arouse to active opposition a power which, after all, holds the whole matter in its hands.

A SAYING of Miss Christina Rossetti to the effect that "she does not write poems—they happen to her," is going the rounds of the papers, and the usual comment thereon is an intimation that her "happenings" would be more acceptable if they were more thoroughly worked out.

Possibly too many writers offer "unthought thoughts" to the public. A fine idea is all the finer for being well presented, and the best things we have in literature are undoubtedly the results of profound labor. So much do we hear of the care and painstaking used by our best writers that it really seems as though "genius is only great patience." To be sure, there are in the annals of literature many instances of very talented persons writing rapidly and carelessly, but this we are disposed to regret. It will hardly be considered heresy to say that we could wish Mrs. Browning had given more time to the telling of her grand thoughts. Probably "Lady Geraldine's Courtship" would read more smoothly if two days, instead of one, had been spent upon it. Gray did not begrudge the time he gave to his little poems. Wasn't it twenty years he had the "Elegy" on hand? What a comfort it must have been to him when other articles were torn from him by a ruthless publisher, to have the "Elegy" to fall back upon! We can imagine him taking it out every year or so and touching it up here and there—altering a word, transposing a phrase, meditating the substitution of a new stanza for one not altogether pleasing to him. Very likely he occasionally went over to Stoke Pogis—isn't that the locality?—and prowled around there warming up his inspiration. No wonder he declined the laureateship. He knew if the royal family wanted anything done in a hurry he was not the man to do it. But his deliberate way of working produced poems perfect in design and execution. However, if every one worked in the same way it would be slow for the publishers, and the critics' occupation would be gone entirely, for what could the reviews do with faultless productions?

One sometimes speculates about our gems of literature, wondering what were the processes through which they passed before attaining their present forms, and did their authors have much trouble with them? Did Shakspeare have to search for rhyming words in writing his little songs?—his "Come unto these yellow sands," or "When daffodils begin to peer." Did Milton find it hard to get all his "Gorgons and hydras and chimeras dire," his cherubs, seraphs and demi-gods in their places? Did Irving, Hawthorne, Goldsmith, Macaulay alter, re-arrange and work hard over all those limpid or sparkling sentences that seem as if they had just run off the point of the pen without an effort on the part of any one?

We can hardly define the charm certain writings have for us. The books we read and re-read are those which fascinate us by their style rather than by the substance of their contents. Is it because we are particularly interested in the old-fashioned plays and actors of London, the defunct South-Sea House, the old benches of the Inner Temple, the modern art of eighty or ninety years ago that we read Lamb? Should we not read him if he had talked in the same charming way about anything else? Yet what a perfect enjoyment and delight it is when some masterly pen deals with a really important subject! What a matter of felicitation when one of these dear, brilliant, rich-toned writers enters the field of history or of science! There are, in these latter days particularly, instances of recondite subjects being popularized by writers of this description. It may be difficult to decide how far a clear yet glowing and picturesque style is "natural," and how much is the result of severe study; but no matter what the natural gifts may be, it will harm no writer to adopt and act upon the advice which Longfellow is said to have frequently given—"Always write your very best."

MR. JULIAN HAWTHORNE'S novel will end in the next number of THE CONTINENT. Those who have followed the fortunes of the gifted Philip, the lovely Marion, the crabbed yet kindly Lady Flanders, and the beautiful, heartless Perdita, will admit that Mr. Hawthorne has never given the world a story more complete than this in all the elements of romance. The closing chapters have been especially strong in character-drawing, and the manifest destiny of each person in the drama is worked out with a skill that powerfully reminds the reader of the elder Hawthorne. "Dust" will be promptly issued in book form as one of "Our Continent Library." In this shape it is destined to enjoy a wide-spread popularity.

THE excitement over Mr. Howells' Thackeray-Dickens criticism continues unabated in England, and the Athenæum comes to his defense, a recent note saying: "Mr. W. D. Howells, who is writing his new novel in a retired place in Switzerland, has known nothing of the animated discussion which his remarks in the November number of The Century magazine have called forth from the English press. He writes to a friend who has called his attention to the subject that he has not even seen the magazine himself, and cannot recollect what he said about Dickens and Thackeray. But he is sure that he has been misprinted or misunderstood if he seems to be disrespectful to those great writers. 'I always thought myself,' he says, 'quite unapproached in my appreciation of the great qualities of Dickens and Thackeray, and I can hardly believe that I have "arraigned" them. I suspect that no Englishman could rate them higher than I do.' The eminent novelist goes on to say that he only waits to see The Century magazine and 'what my offense in it against the great shades amounts to,' to write further on the subject, and he is now determined on the earliest opportunity to carry out a design which has long been in his thoughts, namely, 'to say my say about the art of Dickens and Thackeray in full.' Next to a new novel from the pen of Mr. Howells, no contribution of his to literature would be more welcome than such a study."

It will probably be news to most of our readers that American literature finds an Italian audience. In a recent number of The Critic, however, Mr. G. S. Godkin declares that the death of no foreign author, with the sole exception of Mrs. Browning, has ever been so generally lamented by the Italian people as that of Mr. Longfellow. "There is no educated Italian who has not read 'Evangeline' with emotion; and I have been told by a distinguished writer that 'Excelsior' has been rendered into Italian in almost a hundred different forms." As reflecting the opinion of the most cultivated Italians on the subject of American literature, Mr. Godkin translates the following passage from an article on Walt Whitman in the Fanfulla della Domenica: "America has a noble file of good writers, elegant poets, lively humorists, very able critics and historians. But even to the most noteworthy, as Emerson, Poe, Bryant, Lowell, Prescott, Longfellow, Hawthorne, Bret Harte, there is wanting something necessary to make them rank with the first order of indisputable geniuses. Not Poe, with his instinctive feeling for form, the delicacy of his touch, the originality of his intense and painful visions; nor Hawthorne, with the wonderful perfection of his prose, with his profound sounding of the depths of the human heart, with his exquisite artistic taste, with his fine pessimistic humor; nor Longfellow—the happy Longfellow—with all his morality and popularity and his legendary Germanic sentimentalism; nor any other of the most celebrated Americans, can compare for harmony and power of intellect with the greatest English contemporaries. America has neither a critic like Carlyle, nor a romancist to be compared to Dickens, Thackeray or George Eliot; nor a poet that approaches Tennyson, Robert Browning or Swinburne. Almost every great nation has one poet who may be called its incarnate expression—its voice. America, up to the present, has not a voice worthy of her. But she will have it—and it will astonish old Europe." We reprint this paragraph more as a curiosity than otherwise, and recall, with some amusement, Mr. Hamerton's experiences in testing the judgment of educated foreigners regarding some of Tennyson's most exquisitely musical verses. And, by the way, let those of us who profess a familiarity with foreign tongues cherish a wise humility when we are away from home, in venturing upon literary criticism in the presence of natives.

IT is a coincidence that two of the most indefatigable workers in the historical field should be Bancrofts, and certainly the younger man is earning a distinction hardly inferior to that of the elder. For twenty-five years Hubert Howe Bancroft has labored at a task which bids fair to stand as one of the literary achievements of the nineteenth century. Owning one of the finest and most valuable libraries on the Pacific coast, he has had exceptional facilities for work, and the bulky volumes of his "Native Races of the Pacific States" are in evidence as to his industry. The present volume¹ has all the characteristics that made the earlier ones so welcome. Mr. Bancroft's enthusiasm is equal to his scholarship, and both are fully tested by the enormous task to which his life is devoted.

The work began with the collection of thirty-five thousand volumes, and California may boast the distinction of owning more priceless material for history than any country on the globe. Manuscript records from pioneer settlers and from the Spanish missionaries and adventurers of the sixteenth century, together with mission archives, are specially abundant; the collection made by the unhappy Maximilian as the foundation for a library; Mr. E. G. Squiers' manuscripts, purchases from the Andrade sale, all go to make up a unique collection. The library cost $300,000, and over $200,000 has been spent in preparing catalogues, indexes and every device for making all portions available for literary purposes, while numerous assistants are employed, the methods being given in a little pamphlet distributed with the book. Each one sends to Mr. Bancroft every note or memorandum made, "so that what ten or a hundred authors have said on each individual topic and incident may be brought before him at one time." How to keep these notes was a problem, and after many methods had been tried and found wanting, the very unusual one of storing all in paper bags proved to be the most practicable.

Five volumes of the work were published in 1875, giving Mr. Bancroft at once a distinguished rank as an investigator, "The Native Races of the Pacific States," being a detailed and elaborate account of a vanished civilization, the story of which was almost a revelation. That he is a little inclined to judge the sixteenth by a nineteenth century standard, makes him at times unreasonable, but his presentation of facts is wonderfully picturesque, and his research far more patient and minute than anything Irving has attempted in the same direction. Mr. Bancroft's philosophical bias is very strong, and he indulges it at length, the pages being always interesting, but as certainly not essential to the progress of the narrative; in fact a decided hindrance. Much of the ground covered in this volume has already been traversed by Irving in his story of the adventures of the companions of Columbus, but Mr. Bancroft has had access to material altogether unknown to the first writer, and his many footnotes give reference to these authorities or supply illustrative details. Many curious maps are given, copied from ancient books, and the vivid narrative flows on with astonishing ease and power. Telling extracts could be made almost at random. There is not a dull page in the book, and though compression would have benefitted it, it would be an ungracious and on the whole unnecessary task to cut out any passages in the brilliant chapters.

LITERARY exiles in England, who almost all come under the head of political revolutionists, are to have a book written about them by Mr. H. Van Laun.

A NEW novel from Ebers will attract attention. This has just been published in Germany under the title of "Ein Wort," the hero being a banished German, and the sixteenth century the time chosen.

A VERY useful and carefully prepared hand-book comes from D. Appleton & Co., New York, "The Hand-book of American Winter Resorts," its maps and illustrations being well made and the whole invaluable to tourists. (50 cents, pp. 138).

AN important and interesting contribution to the study of the Bible is announced by J. W. Bouton, New York, in "Bible Myths and Their Parallels in Other Religions." The book is profusely illustrated, the work being of the excellence which characterizes this firm.

A "BRYANT BIRTHDAY BOOK," has been arranged by Janet E. Ruutz Rees, and published by D. Appleton & Co. Three selections are given on each page, and the red edges and cover, with its spray of holly berries, make it especially suitable for the Christmas season. (16mo, $1.00).

THE MAGAZINE OF ART, published by Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co., is one of the most beautiful and reasonable in price of all the art journals, the subscription being but $3.50 per annum, and the volume for 1883 promises even more than the past has held, one of its many features being a set of illustrated articles on "Famous Artists of Our Time."

A VERY charming little story, just long enough to beguile an idle half hour, is found in "A Whimsical Wooing," by Anton Giulio Barrili. From the Italian, by Clara Bell. The "wooing" is an accident, and the whole story is full of sparkle, its happy ending being foreseen from the beginning. (16mo, pp. 88, 50 cents; William S. Gottsberger, publisher, New York).

MR. TENNYSON'S "Promise of May," for which he received $5000, is pronounced unanimously by English critics to be one of the dreariest masses of nonsense ever put before a long-suffering public. The poet's reputation will live in spite of his own assaults upon it, but it is unfortunate that he cannot be prevented from printing what has no claim whatever on public interest.

R. WORTHINGTON & Co. have just issued two notable books; one, "The Legendary History of Rome," translated from the text of Livy, by Professor George Baker and illustrated with one hundred and sixty engravings from antique statuary and the best historical painting. The other, the "Lives of the Twelve Cæsars," translated by Dr. Alexander Thomson, and illustrated with twenty-four portraits on steel from authentic sources.

AMONG the smaller illustrated books of the season is "Lady Helen Clyde, A Romaunt," by Abram Lent Smith. The verses if not powerful are smooth and graceful, and the story far better told in words than in the rather second-rate illustrations. "The Deserted Village" is also issued in the same form and at the same price by Porter & Coates, the illustrations by the well-known Hammatt Billings, whose work here falls below its usual standard of excellence, though it is in any case slightly old-fashioned. (Square 16mo, pp. 42, $1.50; Charles Dillingham, New York).

MR. EUGENE BENSON has already made himself known as a delicate and appreciative art critic, and thus necessarily a keen observer, and in "Art and Nature in Italy" he gives a record of Italian days, holding all the best qualities of his previous work. It is an old story he has to tell, but each new pilgrim means a new presentation, for them if not for us, though in this case we see familiar objects under a new light, and have a record which is of real and permanent value. (16mo, pp. 188, $1.00; Roberts Bros., Boston).

THE beautiful little "Parchment Series," inaugurated by D. Appleton & Co., opens with a volume entitled "Eighteenth Century Essays." Selected and annotated by Austin Dobson. Mr. Dobson's own work harmonizes well with his selections and he shows himself an especially careful and appreciative editor of the charming selections, chiefly from the "Spectator" with a sprinkling from other sources. The same form is to be given to Shakespeare's works, which will be issued in twelve volumes, one a month, the first one containing four carefully edited plays. (16mo, pp. 284, $1.25).

HISTORY and romance sometimes blend successfully, but a peculiar talent is required to make the mixture palatable. "Aubert Dubayet; or, the Two Sister Republics," by Charles Gayarré, though a tolerably clear picture of the time, and filled with many details unfamiliar to the average historical reader, is in no sense a novel, the thread of romance wearing thin in the early chapters and ceasing altogether long before the end is reached. Dubayet had active part in our Revolution and with the fortunes also of the French Republic, and the book introduces most of the chief actors in both dramas; but it is all heavy business, and the reader welcomes the final scene and wants no repetition. (12mo, pp. 479, $1.50; James R. Osgood & Co., Boston).

A WELL-WRITTEN and valuable book for young people is found in "Stories from the Greek Tragedies," by the Rev. Alfred J. Church, M. A., the stories including many already treated by the poet William Morris in his "Earthly Paradise." The present version is, in many cases, almost literal translation, and the whole has the form of an old chronicle, the quaint speech giving it an added charm. Twenty illustrations from Flaxman and others are in entire harmony with the text, and though fathers and mothers may object to any early introduction to the sad old stories, Mr. Church, who is "Head Master of King Edward's School, Retford," has eliminated all the most objectionable qualities, and left only what will serve as a good introduction to Greek literature. (12mo, pp. 257, $1.50; Dodd, Mead & Co.).

A NEW critic has arisen, whose interpretation of Hamlet marks a new method in this well-tilled field. It is Herr Dietrich, a German scholar, who wishes to be heard, and who has written a book, described by an American critic as both unique and amazing. He contends that Hamlet can be understood only if he is regarded as "the constable of Providence," the meaning of the word "hamlet" being, Herr Dietrich says, "upper constable." In this treatise Herr Dietrich devotes much attention to Ophelia, of whom he has a very poor opinion. Critics have hitherto admitted that Ophelia has amiable qualities, whatever theories they may have formed as to her relation to Hamlet; but her conduct outrages the moral sentiment of Herr Dietrich, who denounces her as "an empty, cold, heartless puppet." He is particularly indignant at the manner in which she receives Hamlet's "equivocal observations." She affects ignorance of his meaning, we are told, in order to induce Hamlet to give still more decided expression to his "equivocal" humor. This terrible critic will not even grant that Ophelia is the daughter of Polonius, for he points out that Polonius, in saying to the King and Queen "I have a daughter," adds, "have while she is mine."

AMONG the attractive publications issued and announced by R. Worthington & Co., of New York, the following are worthy of special attention: "The Handy Illustrated Edition of Shakespeare," in eight volumes, with illustrations from Selous; "Modern Etchings from Celebrated Paintings," "Studies in French Art," "Great American Sculptures," "Lotus Leaves," new editions of "Laurel Leaves" and "Papyrus Leaves," and Mr. Boker's "Point Lace and Diamonds," with illustrations by Addie Ledyard. The same house adds to its already large list of juveniles "Around the House," "Picturesque Journeys in America," "Chatterbox Junior," and "Sunday Chatterbox" and "The New Quartette."

MR. SIMON STERN, of the New York bar, has written a very straightforward and unpretentious book entitled "Constitutional History and Political Development of the United States." Though many books have been written on this topic, most of them are too abstruse for popular reading, and thus there is room for such work as the present. Though Mr. Stern fails in one or two points, as a whole no better hand-book on this subject has been made, and it deserves place on every book-shelf, our knowledge of the Constitution and its bearings being very curiously deficient, people even having been heard to state that they supposed it and the Declaration of Independence to be one and the same. (12mo, pp. 323, $1.50; Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co., New York).

"THE GOLDEN FLORAL," lately issued by Lee & Shepard, would seem to consist of Christmas cards fringed and decorated, but examination shows them to be the popular poems: "Nearer, My God, to Thee," by Sarah Flower Adams; "Home, Sweet Home," by John Howard Payne; "Ring Out, Wild Bells," by Alfred Tennyson; "He Giveth His Beloved Sleep," by Elizabeth Barrett Browning; "Abide With Me," by Henry Frances Lyte; "Rock of Ages," by Augustus Montague Toplady; "The Breaking Waves Dashed High," by Felicia Hemans, and "Oh, Why Should the Spirit of Mortal be Proud?" by William Knox. These are beautifully illustrated by Miss Humphrey. Any one of them makes a most charming compromise between a card and an illustrated book. The idea is a new one, and likely to meet the popularity it deserves.

A GENERATION has passed since Dr. N. L. Frothingham, in a volume of translations from the German, first introduced American readers to some of Rückert's smaller poems. The present volume, "The Wisdom of the Brahmin: A Didactic Poem," translated from the German of Friedrich Rückert by Charles T. Brooks, Books I-VI, is in the line of thought made familiar to us in many ways during later years, most recently in "The Light of Asia," and is really a series of epigrams in twelve-syllable, iambic rhymes. The author was long Professor of Oriental Literature, and both by nature and culture so penetrated with the oriental spirit that he is practically a Western Brahmin. Among Germans he ranks as one of their greatest and purest poets, his personal life and character having been singularly beautiful, and Mr. Brooks, who is one of our most able and sympathetic translators, and himself possesses much poetical power, has made a translation which has much of the charm of the original. ($1.25, pp. 252; Roberts Bros., Boston).

THE novel with a purpose has become one of the facts of the day, and every question of the day is finding place in fiction. As a rule, the subject is either dwarfed or exaggerated, the latter being most often the case. The lights are so high that one is dazzled and loses all sense of any feature save glare, or the shadows are so deep that discernment is equally impossible. Mr. Byron A. Brooks, in "Those Children and Their Teachers, a Story of To-Day," has fallen into the same error. Unquestionably the public school system needs arraignment, and Mr. Brooks' facts cannot be denied by any one who has followed the course of events, especially in our great cities; but they are put in a form which in itself challenges criticism, the story having no power to hold them clearly before the reader's mind, and leaving only an uncomfortable sense of over-worked children, and of a set of relatives who, if bad English is any test, need a new school as much as their juniors. There are touches of genuine humor, and now and then indignation, so honestly and ringingly put, that one wishes the same tone might continue; but the book is not one to accomplish its desired effect. ($1.00, pp. 272; G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York).

IT is a misfortune that the quaint framing of the pages reproduced from "A Book of Christian Prayers," usually called "Queen Elizabeth's Prayer-Book," and printed by John Day, in 1569, should be the only real attraction in the daintily-made volume entitled, "The Wife's Manual; or, Prayers, Thoughts and Songs on Several Occasions of a Matron's Life." By the Rev. W. Calvert. ($2.25, pp. 102; Roberts Bros., Boston). The feeling of the verses cannot be questioned, and there is often genuine religious fervor, but, as a whole, there is a priggish and ponderous element, and the temptation is strong to say, "Such would have been the verses addressed by the immortal Mr. Barlow to the partner of his joys and sorrows," and vice versa. This partner is so sweetly subdued and receptive—the husband of whom she sings is so superior a creature—that one is surprised he allowed her to repeat the little lesson he had set, and the desire to be suitably decorous in the listening fades away before the solemn absurdity, which is all the American mind is able to see. It is all true, all eminently proper—but so is Tupper. Buy the book for its beauty and quaintness, but carefully cover the verses with something better worth such setting.

In a recent number of the Gardeners' Chronicle mention is made of some preliminary experiments to ascertain the effects of different conditions on the latent vitality of seeds. Several packets of seeds were, in January, 1880, divided into three equal parts; one portion exposed to the free air, but screened from dust; another inclosed in air, being tightly corked up in a tube; the third placed in pure carbonic acid. At the end of two years the seeds were taken out, weighed and sown. All those which had been exposed to free air had gained in weight; for instance, beans had gained 1.50 and peas about 1.72 of their original weight. The seeds confined in closed air had gained a little, peas 1.790 and beans 1.1190. The seeds confined in carbonic acid gas hardly at all varied from their original weight. As to comparative germination, of Peas kept in free air, . . .	90 per cent germinated.

" " " closed air, . . .	45 " " "
" " " carbonic acid, . . .	none.
Beans kept in free air, . . .	98 per cent germinated.
" " " closed air, . . .	2 " " "
" " " carbonic acid, . . .	none.

If the full course of experiments give such results, it will be made clear, first, that the vegetable embryo in the seed is not, strictly speaking, latent, but is doing some work, however little, and is keeping up a respiration, which is essential to its continued life; second, that the life of seeds cannot be indefinitely prolonged. Very old seeds exposed to the air must be dead from exhaustion, and those deeply buried by suffocation, and the numerous recorded cases of the germination of ancient seeds are more and more to be distrusted.

In 1763 the only public conveyance for passengers between London and Edinburgh was a single coach, which completed its journey in fourteen days, or at the rate of one mile and a quarter per hour. Strange as it may appear, there are at the present time many large fertile districts in Hungary, where, owing to the absence of both road and water communications, a higher rate of speed cannot be attained in a journey of seven days' duration. An essential condition of the attainment of high speed on the railway is that the stopping-places be few and far between. The Great Northern express (London & Edinburgh) makes its first halt at Grantham, a distance of one hundred and five miles from London, and consequently but little power and time are lost in accelerating and retarding the speed of the train. In the instance of the Metropolitan Railway, on the other hand, the stations average but half a mile apart, and although the engines are as powerful as those on the Great Northern Railway, whilst the trains are far lighter, the average speed attainable is only some twelve miles an hour. No sooner has a train acquired a reasonable speed than the brakes have to be sharply applied to pull it up again. As a result of experiment and calculation it is found that sixty per cent of the whole power exerted by the engine is absorbed by the brakes. In other words, with the consumption of thirty pounds of coal per train mile, no less than eighteen pounds are expended in grinding away the brake blocks, and only the remaining twelve pounds in doing the useful work of overcoming frictional and atmospheric resistances.

ENGLAND is the principal coal-tar producing country of the world. The distillation of coal-tar, as the starting point in the manufacture of the aniline colors, has indeed become one of the most important chemical industries. It is a very singular fact that while England is the principal producer of the crude material and also the chief consumer of the dyes produced therefrom, nevertheless she does not manufacture these beautiful colors. Although Faraday first discovered benzine, and Mansfield gave his life in showing us how to isolate that substance on the large scale, and although Perkin led the way to the discovery of aniline purple—the first coal-tar color—nevertheless the manufacture of the so-called coal-tar dyes has mainly centred in Germany. The absurd spectacle is therefore presented of English people sending the crude materials abroad to be worked up by German chemists, who return to them the greater part of the finished product for a handsome consideration. Furthermore, many of the chemicals needful for this delicate transformation are sent from England along with the tar. In fact, England plays the part of a hewer of wood and a drawer of water for Germany in this matter, and, in addition, becomes her most profitable customer. This interesting fact in political economy should be commended to the attention of the Royal Commissioners, who are to report soon on the progress of technical education in England. The cause of this is not far to seek—it lies in the wise fostering encouragement of scientific research in the universities of Germany and the neglect of it in those of England.

In a paper read before the late Scientific Association at Montreal, the writer states that he recently had the opportunity of watching in a "live box," under a low power of the microscope, the seizing and devouring of some plant-louse by the larva of an undetermined species of chrysopa, and was interested in the manner in which it emptied the body of its victims. The jaws are large, hooked, pointed and tubular, with a small opening at or near the points. Approaching its prey, the body of the aphid is grasped by the hooked mandibles, which, at the same time, pierce it. The chrysopa larva remains stationary, and proceeds to pump its victim dry. At the base of each of the mandibles the integuments are dilated into a sac-like form, capable of expansion and compression at will; a portion of the thorax is similarly constructed, and it is by the repeated dilating and compressing of these sacs that the fluid contents of the body of the aphid are transferred through the tubular mandibles to the stomach of the chrysopa larva. When the abdomen of the aphid has been emptied the points of the mandibles of the chrysopa larva are thrust in the thorax and forward into the head in every direction, and in a few moments nothing remains of the once plump plant-louse but a shriveled skin.

AN English traveler in India has lately sent home a very unique photograph. Being in the neighborhood of Kurachee he paused to secure a view of a magnificent group of tropical trees on the river bank, by means of the camera which he carried for such purposes. He fixed his tripod, placed his head under the velvet screen to adjust the focus of his lens, when suddenly a huge crocodile lifted his head above the water and made his way to the shore. Another followed, and still another; then a whole herd clambered up the bank. Instead of taking suddenly to flight, our traveler stood still surveying the advancing army through his lens, and soon was happy, for a double reason, to see the ungainly monsters sprawl themselves, with mouths agape, for their siesta in the warm sunshine. What a happy accident! Our artist kept his nerves steady, the "dry plate" was slipped into its place, and in a twinkling the photograph was taken of the group of twenty unconscious reptiles.

TYPHOONS do not occur during the prevalence of the northeast monsoon, from November to May. In 1881 the typhoon season extended from May 22 to November 29. In Japan the true typhoon season is restricted to August and September, the storms there during the other months resembling rather the ordinary cyclones of temperate regions. The tracks of the typhoons during the months of moderate temperature—May, June, the latter half of September, October and November—are the most southerly. They lie flattest on the parallels of latitude, and present a great concavity looking eastward; but those of the warmer months—July, August and the beginning of September—exhibit, on the other hand, very open curves. This seasonal difference in the form of the tracks, taken in connection with the general form of the recurring tracks of the West Indian hurricanes, which are less open than those of the Chinese seas, suggests a possible connection between the forms of these curves and the different distributions of atmospheric pressure prevailing over the continents at the time.

ONE of the bold and remarkable works of the day is the submarine sewer at Boston, to carry the sewage under an arm of the harbor and across an island far to seaward. They have discovered what unfortunately many others have not, that little is gained by emptying sewage into a harbor or into a small river, and so transferring the nuisance from one point to another or distributing it all over.

BUSINESS and population depend on geology. A geological map of England enables one to locate its occupations and the denser populations. An outcrop of gneiss, extending southwest from New York, forms the limit of trade in the rivers, and fixes the location of Trenton, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore, Georgetown, Richmond and other cities to the southwest.

THE DRAMA.

UPON the close of Mr. Charles Wyndham's very successful engagement at the Union Square Theatre, New York, he appeared before the curtain in response to an enthusiastic "call" and very happily said: "It is against my rule to appear before the curtain and dissociate myself from the colleagues who have contributed so much to the success of the engagement; but I break through my custom in obedience to your kind call, and take this opportunity to thank you for your generous reception of us during our short stay. It is rather late, and, as you may perceive, I am somewhat out of breath, so I will content myself with assuring you, in the words of Bob Sackett (his character in the play of "Brighton"), that the more and more I see of you the more and more I love you." Mr. Wyndham and his company have met with the same success during their Western trip as in New York.

FOR the recent performance of Victor Hugo's "Le Roi s'Amuse," at the Theatre Française, there were over 4300 applications for places. The seating capacity of the theatre is only 1800.

MISS EFFIE ELLSLER, the original "Hazel Kirke," severs her connection with the Madison Square Theatre, at the close of the present season. She will then "star."

MR. FLORENCE has one of the most valuable theatrical libraries in the country.

THE late production of "The Poor Gentleman" at the Arch Street Theatre, Philadelphia, by Mr. Joseph Jefferson and company, was a rare treat. As "Dr. Ollapod," Mr. Jefferson was delightfully humorous, the actor and his art being entirely forgotten in the extreme naturalness of the portrayal—the scenes with Mrs. Drew as the "Hon. Miss Lucretia McTab," developed the full possibilities of high comedy. The supporting cast were notably excellent, the work of Messrs. Robinson, Waverly and Ringgold and Miss Wood being especially commendable. The play was handsomely set, the audience was of the highest class, very large in number and highly appreciative, and in its entirety the occasion was one to be remembered with great pleasure and satisfaction. Mr. Jefferson had not appeared as "Dr. Ollapod" for twenty years.

MR. JOAQUIN MILLER'S rustic drama of "'49," improved and revised by Mr. Leonard Grover, has been successfully presented by Mr. and Mrs. McKee Rankin during the past year. It forms the holiday attraction at the Arch Street Theatre, Philadelphia.

A LATE Saturday in New York was a remarkable one for its attractions and their enormous money returns. Mme. Patti's matinee of "Traviata," at the Academy of Music, netted over $10,000. The afternoon performance of Mme. Nilsson, at Steinway Hall, secured $6000, and the two performances of Mrs. Langtry, at Wallack's, added more than $4000 to the receipts of her prosperous engagement.

THE "Passion Play," in spite of the protests of the public and the condemnation of theatrical managers, will soon be presented in New York. The "Nazarene" is to be impersonated by a Mr. W. M. Wannemacher, of Philadelphia, who studied for the ministry, but gave it up and became a temperance lecturer. No professional actor will take part.

THE first theatre in America to adopt the electric light is the Bijou Theatre, Boston. The Edison incandescent light is the one chosen, and it will be used for all the purposes of illumination. Six hundred sixteen-candle power lamps are contracted for, of which three hundred and fifty will be used in the chandelier of the dome alone. There will be no footlights; but, as a substitute, an arch of one hundred and eighty lamps will be placed immediately behind the proscenium arch. This system of illumination has proved quite satisfactory at the Savoy Theatre, London.

THE CORRECT THING FOR NEW YEAR'S DAY.

FULL evening dress is the ticket, and the earlier you begin to make your calls the more your taste in dress will be noticed if you adopt the following rules :

ATTENTION! COMPANY!

Wear a big, colored stone of some sort in the middle of your shirt-front.

A very stiff stand-up collar is best, as it prevents you from forgetting to wear your elbows at the fashionable side-angle.

The collar should be of linen. Cuffs may be paper or celluloid, provided the buttons are very large.

White choker, crush-hat, pink gloves, patent-leather Oxfords and black silk stockings complete the costume.

If you are a politician, and wish to conciliate the Irish vote, carry a green silk handkerchief. Otherwise red silk will do.

BY PLATOON—SALUTE!

No overcoat is allowable under any circumstances, no matter how cold the weather may be.

You must have a carriage, of course. The kind most generally used are four-wheelers, with seats for ten on a side; driver in front and footman behind.

The code of bell-signals as agreed upon by the best society everywhere is of great importance.

An eligible young man of moderate means, who has never been married, should pull the bell three times andante con moto. If very rich and correspondingly more eligible, he may pull fortissimo as many times as he likes.

FALL IN FOR RATIONS!

Old bachelors and widowers are entitled to four pulls as hard as they can drive.

A married man with his encumbrances still in this world, pulls once pianissimo, and goes promptly away if the door is not opened immediately.

Send up a full deck of cards, for the lady may have friends receiving with her, and they will want one apiece, in addition to the usual chromos.

Have something fresh to say when you greet your hostess on entering the room. "Hope I see you well," is entirely new, very original and extremely elegant. Repeat it on being introduced to the other ladies.

If your hostess simply bows without extending her hand, you are to insist on shaking hands with her.

A graceful bow is very easy if you have the confidence which will naturally result from being dressed as prescribed above. For first, second and third positions of a perfect bow, see figures 1, 2 and 5.

It is very important to keep the backs of your hands turned to the front, and to bend your elbows outward. Heels together, toes well turned out.

If you sit down, place yourself on the extreme edge of the chair and hold your hat with both hands between your knees.

Should you secure a tête-à-tête with one of the ladies prolong it as much as possible, especially if other callers are coming and going in rapid succession. Ladies greatly enjoy being monopolized by one man at such times, if he happens to be the right one, which you will assume to be the case with you.

PARADE DISMISSED!

If refreshments are offered, eat and drink all you can get. It is considered a mark of refinement.

In taking your leave shake hands all round again, especially if the ladies assume a somewhat distant or repellent air. They merely want to test your good breeding and self-possession.

Walk backwards in leaving the room. It is very "swell," but not absolutely necessary to go down the front steps in the same manner.

Follow these directions implicitly, and society will long remember you.

PETOSKEY FROM THE BLUFFS.

PETOSKEY AND THE "GEM OF THE STRAITS."

THE coat-of-arms of an important northwestern state bears this inscription: "SI QUÆRIS PENINSULAM AMENAM CIRCUMSPICE" ("If you seek a beautiful peninsula look around you"). Glancing over the luxuriant wheat-fields, vineyards and orchards, the stately cities and clustering villages that lie between Detroit and St. Joseph, the pleased observer involuntarily echoes the proud sentiment of the seal. If, however, he is an enthusiast for nature in her wilder moods, his delight will reach its maximum only when he has traversed the length of the main peninsula of Michigan and reached its northern limits.

Ten years ago the region around Grand Traverse Bay was generally regarded as one of the ends of the earth, a veritable "no man's land." The little trading-posts and missions on its borders were inhabited mainly by Indians, and were accessible by land only from the south, and in that direction separated from civilization by hundreds of miles of dense forest. Occasionally a party of hunters or land-viewers would push through, with camp equipments and Indian guides, and return filled with enthusiasm over the fair country they had explored far to the north, where the dreary grandeur of the pine forest gave place to a luxuriant growth of hard-wood trees and blossomy fruit-bearing shrubs and vines. At length one day a first locomotive made its way between walls of tree trunks, sending up its plumes of smoke and vapor through the scented air, and awakening the wild echoes with its shrill whistle. It reached Little Traverse Bay at a point where an aged Indian and his numerous descendants had their encampment. The town which sprang up at the terminus of the railroad was named Petoskey, after the old chief from whom its site was purchased.¹ That was eight years ago; now it has a permanent population of over two thousand, and a floating population in the summer months that no man can number—at least no man with whom I have as yet talked has been able to make more than an approximate calculation. It is, without doubt, the favorite summer resort of the denizens of southern and western cities, the most popular watering-place in the West. Besides the two large hotels near the depot, whose combined capacity will accommodate four hundred guests, there are sixteen smaller hotels, with boarding-houses and restaurants at every turn, while private families have been constrained to let rooms and take boarders, yielding to the pressure of the continual and insistent demand for accommodations.

One great attraction of this new resort is, of course, the air, which is very pure and almost always cool and bracing. This softly-tempered, balmy air, coming over long reaches of sunlit water, tones and invigorates the invalid, while it seldom chills him. It fills the chest with a sense of freshness and freedom, and touches the cheek with the tenderness of a caress.

(1) Within the last few weeks the railroad has been completed from Petoskey to old Fort Mackinac.

The village is situated on the south side of Little Traverse Bay, on the gradual slope of a hill whose summit is a mile or more distant from the shore. It has a water front of a mile and a half, studded with piers, boat-houses and lapidaries, where the "corals" and agates which visitors pick up in great numbers on the beach may be cut and polished. Following the carriage road running westward around the bay, beauty and freshness greet the senses continually. The smooth, pebbly beach is always alive with strollers; some looking for rare and curious stones; others enjoying the breeze and idly watching the crossing steamers, or a schooner standing far out in the open lake, or the smaller craft of oar and sail-boats that flit about the bay. Children shout and laugh as they wade the glittering shallows and sail their that can be desired. The water supply is from a strong, cold spring which heads from an eminence called Mount Pisgah, and being conducted to the doors of the cottages in pipes, pours forth its wealth of freshness unfliningly. There are now nearly two hundred cottages at Bay View, a chapel for religious services and a hotel. This pretty highland hamlet is a little more than a mile from Petoskey, on the line of the tram-railway running thence to Crooked Lake. It has a steamboat landing, a depot and telegraph office.

Waquetonsing, otherwise known as the Presbyterian Resort, is also under the control of an association. It is newer and not quite so highly improved, but its natural advantages are held to be fully equal to those of its Methodist sister. Harbor Point is a cluster of tasteful cottages on a tongue of woodland which forms the northwestern limit of the bay. It is the property of a company of gentlemen from Lansing, who have here their summer homes. Each of these associations leases building lots at reasonable figures to approved tenants.

mimic fleets. To the left stretch the wooded bluffs. Here a spring gushes out of the hillside and trickles away to the lake. Yonder is an Indian burying ground rudely enclosed, the graves marked with wooden crosses decorated with wreaths of artificial flowers and streamers of bright-colored silk or calico, which flutter and fade in the wind and rain. Near the road stands a commodious sanitarium, or hotel for invalids, its wide balconies and swinging hammocks looking hospitable and inviting; while all along, at short intervals, charming little summer cottages built on terraces in the bluff, look down from their embowering trees.

A summer at Petoskey naturally implies frequent excursions to the neighboring resorts of Bay View, Waquetonsing, Harbor Springs and Harbor Point. Two small steamers, the Lady Washington and the North Star, leave the dock at Petoskey, alternately, every hour, and swing around the circle of the little bay, a distance of ten miles, touching at each of the above-named points. Bay View is the great Methodist camp-meeting ground. The site, comprising three hundred and sixty acres, was purchased five years ago by the State Camp-Meeting Association, and is rapidly becoming one of the loveliest spots on earth. The prospect, the timber and the surface conformation, are simply all

By no means all who own cottages at these resorts are wealthy, but all that wealth and culture of the truest type can do, to make a perfect society, may be found. What the Thousand Islands are to the East, these picturesque and perfectly healthful resorts around Little Traverse Bay are fast becoming to the West.

Harbor Springs lies midway between the Point and Waquetonsing, and directly opposite Petoskey, the bay at this point being about four miles wide. It is the old town of Little Traverse; the oldest settlement on the bay and one of the oldest in the state. The name, "Harbor Springs," is a recent gift to the village, and one for which its citizens, I opine, have slight cause to be thankful.

There is an antiquated Catholic church at Little Traverse which strangers always visit. If the Belgian priest who ministers there in sacred things should happen to be absent, go to Margaret Boyd at her house a few rods distant. She will unlock the church for your inspection, give you the history of the mission, and recite the weird Indian legends with which the lovely harbor is fraught.

"Aunt Margaret," as she is familiarly called, is a woman with a history. She is an Ottawa Indian, born at Little Traverse nearly seventy years ago. She looks ten years younger. She claims to be the daughter of a right royal line of Ottawa chiefs, and her patrician origin is evidenced by the carriage of her head, the flash of her eye and the beautiful smallness of her hands and feet. When she was nine years old the missionaries took her from her wild northern home to Cincinnati, and placed her in a convent school, where she remained five years. She is fairly well educated, has read a good deal and speaks English perfectly. Her influence over the Indians of the district is almost unbounded; and her work for the church, in the way of making translations of its books into the Ottawa language, has been very important. Her sympathies are entirely with her people. Their degradation humiliates her; while over the wrongs they continue to suffer at the white man's hands she is full of indignation. In the autumn of 1876 she made a journey to Washington in the interest of a number of Indian families who had purchased a tract of government land in Cheboygan, and had failed to receive their deeds. She had an interview with the President, who, she says, listened to her with the utmost courtesy, and assured her that everything should be made right. After their business talk was concluded, President Grant took her on his arm, and conducting her into another apartment, introduced her to his wife and several other ladies, stumbling a little over her long Indian name, which we will not attempt to reproduce in English letters.

The church at Little Traverse was founded by Père Jacques Marquette, a little more than two hundred years ago. During the wars of the succeeding years the Indians were scattered and the mission abandoned. In 1815 French missionaries again erected the cross at the old stations along the coast, and called the red men together for worship. About that time a church of hewn logs was built near the harbor; in time it became unfit for use, and forty years ago the present frame structure was erected on the site of the old one.

There is an intelligent "aborigine" at Little Traverse, named Black Bird, who has managed to pick up a knowledge of reading, writing and local politics. He was postmaster there for fourteen years. During the last administration the "rotation," or some other political wave, reached the bluff, and Black Bird was displaced. He is said to be wealthy; but about five years ago he learned a lesson of the white man's perfidy that has made him a melancholy Indian ever since. A man, whom we will call Tom Talbot, opened a saloon in Petoskey. It was not a bad sort of saloon, as saloons go; but a worthy missionary on the south side opposed it on general principles and sought to put it down. Major —, the prosecuting attorney of the district, was a friend of the missionary's family, particularly of a pair of bright young lady daughters, and was easily persuaded to assist the Rev. P., who was a justice of the peace, in ousting Tom Talbot. Between them they served warrant after warrant on the poor saloon-keeper till life became a burden to him. Now it so happened that the Major was engaged in the manufacture and sale of cigars in Petoskey, and Tom took it into his head to look a little into his methods of doing business. There was an old Indian away down on the Charlevoix trail who kept a "store" and sold a good many of the Major's cigars. Talbot found out that the Major was letting him have stock at a slight reduction if he would return the boxes with the stamps uncanceled. The ignorant savage gladly complied, and knew of several other red brothers in the interior who did likewise. Armed with these facts, Talbot came down sure and sudden on the Major. He was arrested at midnight and haled to Grand Rapids, where, after proper examination, he was lodged in jail to await trial. Things looked cloudy, and he began to plan for his liberty. He sent for Black Bird, and asked him to sign his bond for five thousand dollars. He was under obligations to the accomplished Major in connection with his last appointment, and the Indian never forgets. He signed the bond and the Major was released from custody, to appear at the next sitting of the United States Court. He did not appear. By the time Black Bird had reached Little Traverse the Major had reached Detroit. The next day he was in Canada, where he has since remained. Black Bird is watching for him all along the border. If you want to see a war-dance, just ask him if he has heard from the Major. The look which his grim visage assumes at the mention of that name is simply fiendish. It is generally believed around the bay that Black Bird would go farther for the privilege of taking the Major's scalp than to get his money back with interest.

IGNATIUS PETOSKEY.

UNDER "ARCH ROCK," MACKINAC.

The journey from Petoskey to Mackinac Island may be made either by the daily line of bay steamers or by the "inland route." Choosing the latter, we take the tramway to Conway Springs, at the head of Crooked Lake, where the "dummy" is met by a droll little steamboat, ready to carry passengers and luggage through the chain of lakes and rivers that extends unbroken to the Huron coast. It is a wild, romantic journey through Crooked Lake, Crooked River, Burt's Lake, Indian River, Mullet Lake and Cheboygan River to the town of Cheboygan, at the entrance of the Straits of Mackinac. The distance by the state road is forty miles; by steamer, fifty-five or sixty. Crooked River is rightly named, being probably the crookedest navigable stream on the globe. The boat follows its deviating course so slowly that the passengers may amuse themselves picking blackberries or trolling for bass, which are easily caught, the poor fish being somewhat fatigued and depressed by the exertion of swimming around the curves of this crazy little stream. Such, at least, was the theory by which Chum accounted for their willingness to be taken. Black bass, pike, pickerel and muskalonge abound in this chain of lakes and their connecting rivers, while brook trout and the sportsman's darling, grayling, are plenty in the rapid, spring-fed creeks that find their outlet in Burt's and Mullet Lakes. The "inland route" is one of the most popular sections of the great fishing-ground of North Michigan. All along this unique route are commodious caravansaries, the largest being the Mullet Lake House, a really good hotel, capable of accommodating two hundred guests. These hotels in the wilderness are fitted up for the express purpose of entertaining fishing parties, which frequently come in the shape of entire families, with sisters, cousins and aunts, desiring board for a term of weeks. At any one of them can be obtained boats, fishing-tackle, camp equipments and wagons, if desired.

We spend the night at Cheboygan town, and the next morning take a brief and pleasant sail up the south channel, and behold! the "Gem of the Straits" is before us; beautiful from this approach as an artist's dream, with its wooded peaks and terraces, and the white walls of the fortress gleaming in the sunshine.

Mackinac Island is a mass of limestone rock, rising sheer above the water to the height of nearly three hundred feet. As is common with calcareous formations the rocks assume many curious and fantastic shapes, such as pinnacles, arches, tiny caverns, gothic gables and natural stairways. To these have been given such names as the Devil's Kitchen, Sugarloaf Rock, Maiden's Rock, Spirit Arch, The Lover's Leap, etc. Foot-paths and carriage-drives wind about from one to another of these points of interest, and guides are always available who will tell the name and recite the mythical story associated with each.

The air at Mackinac is unsurpassed for purity and transparency. It is so clear that points at a great distance are distinctly visible. From the heights of the island can be seen Point St. Ignace on the north peninsula and old Fort Mackinac on the south, while Bois Blanc Lighthouse looks within easy hail. It would take a poet or artist of the highest order to fitly describe the charm of a moonlight night on this lovely island. The soft radiance is strong enough to enable one to read print with ease, and the water of the straits glitters beneath it like a river of quicksilver. The wooded summits of the island lift themselves amidst a bewildering contrast of soft, white light and deepest shadow, and the snowy walls of the fort, imbedded in foliage, look down protectingly on the old French town nestling around its little harbor.

Mackinac is well supplied with spacious and elegant hotels, filled during the season with summer tourists. They dance a great deal there. At Petoskey it is different. The near proximity of several resorts which are under the control of religious associations, and the character of the multitudes who flock to these resorts during the camp-meeting season, has left its imprint on the entire social life of the place. He who, in the language of a gay worldling of my acquaintance, likes "a very little Sunday-school and a good deal of hop" in his summer's recreations, will naturally prefer Mackinac. The fort is always garrisoned, and the presence of military men and martial music is a potent element of life and interest.

The visitor to Mackinac to-day misses a unique and pleasant character, one of its strong features in the past. Mr. Theodore Wendell, familiarly known as "old man Wendell," died last winter, and his valuable collection of curiosities and relics has been sold and scattered. Mr. Wendell was of French extraction, and was born on the island, as I believe his father was before him. One of his most valued possessions was a commission which had been his father's, signed by twenty-one chiefs, giving its holder magisterial authority over the island and a large portion of the upper mainland. He had also a playing-card which he said was the original nine-spot of diamonds on which the countersign was written the night before the massacre at old Fort Mackinac.

With the historical associations of Mackinac all are doubtless more or less familiar. As early as the middle of the seventeenth century the French established trading-posts at various points around Lake Michigan, and the most northern promontory of the lower peninsula was fortified as a protection to the fur-traders. In 1763 this region of territory, along with other French possessions, passed into the hands of the English, and soon after the Indians, under the famous chief, Pontiac, captured the fort—old Fort Michilimackinack—and massacred the garrison. The most noteworthy event connected with the United States military post on Mackinac Island is its capture by the British in 1812. That event we have always vaguely associated with General Hull's surrender at Detroit. Poor old Hull! What a load of ignominy his memory has borne! Might there be a possibility that part of it, at least, has been undeserved? Almost every school history one picks up goes farther than the court-martial that tried him, and pronounces him guilty of both cowardice and treason. How deeply he felt his dishonor is proven by the fact that he spent the brief remainder of his life, run of five hours we are again at Petoskey, and glad to be there. It is the natural centre of this great pleasure ground, the headquarters from which all side excursions should be made, the summer home for the health-seeker and the rest-seeker.

Little Traverse Bay has for me an inexhaustible charm. On a cloudless August morning, under a light southwest breeze, the water varies in color, according to depth, from the deepest hornblende to the palest apple-green, and the ripple in the wake of a vessel glitters with emeralds and diamonds. Then there are dreamy days, when a blue mist hangs over the wooded hills that encircle it, and the bay sleeps motionless, like a mirror upturned to the milky sky. Sometimes, even in summer, wild and sudden squalls arise, making a landing at the Petoskey pier dangerous or even impossible. In the morning everything may be calm and lovely, and before noon the entire bay, with the exception of the snug harbor at Little Traverse village, be lashed into the wildest commotion. There is an old pier just above the mouth of Bear River on which I love to stand and feel, as well as see, the lusty breakers chase each other in-shore, creating an undertow which would test the skill of the most daring surf-bather. Another favorite haunt of mine is after his name was stricken from the army rolls, in writing letter after letter and pamphlet after pamphlet to explain and justify his action. In the minds of many candid readers he measurably succeeded. At all events, it is well not to forget that he fought bravely in many of the battles of the Revolution, and it is always safe to spare a modicum of sympathy for the victim of pitiless and wholesale condemnation.

Satisfied at length with strolling about the lovely avenues of the "Wonderful Isle," some fair morning we step aboard the tidy steamer, the City of Grand Rapids, and glide westward into the lake, touching at Point St. Ignace, passing around the lighthouse and inside the light of Isle aux Galets. After a delightful the region of the boat-houses. They are kept and attended by a small army of civil young men and boys; rough-clad, hard-fisted fellows, but civil, all of them. When a party of amateur oarswomen come down, with their stupid questions and boring indecision, these boys have a chance to prove of what sort of stuff they are made.

"Beg pardon, ladies," (after they have at last concluded to take a boat and concluded to get into it,) "you are sitting wrong: turn your faces the other way. Now, back water—push on your handles. Back with your left oar, or you'll go under the pier. Pull now—pull with both hands."

The confused, half-frightened girls fail to comprehend, and then a twelve-year-old darkey rushes to the front and yells after them:

"Why don't yer pull? What d'yer mean by shovin' cross de bay stern fo'most?"

There is one woman comes here, however, who understands her business. She is built on the wind-splitter plan, extremely tall and narrow. Her prominent nose is sharp as a chisel, and she wears a black straw hat, tied close at the sides into a portentous and unsightly scoop. Her dress of steel-gray serge is cut after the princess model, and owing to the uniform narrowness it is hard to tell where waist leaves off and skirt begins. Chum and I call her the "Iron Clad." She comes down early, turning the corner by the Storm King Museum and darting down the long flight of steps with an irresistible impetus. She seizes her boat and launches it herself, bending her tall figure into the sharpest of angles. She is in and off. How her long arms wield the oars, hand over hand! Her lips are compressed, her nose and her scoop hat point obliquely upward; her eye scans the admiring crowd on shore. She rows skillfully around the pier once or twice, then she is off, no one knows where. I have never seen her return. Possibly she comes in under cover of night, thinking one exhibition a day all she can afford for the money.

About the middle of July the hay-fever patients begin to arrive at Petoskey, and during the first two weeks of August every train and boat brings its quota. From Atlanta and Nashville, from Chicago and St. Louis, and from scores of intermediate points they come to this great sanitarium of the Northwest. For a short time after their arrival they speak a language peculiar to themselves, full of blurred liquids and entirely destitute of nasal sounds. Very soon, however, there is a change; the watery eyes clear up, the "cold-sores" about the lips disappear, the sneezing chorus subsides, and for the remainder of the season the hay-fever people constitute as jolly a set of ex-invalids as it was ever my lot to fall in with.

Do you want to see old Petoskey? His son keeps a dry goods and notion store near the foot of Lake street, and the old man may usually be found in his easy-chair at the rear of the shop. He claims to be ninety-six years old; you will not believe it till you have seen the aged men who are his sons. His hair is black and his face fat and smooth. You approach him with a friendly salutation, and though he cannot speak English he will extend you a yellow hand, limp and soft to the touch as a piece of oil-dressed buckskin. He has sixteen sons. There is one individual at Petoskey who is to be sedulously avoided. I mean the skeptic—not in theology, but in matters of local interest. He will tell you that Petoskey isn't a day over sixty-five; that when Uncle Joe Piant and Margaret Boyd declare that this is really "the front end of Michigan," the earliest explored and oldest settled part of the state, they are "all off," and don't know what they are talking about; that the bits of queer pottery you have found and cherished as relics of the mound-builders are nothing but fragments of a broken beer-jug. He will stand up in the face of a company of sportsmen, just in from the Pigeon or Boyne rivers, where they have fished until fishing ceased to be an amusement, and coolly aver that, in his opinion, there has never been a brook-trout or grayling caught in the state! Shun him!

The out-of-the-world, buried-alive feeling which some tourists confess to having dreaded, as they approached Petoskey by rail through apparently limitless stretches of forest, never comes near them after once setting foot upon its streets. They find themselves not in a secluded, lonely place, but in a stirring lake-port town, deeply interested in its little exports of timber, fish and hemlock bark. A daily line of steamers runs to Mackinac, and two great ships of the Western Transportation Line touch at its wharf weekly. When the Idaho or the Fountain City comes steaming up the bay, the long pier presents an animated scene. Many here have friends at the East who may possibly be taking the five days' voyage from Buffalo to Chicago. When the vessel comes alongside, the crowd below scan the passengers that flock to the railing of the upper deck, and not unfrequently there are surprised recognitions and joyful salutations.

When at length we leave Petoskey—and we must leave it, else we could never have the delight of returning—an excellent route to choose is by the bay steamer via Charlevoix, Norwood and Northport, down the west arm of Grand Traverse Bay to Traverse City at its foot. This ride affords the tourist a rich treat in the shape of picturesque and varied coast scenery. From Traverse City a branch railroad, twenty-six miles long, connects at Walton Junction with the Grand Rapids and Indiana Railroad, known throughout the West as the "Fishing Line." The village of Walton was named, we suppose, after the gentle Izaak, whose disciples flock to this point by hundreds, and from it branch off to the various fishing-camps scattered among a wonderful group of lakes in the near vicinity. Three miles below Walton the railroad crosses the sparkling Manistee River, and not far off is the Boardman. Each of these lovely streams, flowing between tree-shadowed, fern-fringed banks, might perfectly describe itself in Tennyson's musical lines—

"I chatter over stony ways
In little sharps and trebles;
I bubble into eddying bays,
I babble on the pebbles.

"I wind about, and in and out,
With here a blossom sailing,
And here and there a lusty trout,
And here and there a grayling."

But the whistle blows, the bell rings, the wheels revolve, and Northern Michigan must be left behind for another season.

ANGELINE TEAL.

CLEOPATRA'S PROTEST.

BY EDWARD LIVINGSTON KEYES.

COME nearer, my spotted leopard, and cool with your tongue my hand,
I am faint with a fitful fever, and filled with a fancy grand;
Lie close to my side, and lend me your passion that poison taints,
While I ponder the perjured picture the world of your mistress paints;
The features and life it has painted, and chiseled and moulded and sung,
Of Egypt's Cleopatra in every land and tongue;
On canvas, crystal, china, in bronze and brass and gold;
In malachite and marble, on coins and medals old;
In mosaic and murrhine, in coral, copper, clay;
On ivory and in ebony, in Syene's granite gray;
In opal, ophite, onyx, in sapphire, chrysolite;
In topaz, turquoise, jasper; in alabaster white;
In verse and prose and ballad, in history manifold,
The face and life of Egypt's queen are drawn and carved and told.

In this galaxy of artists, in this gallery of art,
Where chisel, brush and pen have vied to do their perjured part,

I see no shade nor shadow, no sign nor semblance see,
Of her who stood at Actium with Roman Antony!
I fail to find the features, the force or spirit bold,
Of her who sailed the Cydnus in her galley wrought in gold;

In the character they give me I trace no sign nor mood
Of hers, who chose destruction to a life of servitude;
Who bared her bosom proudly and perished like a Queen, Preferring death to Cæsar, and the grave to Roman spleen!

But I see the spiteful venom that guided steel and hand,
That tarnished as it tinted, and poisoned as it planned.
I see the jealous envy that shaped each curve and turn
Of chisel, brush and pencil; but naught of truth discern;
And I see what they have made me, I cannot help but see,
For what the senseless stone omits is found in history.
The seal they set upon me of sumptuous sin and shame,
They stole from frail Aspasia's brow and Grecian Phryne's name.

I see the perjured picture! I see the wanton vile
They show for Cleopatra—"the Serpent of the Nile;"

And the eager world in earnest the lying trick respects,
And down through coming ages the truthful type rejects;
But I scorn to see the semblance in the picture that they draw

Of her who held Rome captive, and whose wish was Egypt's law!

I would bid them go remember that she whom they revile, Spurned the love of laureled Cæsar, when he sought her by the Nile,

And offered fame and station, and the sovereignty of Rome,

If she would yield the conquest, and say she was his own!
That she sent him back, with others, in their regal robes unmanned,

Who had come as hopeful suitors for Cleopatra's hand,
And bid them lay their treasures at the feet of one more free

Than the spouse of Rome's Triumvir—the God-like Antony!

I would tell them that the pious prude, Octavia, whom they raise

Upon the highest pinnacle of purity and praise,
Is not worthy of the worship they offer at her shrine,
For she was never Antony's; he always had been mine!
He took her from her regal home to carry out his part,
But never to his bosom, and never to his heart;

And all, all, all of Antony this haughty dame can claim
Is the sacrifice he offered when he gave to her his name!
He has sworn to me by Eros, that their hands have never met,

And that his star in Egypt rose when hers in Rome had set!

I would tell them that Octavia knew his spirit and his heart,

His life, his soul, his destiny, his mind, his every part
Was moored upon the Nilus, together with mine own,
Before he ever saw her—by Cæsar's wish alone.
And she knew the gods of Egypt had smiled serenely down

On the union of Rome's consul with Egypt's starry crown!
I would tell them she they blemished with the brand of sin and shame

Would have scorned to call him husband who gave alone his name!

And had that haughty Roman dame the spirit of a dove, She'd have sent him back to Egypt, to her who owned his love.

I am weary; leave me, leopard! you cannot change your skin,

Nor I the haughty spirit I showed to all save him.
And I thank the gods of Egypt for their mercy, which was shown

In giving me Mark Antony for all, all, all mine own!
And I thank the god of waters for yielding me the tide,
That flooded old Nile's bosom, where we rode side by side;

And to those who call me "Sorceress," and "Serpent of the Nile,"

And to those who dubbed me "Tigress," and everything that's vile,

I would say, your shafts fell harmless, for we were wholly one,

And when the pulse of one did cease, the other's life had run.

So I banish bitter feelings for all who did malign,
For 'twas but human nature to envy bliss like mine;
And I rain forgiveness on them in pearly perfumed showers,
And tell them that the Western world knew naught of love like ours.

THE OLD, OLD STORY.

BY ANNA A. CAMERON.

ON a clear, frosty evening in the latter part of October, Hesper Carroll stood leaning against the bars of her father's barnyard, waiting for the return of Jacob, "the bound-boy," who had gone to the pasture to drive home the delinquent cows, which, though paragons of virtue generally, grew a trifle rebellious now that pasturage was becoming limited, and manifested a decided preference for remaining in the meadows to search for dainty patches of green grass that could be found only in sheltered nooks.

The sun was sinking slowly down the glowing west, and its warm, slanting beams fell full upon the face and figure of the girl as she stood listening to the distant tinkle of the bells, and looking dreamily away across the broad meadows to the wooded slopes which were glowing with the rich tints of autumn. She made a fair picture as she stood in the gay sunshine, which tinged with gold the dark chestnut curls that were pushed back beneath the broad brim of a large straw hat that shaded but did not conceal the bonny, winsome face beneath it. Her deep violet eyes were fringed with long dark lashes, that swept far down on the rose-tinted cheek. A fair forehead, delicate, clear-cut nose, sweet, crimson mouth, and snowy chin, full of dimples, completed a face which entitled its owner to the palm universally awarded her of being "the belle of the whole country-side." Her figure was perfect, and every movement instinct with grace, and the tiny foot that peeped from beneath her dress was fairy-like enough to have worn the slipper of the fabled "Cinderella."

The bells sounded nearer and nearer, and just as Hesper turned to see if the cows were in view, a shadow fell across the path, and the substance thereof appeared in the form of a tall, handsome young man, who advanced toward her, smiling as he held out his hand, saying:

"Good-evening, Hesper. I called at the house to see you, but Mrs. Carroll told me I should find you here."

The hand he had grasped, very warmly it must be confessed, was decidedly withdrawn, and he looked surprised at the brief "good-evening" with which Hesper greeted him.

"I had hoped to find you nearly done milking," he added, as he stood watching the slender fingers energetically plucking to pieces a late clover-blossom. "Mother sent me over to ask you to come and help her. We have our husking to-night, and she is a little behind-hand with her preparations. The husking will break up with a dance. Will you come?"

"Yes, as your mother wants me; but I cannot go now."

"I can wait for you, then. Mother told me to be sure to bring you."

"You need not wait," said Hesper, quickly, just a tinge of impatience in the usually sweet voice. "I sha'n't be ready for some time, and when I am Jacob can go with me. Tell Mrs. Rayburn, please, that I will come as soon as possible." And without even a glance at the troubled face before her, she took up her pail and stood tapping her small foot impatiently as she watched the fine, sleek Devons slowly filing into the barnyard.

Harry Rayburn stood a moment irresolute, then, with a quiet "Good-evening, Hesper," turned again into the path by which he had come.

"Good-evening," she answered, and, without even glancing toward him, she began at once to fill her pail with rich, foaming milk.

"Stand still, Blossom. You are so cross that I never shall get through this tiresome milking!" At Hesper's sharp reproof, accompanied by a smart blow from the small hand of that indignant damsel, Blossom turned a mildly reproachful glance upon her, for the delinquency had been nothing more serious than entering an energetic protest with her long, flowing tail against the marauding proclivities of a great horse-fly, which, while humming an innocent-sounding tune, was steadily levying "blackmail" from Blossom's most vulnerable and defenseless points, evidently determined upon securing his vesper meal at her expense.

Hesper's little hands worked rapidly, and notwithstanding Blossom's several lapses from obedience, the last pail was soon capped with snowy foam.

"Mother," she said as she entered the kitchen some time afterwards, where Mrs. Carroll was busy with her early supper, "Mrs. Rayburn has sent to ask me to go over and help her; they are going to have their husking to-night, and she wants me. May I go?"

"To be sure, Hesper; get ready and go at once. No doubt she does need help. The Squire told me yesterday she had had the rheumatism all the week, and was not able to do much."

Hesper disappeared, and was soon in her own little room arraying herself in all the bravery of her best attire. Her dress, of soft dark green material, fitted her pretty figure perfectly, and was finished at the throat and wrists with snowy ruffles, while at the throat a cherry-colored ribbon was tied in a shower of loops. Her dark ringlets were brushed back from the fair blue-veined forehead, and kept in place by another piece of cherry-colored ribbon. As she stood before the glass giving the last touches to her dress she glanced for a moment at the reflection of her own bright, pretty face, and tossing her head defiantly, resolved to "make Harry Rayburn's heart ache that night, if, indeed, he had a heart!" And here the curly head gave a disdainful toss. "To think of how long he had been pretending to care for her, and now to be devoting himself to Fannie Lawson! It was too bad! She always thought Fannie was the prettier, but she did not know that Harry thought so too until now! He had carried Fannie to the fair first, and then actually came back for her, as if he thought she would go with him! No, indeed! And how glad she was to pass him in Joe Wentworth's buggy. Joe loved her, that she was sure of, for he had told her so that very day, and said such beautiful things to her, and told her that it would break his heart if she did not love him; but—Joe was small and ugly, and had such a squeaky voice, and she did not care for him; and Harry was so tall and handsome—the very handsomest man she ever saw—and he had such a beautiful voice, so deep and mellow, that when he said lovely things it sounded as if they were set to music. But she did despise him; he was so deceitful, so unlike the Harry she used to know!" And the bright eyes flashed through the tears that a moment before had softened their indignant light, and she renewed her resolve to give him a heartache if he had not grown absolutely indifferent to her, and if he had, why he would see that she too was indifferent.

WHEN Hesper entered the kitchen to say good-night to her mother, Mrs. Carroll asked:

"Has Harry Rayburn come for you?"

"No; father says that Jacob may go with me, it is such a short distance, and I shall not want for an escort coming back."

"That you may be sure of," said Mrs. Carroll, looking fondly and proudly at the fair face of her child; "but I wonder that Harry did not come to walk over with you."

"He did, but I was not ready to go."

"But couldn't he have waited? You would not have kept him long, and he generally seems to mind no trouble if he can only be with you."

"I would not let him wait. Jacob will do just as well. Good-night, mother." And Hesper tripped away in the moonlight in charge of her humble esquire. The pathway wound across the field and into a belt of woodland, and it was after entering the shadowy woods that, hearing voices, Hesper looked up to see Harry Rayburn. Coming forward, he said as he joined her:

"I happened to be coming along the path, and if you have no objections Jacob may go back and I will escort you the rest of the way."

"Did you tell your mother why I could not come sooner?" asked Hesper with quiet malice, determined to find out whether he had been home, or had, as she shrewdly suspected, been waiting to accompany her.

"Yes—that is, no; not yet," replied Harry, startled by the unexpected question.

Hesper gave an audible sniff—how girls luxuriate in that method of expressing disdain!—and they walked on in silence for a few moments. They had reached a dense part of the woods, and the moon was obscured by a cloud.

"It is very dark; won't you take my arm?" said Harry gently.

"No, thank you; I can see well enough!"

"But you might fall. I know the path so well—do lean on my arm."

"It would not be convenient," Hesper said coolly; "you are too dreadfully tall."

"Why, you never thought so before!"

"I never said so, perhaps," she answered dryly.

"Hesper, what is the matter?" asked Harry, now thoroughly conscious of her intention of wounding him. "What makes you so cold and so changed?"

"If I am not pleasant it is a pity you insisted on walking with me," she replied with quiet indifference. "You had better have let Jacob come with me."

"I wish I had," he exclaimed passionately; "and I beg your pardon for forcing myself upon you. I was stupid enough not to know that it would be disagreeable to you, but I shall not annoy you any more than I can help."

They soon reached the house, and throwing open the door of a large, well-lighted room, in which Mrs. Rayburn sat, surrounded with eatables of every description, Harry said, "Mother, here is Hesper."

Mrs. Rayburn limped forward, and, heartily kissing the cheeks whose roses the frosty air had deepened, said:

"I am mighty glad you have come, my dear. I have had the rheumatism all the week, and it has thrown me a little behind-hand with my work, and I wanted you to help me fix the table. I can't move about quick like I used to do, and the girl don't know about such things, besides being busy. I told Richard Rayburn that it's the first time since I married him—going on twenty-five years ago—that I was ever behind-hand at husking time; and I never wanted help before, either! But I suppose a body can't always keep strong and spry as they were when they were young. I looked for you by dusk, dear; what kept you so late?"

"The cows did not come in from the pasture until after sunset, and the milking was later than usual."

"And Harry waited for you, of course!" said the good dame mischievously.

"Yes, I waited for her," replied Harry doggedly, the color waving over his swarthy cheek as he saw the little red mouth set and the head give just a perceptible toss, as though that waiting had done him but small good!

"Here, my dear," said Mrs. Rayburn, who was blissfully ignorant of this by-play, leading the way into an adjoining room where a long table covered with snowy, home-made linen stood on the floor, "this is the table, and Harry will help you bring the things to put on it. I must go now and look after the girl; she does not know anything, and is little better than no help." And Mrs. Rayburn limped away to "look after the girl" in part, and, as she thought to herself, "to be out of the way of the young folks' courting;" for having no daughter of her own, and being very fond of Hesper, she hoped some day to see her Harry's wife.

Hesper having laid aside her shawl and hat and tied on the daintiest ruffled white apron, was soon engaged in transferring the appetizing viands into the room where the supper was to be laid.

"What can I do for you?" Harry asked a little stiffly when they were alone.

"Bring in the heaviest dishes, please, and just put them anywhere on the table; I can arrange them afterward." And Hesper tripped away to the other end of the room, where she was busy amidst pies, etc.

Of course, there was no talking done, but Hesper would now and then sing softly to herself tiny snatches of songs, as though utterly oblivious of Harry's presence. When he had brought in the dishes and arranged them in a row on the table, and could see nothing else to do, he went to where Hesper was arranging sundry delicious, green apple tarts and golden pumpkin pies, and asked in a tone half-piqued, half-pleading:

"Can I do anything else for you?"

"Nothing at all, thank you," replied Hesper, so intent upon the exact relation that a pie should bear to a tart that she could not even glance up; and when the young man did not move, but stood irresolute for a moment, supposing, of course, that he had not heard her, she repeated: "There is nothing you can do now. You can go if you wish. If I need your assistance any further I can call you."

"But suppose I wish to stay," he said in a tone of suppressed feeling, "and ask you to tell me what I have done that you should treat me as you are doing?"

"Harry! Where is Harry?" called 'Squire Rayburn's voice, as he came hurrying toward the room in a state of mild excitement.

"Here I am, father," Harry replied, a trifle impatiently, and the next moment the door was thrown open and the 'Squire's bluff, good-natured face appeared.

"Oh, here you are. The boys are coming, my son. You had better go out to meet them, hadn't you? Why, how d'ye do, Hesper? You look as bright as a bunch of holly-berries!" And with the usual relish that elderly specimens of the genus homo develop for such diversion, the 'Squire imprinted a hearty kiss upon the fresh, red lips of the bright face smilingly upturned to his. "Busy as a bee, are you?" he continued, looking around upon the confusion that Hesper's deft hands had already begun to reduce to tasteful order. "You will make a jolly wife for some lucky fellow by-and-by. It almost makes an old man like me wish he was young again; but I am a better-looking man now than the most of them—eh, Hesper?"

"A great deal better-looking than any of them," said Hesper quietly; and a moment afterward she glanced down the room as a pair of very emphatic boot-heels went ringing across the floor and out into the piazza, and Master Harry strode off in full receipt of as genuine a heartache as would have amply satisfied Hesper's most vicious desire.

THE great heap of corn had been husked, the bountiful supper dispatched, and the long room was cleared and ready for the dancers. Then came the tuning of violins—that sound which instantly "puts mettle in the heels" of the dancers. The bows were rosined from heel to toe, drawn with a ringing flourish across the instruments, and then they glided off into an old-fashioned reel. A set was formed, and in a twinkling the measured tread of dancing feet kept time to the inspiring strains.

The dancing continued for hours, and Hesper Carroll, the belle of the evening, had been on the floor repeatedly. She was besieged with partners, and even the old 'Squire insisted on "treading at least one measure" with her. "I like to cut the young fellows out," he said, with a merry twinkle of his eye. "It astonishes them so, and then I always had a taste for pretty girls ever since I fell in love with my buxom wife. One set will not weary you, will tease the boys—Master Harry most especially, to judge by his looks—and is just about as much as my two hundred and sixty pounds and sixty-five years can stand!"

Harry, who had danced repeatedly with Fanny Lawson and paid her a great deal of attention, had not been near Hesper. Joe Wentworth, on the contrary, was devoting himself to her, and she, it must be confessed, had received his devotion and treated him with bewitching sweetness. When, therefore, the gathering broke up, just as the gray east was tinted with the rose flush of early dawn, and she walked away across the fields leaning on Joe's arm, he found himself pleading his cause with a hope born of the impassioned love which had met with such unexpected encouragement.

In the early morning, when its chill has cooled the fevered pulse, and one is looking at things by the gray, cold light, and is weary withal, things that were worth the accepting a few hours before grow worthless and are but added weariness! A keen remorse smote Hesper, for she was conscious how much she had hurt Joe in trying to pique Harry, and she repented the selfish disregard of his feelings. But to further encourage him by even the slightest hope would be but to wound him the deeper. When, therefore, his appeal ended, and he awaited her answer, it came in a passion of tears.

"Oh, Joe, forgive me; I was cruel and selfish to trifle with you as I have done, because I knew that I did not love you and never could."

I doubt if Harry's voice would have sounded sweeter or more manly than Joe's did when he answered gently:

"Don't cry, Hesper; it hurts me. Never mind about me; if there was anything to forgive, I could not help forgiving you, because I love you. Now, good-by, and don't grieve over me any more, sweetheart; I am not worth those tears." And, lifting her hand to his lips, he turned and was gone.

The weeks that followed were dreary ones to Hesper, though no one knew that aught had come to cloud the sunshine of her days.

Joe Wentworth was very gentle and considerate of her whenever they met, but that made her all the more regret the ungenerous way she had treated him. Harry she seldom saw, and their intercourse was very cold and indifferent. She still imagined herself very indignant at his apparent trifling, and he seemed to avoid her as much as possible.

It was only after Will Rayburn returned from the West, about a month later, that it became known that he and Fanny Lawson were engaged, and that Harry had only been taking care of her in Will's absence. Hearing this Hesper began to reproach herself for having judged too hastily, and been so quick to resent Harry's supposed indifference. "But," she thought, "it was in part his fault; had he only told her at first, she would have understood and would not have minded it in the least. Now everything seemed so changed. No doubt that he despised her. He could not know why she had changed so to him, and very probably thought she had been trifling with him. He had been so cold to her since the night of the husking, and she could see that he tried to avoid her whenever he could. Of course she could do nothing but feel miserable. She could not show him that she was not indifferent to him because he might have ceased to care whether she was or not, and she would rather die than have him know that all the world seemed weariness without him."

Several months passed thus, and at length came Will Rayburn's wedding; and as soon as the merry-makings were over he was to take his young wife and emigrate to the West, which held out glowing inducements to new settlers, and where Will's imagination pictured the speedy realization of dreams which had lured him to broader fields than the old homestead offered. Unexpectedly to every one, at the last, Harry announced his determination to go also. Though bitterly opposed to it, his parents said nothing to dissuade him. He had been so unlike himself—so strangely restless—that they thought an absolute change might benefit him; at all events, they would not oppose what seemed to be so earnest a desire.

'Twas the night before they were to leave, and Harry, having made his hurried preparations and walked restlessly up and down the long piazza, at length strode off across the fields and down the well-known path that he had not trod now for four months.

"Good-evening, Hesper," he said, as he came up the steps of the porch where Hesper sat alone in the moonlight.

"Good-evening, Harry," she answered, rising and offering him her hand.

He grasped it, looking at her earnestly for a moment, then released it, saying with repressed emotion:

"I have come against my will to tell you good-by. I am going away to-morrow, and I am such a weak fool that I could not go without one more sight of your face!"

"You are going away?" Hesper said, growing pale in the moonlight. "How long shall you be gone?"

"Forever, possibly; certainly for years!"

"Why do you go?" she asked in a low, unsteady voice.

"Why?" he asked with a short laugh. "Why shouldn't I go; what is there here to stay for?"

"Your father and mother, at least," she answered gently; "it must distress them bitterly to give you up; they will be so lonely!"

"I suppose they will," he said, breathing quick, "but I also am lonely and miserable. Why do I go? You to ask me that when you know so well that it is you who are driving me away. Do you suppose that, loving you as I do, I can be content to go on in this way any longer? To live so near you and yet be so far away—to be worse than nothing to you; I am not the same man that I was four months ago. Why, the very world looks different. I will go where I can forget you, for that at best is as near happiness as I can ever hope to reach. But forgive me for intruding thus upon you; I longed to see you again, and only meant to say good-by, but the sight of you completely unmans me, and I have said what I had no right to say to you. I did not mean to be unkind. Good-by, little Hesper." He held both of her hands close in his, looking at the sweet, downcast face with yearning, love-lit eyes. For one brief moment the face was lifted to meet his glance; then, with a little cry, "Oh, Harry, do not leave me!" Hesper was gathered close to the broad breast that was heaving with strong emotion.

"And did you love me all this while?" he whispered a moment later, as he bent low over the nut-brown head and listened for the answer.

"Yes; and, oh, I have been so unhappy!"

"Then, my darling, why did you treat me so coldly?"

"Because I was jealous. I thought you did not care for me as you used to do!"

Harry Rayburn laughed a low, sweet laugh, and lifting the flushed face gently and kissing the trembling lips, asked, smiling, "Jealous of whom, Hester?"

"Of Fanny Lawson. I thought you loved her best!"

"Oh! silly little girl. Not to know that I could not love any one else in the whole world as I love you. I was only taking care of Fanny while Will was away, and this has been the cause of my long heartache, has it?"

"But Harry, you took her to the fair first!"

"So I did, sweetheart, but I started early, so that I could return in time to take you, meaning to tell you that morning that Will had put her in my care, though I never for one moment thought it possible that you could misunderstand my attentions to her. When I returned for you I met you with Joe Wentworth, and from that day you have been so changed that I have been miserable. I could not imagine at first what could be the cause of it, but afterwards I thought that you did not care for me, and so meant to show me your indifference. The night of our husking you were so cold, so unlike what you had been before, that I made up my mind it would be useless to say anything to you. I thought then that you loved Wentworth, and I was a wretched man. When Will said he was going West I determined to go too. I could not have stayed here believing that you cared for another man; but now I am the happiest man alive! Will can go West if he wishes; I cannot imagine anything that would induce me to go now. But Hesper, sweetheart, one thing more"—Harry smiled mischievously—"and then I think the clouds will all have been swept away: am I 'so dreadfully tall' now, and is father 'a great deal handsomer' than I am?"

"Oh! Harry, why do you recall those spiteful speeches that I have been so sorry for, and that were not true; for there is no one in all the world half so handsome or so good as you are. Forget all of that dreadful time, and I promise that I will never give you another heartache, and forgive an unkindness that has cost me as much sorrow as it has done you."

The moon peeped down curiously into the porch—the moon has not a particle of manners, and is just as curious about lovers to-day as she was about their ancestors hundreds of years ago!—doubtless she was grieved that she had not sped westward sooner, for looking in through the climbing roses and honeysuckle vines that wreathed the porch she only saw a man's arm around the slender figure of the woman whose sweet face lay hidden on his breast, while his bearded cheek rested lovingly against her soft chestnut hair.

WITS AND BEAUTIES OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

IN the year of our Lord, 1702, when Anne ascended the throne, the pleasure-seeking, gossip-loving society of London was in full pursuit after every kind of novelty and excitement. The gaming tables at White's, the chocolate and coffee-houses, the lotteries and clubs were crowded. Duncan Campbell, the deaf and dumb fortune teller, held levees at which people of the highest rank assisted. Wits were discussing Addison and laughing over Swift's caustic satires. Congreve and Wycherly filled the theatres, and there was a rumor afloat of a permanent Italian opera.

In the eighteenth century we enter into the presence of women whose ghosts are still understood to hold the brevet rank of Queens of Beauty and Wit. The court of George the First was completely under the influence of women. Bolingbroke secured his return from exile through the Duchess of Kendal. Carteret relied upon the Countess of Platen. Chesterfield intrigued against Newcastle with the Duchess of Yarmouth, and even Pitt secured his position in the Cabinet through the influence of the same lady.

One of the most erratic of its early stars of fashion was Miss Chudleigh, afterwards Duchess of Kingston. Her father, Colonel Chudleigh, died while she was an infant, and her mother was very slenderly dowered. But the Earl of Bath took a lively interest in the beautiful girl, and obtained her the position of a maid of honor, a position she held, through good and evil report, until she became Duchess of Kingston; for she bewitched, in spite of their better judgment, every one who came within her influence.

MISS CHUDLEIGH, DUCHESS OF KINGSTON, AFTER SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

While very young a promise of marriage passed between her and the Duke of Hamilton, but during his absence on the continent her aunt induced her to marry the Hon. Augustus Hervey, grandson of the Earl of Bristol. The marriage was, of course, kept a secret, and she tried—not always successfully—to laugh and brave off the rumors which were whispered about her. "Do you know, my lord," she said to Chesterfield, "the world insists I have twin sons?" "Does it?" replied the witty nobleman. "I make a point of believing only half of what the world says." She had married Mr. Hervey out of pique, believing the Duke of Hamilton false to her, and she soon bitterly repented the step. Then she tore the entry of her marriage from the church register, though afterwards—when her husband was likely to become Earl of Bristol—she replaced it. Her dress and manners soon began to exhibit an indelicacy so reckless that Chesterfield wondered what arts she used to obtain toleration. Horace Walpole, describing her at a masquerade, says: "Miss Chudleigh was 'Iphigenia,' but so naked you would have taken her for 'Andromeda';" and referring to the same occasion, Mrs. Montagu writes: "Miss Chudleigh's dress, or rather undress, was remarkable. The maids of honor (not of maids the strictest at that time) were so offended they would not speak to her;" and it was doubtless on this occasion that her too indulgent mistress gave her cutting and dignified reproof by throwing her own veil over her.

Harassed by her unhappy position and the importunities of numerous lovers, she went abroad, and was received with almost royal pomp by the King of Prussia and the Electress of Saxony. Yet her favor at the English Court was undiminished on her return, and the wisest statesmen marveled at the arts and fascinations which could command her such a reception in Dresden and make her life connived at in London. Her husband was now Earl of Bristol, but she had infatuated the Duke of Kingston, and he, being anxious to marry her, applied to Bristol to aid their views. The despised husband seems to have readily consented, and when she applied to the ecclesiastical court in a suit of jactitation of marriage, the Earl of Bristol—as it had been agreed he should do—failed in substantiating his claim, and his wife was declared "a spinster free to marry." Immediately afterwards she became Duchess of Kingston, the wedding being one of great pomp and the king and queen wearing their favors on the occasion.

Five years afterwards the Duke died, bequeathing to her every rood of his immense unentailed estates and every guinea of his personal property. The heirs at once sought for proofs of her first marriage, and, in consequence, she was summoned to appear in Westminster Hall on a charge of bigamy. The scene is thus described by Mrs. Hannah More, who was visiting Garrick at the time: "Garrick would have me to take his ticket to go to the trial of the Duchess of Kingston, a sight of which, for beauty and magnificence, exceeded anything which those who were never present at a coronation or a trial by peers can have the least notion of. Mrs. Garrick and I were in full dress by seven. You will imagine the bustle of five thousand people getting into one hall! Yet in all this hurry we walked in tranquilly. When they were all seated and the King-at-arms had commanded silence on pain of imprisonment—which, however, was very ill-observed—the Gentleman of the Black Rod was commanded to bring in his prisoner. Elizabeth, calling herself Duchess-Dowager of Kingston, walked in led by Black Rod and Mr. La Roche, courtesying profoundly to her judges. The peers made her a slight bow. The prisoner was dressed in deep mourning, a black hood on her head, her hair modestly dressed and powdered, a black silk sacque with crape trimmings, black gauze, deep ruffles and black gloves. The counsel spoke about an hour and a quarter each. Dunning's manner is insufferably bad, coughing and spitting at every three words, but his sense and expression were pointed to the last degree. He made her grace shed bitter tears. The fair victim had four virgins in white behind the bar. . . . The Duchess has but small remains of that beauty of which kings and princes were once so enamored. . . . I forgot to tell you the Duchess was taken ill, but performed it badly." As to her acting, Mrs. More did not certainly judge fairly, for Garrick said that at her trial "she so much outacted him that it was time for him to leave the stage."

In a subsequent letter Mrs. More says: "I have the great satisfaction of telling you that Elizabeth, calling herself Duchess of Kingston, was this very afternoon undignified and un-Duchessed, and very narrowly escaped being burned in the hand. If you have been half so much against this unprincipled, artful, licentious woman as I have, you will be rejoiced at it, as I am. Lord Camden breakfasted with us. He is very angry that she was not burned in the hand. He says, as he was once a professed lover of hers, he thought it would have looked ill-natured and ungallant for him to propose it, but that he should have acceded to it most heartily, though he believes he should have recommended a cold iron." The description is doubtless a truthful one, but has a very unwomanly spice of ill-nature in it. Her persecutors also entirely failed in their chief object—the restitution of the property—for the Duke had so worded the bequest that it was hers under any title, she being called in it "my dearest wife, Elizabeth, Duchess of Kingston, alias Elizabeth Chudleigh, alias Elizabeth Hervey." "Did you ever," asks Horace Walpole, "hear of a Duchess inscribed in a will as a harlot is indicted at the Old Bailey?"

Her last exploit was a visit to the court of Russia, whither she went en princesse, sending magnificent gifts before her. The Empress appointed a palace for her residence, and received her in a royal manner. During her residence there, she purchased an estate near St. Petersburg worth £12,000. Then she returned to France, where also she had great possessions, but receiving some news that displeased her, she fell into a violent passion and broke a blood-vessel. Against all orders she persisted in rising. "My heart feels oddly; I will have a glass of Madeira." It was brought her; she drank it, and pronounced herself "charmingly indeed"—but in a few minutes she was dead.

The world knew all her faults; her excellences were not so well known. Yet she was splendidly generous in nature, and unostentatiously charitable. She remembered favors gratefully, and was capable not only of forgiving but of assisting a fallen foe. She was a woman of great courage, never traveled without pistols, and never feared to use them, if necessary. Her whole life and character indeed was a romance, and if fully written would doubtless be condemned as too improbable a fiction.

CATHARINE HYDE, DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY,
AFTER C. JERVAS.

Contemporary with the Duchess of Kingston was Prior's

"Kitty, beautiful and young."

Duchess of Queensberry, and not seldom called "the mad Duchess." Eccentricity was her delight, and Lady Bolingbroke gave her the title of "La Singularité," a name which greatly pleased her. She was, however, a good wife and a good woman and a most sincere friend. To the poet Gay she was as constant a patron as her husband; and was, indeed, forbidden court because of her exertions in his behalf after the prohibition of "The Beggars' Opera."

Prior's description of her is not only very characteristic, but was also at one time very popular. In it he tells us how "Kitty, beautiful and young," pleaded for permission to go into the world and try her fortune, and how, having prevailed, "Kitty, at heart's desire,

"Obtained the chariot for a day
And set the world on fire."

Half a century after Prior wrote, Horace Walpole said: "The Duchess of Queensberry is still figuring in the world, not only by giving frequent balls, but really by her beauty. Reflect that she was a goddess in Prior's days. I could not help adding these lines to his description of 'Kitty, beautiful and young':

"To many a Kitty, Love his ear
Will for a day engage;
But Prior's Kitty, ever fair, Obtained it for an age."

Walpole's impromptu brought a reply in the Gentleman's Magazine, in which Kitty is made to account for Walpole's admiration thus:

"Guess why," she cried, 'his praise I share
With Roman and with Greek?
Such connoisseurs admire the rare
And prize the true antique."

Walpole has spoken of being at her balls; at one of them she gave him a characteristic reproof for having retired with Lord Lorn and George Selwyn to a snug little room for a comfortable, selfish chat. She sent a servant at once to take the door off the hinges. The gentlemen understood the hint, and returned to the hall and the dancers. She does not seem to have been a favorite with Walpole, for he records her wild pranks with that gusto which ill-nature frequently gives to his pen. Thus, he describes a quarrel between her and the Duchess of Richmond, whose daughter, Lady Caroline, had recently eloped. "She sent to invite Lady Emily Lennox to a ball. Her mother, who is wonderfully cautious since Lady Caroline's elopement, sent word 'she could not determine.' She sent again and received the same answer. The Queensberry then sent word that she had made up her company and desired to be excused from having Lady Emily's; but at the bottom of the card wrote, 'Too great a trust.' You know how mad she is, and how capable of such a stroke." But in spite of Horace Walpole's disapproval, she retained not only her beauty and vivacity, but also her popularity, until she was very old; and, with her stately figure and milk-white locks, was one of the most remarkable-looking women in the train of George the Third's young queen.

Few women, in point of wit, rivaled her, except Lady Townshend, who was one of the cleverest and handsomest beauties of that day. Woe to those who fell under the displeasure or tongue of Dorothy, Lady Townshend. In Walpole's letters her name never appears but to herald some stinging shaft or bitter repartee. With head erect, flowing robes and flashing eyes, she defied criticism. Her eyes, especially, had the basilisk power of "looking a fellow-creature down." She did not live with her husband, and we may imagine her look as she counted up the remedies for the sorrows of women: "Such a medicine, so many; such a doctor, so many; but the greatest number find relief from the sudden death of their husbands." In the famous political crisis, when one side was for Mr. Pelham and others for Lord Carteret, and none for Lord Bute, Lady Townshend added to the mortification of the latter the crowning sting of scorn by the galling reply which she made to his complaint of "having a pain in his side:" "Oh, that can't be; you have no side!" It was Greek against Greek when she encountered Horace Walpole. He says of her at one time, when the town was very empty: "So my Lady Townshend is obliged to lie off people now;" and later, when she had been very ill: "Lady Townshend has been dying, and took prayers, but she is recovered now, even of her repentance." And Lady Townshend summed Horace Walpole up in six stinging words—"Horace Walpole is spirits of hartshorn." Another beauty of the court of George the Second was Mary Lepel. She had lived much abroad, and in France acquired that piquancy of manner which, grafted upon English propriety, made her almost irresistible. All the talents of the day were enlisted in her praise. Pope and Gay celebrated her. Walpole praised her. Voltaire eulogized her, and Lords Chesterfield and Bath united their powers in a ballad in her honor, of which one verse will be sufficient for the taste of our time:

"Bright Venus yet never saw bedded
So perfect a beau and a belle
As when Hervey, the handsome, was wedded
To the beautiful Mary Lepel."

For it was Lord John Hervey, the friend of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, that became the husband of this celebrated beauty.

The surpassing loveliness of "those goddesses, the Gunnings," has become historical; nor is there any other modern instance of mere physical beauty exciting so extraordinary a sensation as that produced by these two portionless Irish gentlewomen. Their names were Maria and Elizabeth; and Maria, the eldest, was only in her nineteenth year when they appeared at court. Under date of June 18th, 1751, Horace Walpole writes to his friend, Sir Horace Mann: "You, who knew England in other times, will find it difficult to conceive what indifference reigns with regard to ministers and their squabbles. The two Misses Gunning are twenty times more the subject of conversation. . . . These are two Irish girls of no fortune, who are declared to be the handsomest women alive. . . . They can't walk in the Park or go to Vauxhall but such crowds follow them that they are generally driven away." Though portionless they were of good birth, their father being John Gunning, of Castle Coote; their mother, Bridget, a daughter of the sixth Viscount Mayo. Maria, the elder, married Lord Coventry, and the present earl is the great-grandson of this beautiful countess. Four months after her marriage she went to Paris, but, according to Walpole's gossiping chronicles, she scarcely made as much sensation there. Her genius was not equal to her beauty, and every day she said some new sproposito. Her lord, too, seems to have been, in his own way, still more silly and prejudiced. He spoke no more French than was sufficient to show his ill-breeding. He was jealous and over-scrupulous. When the Duke de Luxembourg told him he had called Lady Coventry's coach, my lord replied, "Vous avez fort bien fait." When pressed to stay for a grand fête at St. Cloud, he excused himself, "because it would make him miss a music meeting at Worcester;" and he compelled his lady to send for a fan back which she had given to the Maréchale de Lowendahl, because "he had given it to her before their marriage, and her parting with it would make an irreparable breach." She was wild, arch, espiègle, but she certainly wanted tact and discernment, as the following anecdote shows: George the Second, at the close of his long life, was talking to her one day on the dullness of the town, regretting that, for her sake, there had been no masquerades. "Oh! as for sights," said the thoughtless beauty, "I am quite satisfied with them. There is only one which I am eager to see, and that is a coronation."

She lived but a very few years to enjoy the triumphs of her charms, dying when only twenty-seven, from the use of white lead as a cosmetic. Horace Walpole thus records the event, October, 1760: "The charming Countess is dead at last. The quantity of paint she used is said to have been the immediate cause of the disorder which caused her death." And this was the end of a loveliness so eminent that her shoemaker in Worcester got two guineas and a half for showing a shoe he was making for her, charging a penny a head. Mason wrote an elegy on her death, which, in spite of many faults, is one of the finest in the language. The following description of her is from it:

"Whene'er with soft serenity she smiled,
Or caught the Orient blush of quick surprise,
How sweetly mutable, how brightly wild,
The liquid lustre darted from her eyes!
Each look, each motion, waked a new-born grace,
That o'er her form a transient glory cast;
Some lovelier wonder soon usurped the place,
Chased by a charm still lovelier than the last."

Elizabeth Gunning came to London with her sister, and was married three weeks before her to James, Duke of Hamilton. This affair greatly exercised that charming gossip, Walpole, who thus writes of it to Sir Horace Mann: "The event that has made most noise since my last is the extempore wedding of the youngest of the two Gunnings, who have made so vehement a noise. Lord Coventry, a grave young lord, of the remains of the patriot breed, has long dangled after the elder, virtuously with regard to her honor, not very honorably with regard to his own credit. About six weeks ago Duke Hamilton—the very reverse of the Earl—hot, debauched, extravagant, and equally damaged in fortune and person, fell in love with the youngest at the masquerade, and determined to marry her in the spring. About a fortnight since, at an immense assembly at my Lord Chesterfield's, made to show the house, which is really most magnificent, Duke Hamilton made violent love at one end of the room while he was playing at pharaoh at the other end—that is, he saw neither the bank nor his own cards which were of £300 each. He soon lost a thousand. I could not conceive, if he was so much engaged with his mistress, why he played at all." It is hardly likely the selfish old bachelor could conceive of such a passion as the Duke's—a passion which led him two nights afterwards to insist on being married at once, though he had neither ring nor license, and could not get the clergyman sent for to perform the ceremony without them. However, he found one more accommodating, and the pair were actually married at Mayfair Chapel, with the ring of a bed-curtain, at half-an-hour after midnight.

The interest and curiosity aroused by the beauty of the sisters was increased by their splendid alliances, and when the Duchess of Hamilton was presented at court, the noble crowd was so great that they clambered on tables and chairs to look at her. There were mobs at the doors of houses to see them get into their chairs, and when it was known they were going to a certain theatre, it was necessary to be very early there, in order to get a seat; and Horace Walpole says that seven hundred people sat up all night in and about an inn in Yorkshire, in order to see the Duchess of Hamilton get into her post-chaise next morning.

But the free, gay Irish girl must surely have found life very tedious in the Duke's Scotch home; for Hamilton was the quintessence of Scotch pride, and in his either above or below that rank, to dine with them at all?" Hardly six years after her marriage the Duke died, and the following year she married Colonel John Campbell, afterwards the Duke of Argyle, thus uniting the two great houses of Hamilton and Campbell.

castle he and his duchess always walked before their company, even in to dinner. They sat together at the upper end of the table, ate out of the same plate and drank to nobody beneath the rank of an earl. "Is it not a wonder," asks Walpole, "how they get anybody,

Eighteen years afterwards she was made Baroness Hamilton in her own right, and lady of the bed-chamber to the young Queen Charlotte, consort of George the Third. Thus the unportioned daughter of an Irish gentleman became the wife of two great dukes, and the mother of four ; for by her first husband she was the mother of the seventh and eighth Dukes of Hamilton, and by her second husband, of the sixth and seventh Dukes of Argyle. She died on the 20th of December, 1790, in the fifty-sixth year of her age.

A contemporary beauty, and by many considered far more fair, because far more intelligent, was the Lady Sarah Lenox, afterwards Lady Sarah Bunbury, and the youngest daughter of the Duke of Richmond. She was celebrated not only for her surpassing loveliness but also for having been the first love of George the Third. "It is well known," says Wraxhall, "that before his marriage he distinguished by his partiality Lady Sarah Lenox, then one of the most beautiful women in the kingdom, and in her seventeenth year. Edward the Fourth, or Henry the Eighth, in his situation, would have married her and placed her on the throne ; Charles the Second would have endeavored to seduce her. But the King subdued his passion by the strength of his principles and his sense of public duty."

It was probably rather weakness of will than strength of principle or public devotion which actuated King George in this matter ; for he certainly summoned a privy council to consider this very subject. This council gave their decided verdict against the King marrying a subject, and the King submitted to the decision. What the lady's feelings were we may guess ; the Duke of Richmond never forgave the slight. The depth of the King's grief and regret was sincere and long. Many years afterwards, when witnessing a performance of Mrs. Pope, who closely resembled his lost first love, he was heard to murmur in a tone of sorrowful abstraction, "She is like Lady Sarah, still !" Walpole says, of all the beauties at the royal wedding "she was by far the chief angel !" and again, in speaking of her performance of the part of Jane Shore in some private theatricals at Holland House, he says : "When Lady Sarah was in white, with her hair about her ears and on the ground, no Magdalen by Corregio was ever half so lovely and expressing." She died at the age of eighty-two, as late on in our century as 1826, the last surviving great-granddaughter of Charles the Second.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

WHEN the Marquise Desmoines received from Fillmore a letter announcing that the defendants in the case of Desmoines vs. Lancaster declined to defend, she uttered a sharp cry, and dropped the letter as if it had been poisonous. That strange sense of justice—of what is fairly due to one as a human being—which is perhaps the last thing to die out of even the least deserving of God's creatures, told her heart that she had been outraged. All things had slipped away from her. Despite all her powers, and her desperate yearning to exercise them, she was powerless. There could scarcely be, for her, a keener suffering. With some natures, the very intensity of anguish is its own partial antidote ; the faculties are so far stunned as to be unable, for a time, to gauge the poignancy of the disaster. But Perdita's clear and vigorous intellect would not permit her such an escape. She immediately saw her position in all its bearings and prospects. Her mind shed a pitiless light upon every aspect of her defeat and humiliation. Something vital within her seemed to gasp and die.

After a long, breathless pause, she took up the letter again, and read it to the end. It contained a request on the part of the writer to be allowed to call on her at a certain hour that evening. It was not difficult to see what that meant. She had made the surrender of herself to Fillmore contingent upon his recovery of the legacy : and he was coming to claim the fulfillment of her promise. She would be called on to play the part of a complaisant fiancée. At this picture, Perdita laughed ; and then, setting her teeth with rage, tore the paper into fragments. Such rage is deadly. Had Fillmore been present, his fiancée would have attempted his life. And yet it was not he that could enrage her : nothing that he could have done could have affected one pulsation of her heart. She had passed into a region of emotion almost infinitely more intense than any with which he could be connected. But, as sometimes a woman will kiss a child or a dog, thinking "this kiss is for my lover !" so might Perdita have driven a dagger to Fillmore's heart, and said, "Be Philip and die !"

She looked at her hands : how white and fine they were,—how beautifully formed ! She rose and walked to and fro in the room ; every movement was grace and elasticity,—the harmonious play of parts exquisitely fashioned and proportioned. She paused before the looking-glass, and contemplated the form and features imaged there. She drew out her comb, and shook down on her shoulders a soft depth of bright-hued hair. She loosened the front of her dress, and exposed a bosom white as milk and curved like the bowl of Ganymede, save for the slight indentation of a scar, on the right breast. She gazed into the sparkling reflection of her eyes, as if some mystery were hidden there. "I have seen no woman more beautiful than you," she said aloud. "What is the use of beauty ? Why was I born ?"

She returned to her chair, and threw herself in it sideways, as a child might do, with her cheek resting against the back, one knee drawn up, her hands folded, her eyelids closed. As she lay thus she looked like a type of lovely and innocent weariness. "Why was I born ?" she repeated in a whisper. Her thoughts strayed back along the vista of her seven and twenty years : from the distance she saw the figure of a little girl, with bright hair and laughing eyes, come tripping onwards, inquisitive, observant, quick-witted, stout-hearted ; fond of her own way, and ready to take her own part ; but good-humored always and tolerant of others. Onward comes the child, growing taller as it advances, beginning now to realize its loneliness in the world, sometimes meditating gravely thereon, but never losing courage; beginning also to realize its own superior gifts, and exercising them experimentally, for the pleasure of the use, and not always with too much heed for the effect on others. Still forward she comes, with a step somewhat less frolicsome, with eyes that look more penetratingly . . . a mind that harbors ambitious thoughts; a face that can conceal as well as express; a confidence in herself and in her fortune: worldly wisdom already, at seventeen years. That great, broad book of the world—of human life and character—with its profundity, its insanity, its pathos, its absurdity, its veins of good, its masses of evil,—the girl Perdita has studied it all, and no mother, no loving friend, has been beside her, to direct her studies, to interpret her discoveries, to correct her errors. . . . Who is this antique figure who now walks beside her, to whose formal and laborious gait she endeavors to accommodate her own: this gray-haired man of more than thrice her age, with his habits, his prejudices, his limitations, his ailments? Is this her husband?—the lord and master of that brilliant, buoyant creature? Ah, Perdita, are you his wife? Do you love him, honor him, obey him? Are he and his possessions the final embodiment and satisfaction of your ambitious dreams? Can you do without love—you, who have never tried what love is? It is ill being prudent before experience, and wise before instruction. Why are your lips so persuasive, your eyes so winning, your touch so caressing?—Why are you so lovely, Perdita? . . . Why were you born?

But still the young wife passes onward, with little misgiving and less regret. There is a great deal of splendor and luxury around her, and she easily makes herself their nucleus and culmination. Famous men pay court to her; wise men listen to her conversation; women criticise and try to imitate her. In the brilliant society of her day and place she is a figure and a topic. Musicians dedicate their compositions to her; poets immortalize her in their rhymes of a season. She is the heroine of a hundred anecdotes, but of not a single romance: very intrepid and adventurous, but with the coldness as well as the sparkle of ice. "Can't make her out," said Lord Fitz Hardinge, who was said to have come to Paris especially to be presented to her. "Don't see how she keeps it up—a woman of her complexion, too. Egad! I have it! The Marquis must be Cupid in disguise!" This mot was repeated until it reached Perdita's ears. "A woman's complexion changes with her company," she said; "and as to the Marquis, my husband, it is better to be a disguised Cupid than a make-believe one." As his Lordship's excesses had somewhat worn upon his constitution, this shaft struck deep and resisted all efforts to extract it. People seldom attacked the Marquise Desmoines more than once.

Meanwhile, Perdita is still sitting in the same position in her chair, one knee drawn up, her hands clasped and her eyelids closed. What vision does she behold now? A handsome room, with polished floor, the walls bright with pictured panels bordered with gold; candles set in burnished sconces: the door opens and her husband enters, leaning on the arm of a tall young man. The stranger is plainly dressed, but his form and bearing are noble: and his face, relieved by the black hair around it, prints itself on her mind, never to be forgotten—so intense and vivid does it seem with life and meaning, yet so composed and clear. A new feeling, strange and sweet, creeps in gentle undulations along Perdita's nerves, and settles in her heart. He sits beside her, and they converse, easily and with mutual pleasure and comprehension; his voice, grave and genial, makes music in her ears; his dark direct glance meets hers—absorbs and mingles with it. She draws fuller breath; this atmosphere, in which she has never lived before, gives her for the first time real life: she understands what she is, and what is possible for her. The Enchanted Prince has awakened the Sleeping Beauty.

The days that follow are like no other days, before or since. He is a poet, but what poetry ever equaled their companionship? The world, with its follies, its emptiness, its formulas, its delusions, seems to stand aside to let them pass. . . . One day they have ridden out with a cavalcade, bound on an expedition of pleasure to some distant chateau. Riding onward, she and he, and drawn insensibly together, they pass fleetly along woodland paths, through dancing shade and sunlight, leaving the others behind, or in advance, perhaps; they have little thought but of each other. Light is Perdita's heart; no shadow has darkened it since that first meeting. The passing moments have filled the capacity of sensation, leaving no room for reflection or forecast; she has never even said to herself, "This is friendship," or "This is love;" enough that it is delight, growth, harmony, beauty: that it lets her know how sweet it is to be a woman. At last, as they ride on, the pinnacles of the chateau taper upward above the trees; anon, before them opens a sweep of lawn, which they cross, and alight at the broad steps that lead up to the door. They are the first to arrive; for half an hour, perhaps, they will have the house to themselves, save for the servants who are preparing the collation below-stairs.

They stroll through the airy rooms, with merry and gentle talk, until at length they enter a hall where, over the chimney-piece, is suspended a pair of antique rapiers. Perdita takes down one of these, and putting herself in posture of offense, bids her companion take the other and defend himself. He complies, and, for a few moments, laughingly parries and pretends to return her thrusts. All at once, as she presses him, his foot slips on the polished floor, and ere he can recover himself he feels his point touch her breast. . . .

At this point of the vision, Perdita slightly changes her position in her chair, and a flush reddens her cheek. She breathes unevenly and her lips move. Ah, that summer noon, so distant now, when she found herself resting in his arms, her riding-habit stained with red blood—his face, his voice, so near, so tender: his touch so gentle! She had looked into his eyes, and laughed softly, in mere joy. Blessed sword! that by drawing her blood had revealed their hearts to each other. But ah! why was the wound not mortal? Was not the wound that it symbolized so? Why had she not died during those few minutes—too few—that had gone by before the sound of voices and horses' hoofs announced the arrival of the party? Had anything that had happened since been worth the trouble of living through it? True, she had hoped; but hope is but the mask of despair, sooner or later to be cast aside. Before her wound was healed, the love which it had discovered had withdrawn itself, never to return. There had been some talk about honor, obligation, duty, prudence—to which she had assented with her lips, while all the rest of her rebelled; for it had not been sin that she contemplated, but only to let her heart love and be loved. Then, a farewell: and afterward a dreary blankness, amidst which she moved hardened, witty, cynical, unreconciled, until these latter days, which were bitter and more disastrous than the first. Why was she born?

Enough of visions! Perdita rose to her feet, and gazed about her. Luxury and beauty surrounded her, as they had always done; but the darkness and wildness that were within her turned all to ugliness and mockery. There was a terrible simplicity in her situation; a fatal lack of resources and alternatives. She walked across the room: something seemed to tread behind her; she turned quickly, but nothing was there. The sense of being dogged—pursued—still remained however. What was it?—fate? She smiled; then shivered nervously, and stood twisting her handkerchief between her fingers. Fate . . . The idea fascinated her. Was her fate so near? and what was it like? Let it appear and declare itself! After a while she began to walk again, but now meditating profoundly. Once she stopped before the fire, and gazed fixedly at the burning coals: then moved away once more, not pacing up and down, but wandering irregularly about the room, knotting and untying her handkerchief; sometimes, in her pre-occupation, almost stumbling against a chair or table. Meanwhile, her usually varying expression had assumed a certain fixedness, and there was a vertical wrinkle between her brows, which seemed not to be caused by drawing her brows together, but to have marked itself there by some other means.

At last she stopped, passing her hands across her eyes and over her hair, which she seemed surprised to find hanging about her shoulders. She twisted it up into place again, adjusted her dress, and after pausing a moment as if to recover the thread of her thoughts, went to a cabinet at the side of the room, and looked attentively at the objects which it contained. They were mostly curiosities and works of art, such as a carved ivory cup, a box of Indian enamel, a vase of Venetian glass, figures in Dresden porcelain, a Chinese idol of silver, an antique locket of wrought gold. From among these objects Perdita selected a small, quaintly-fashioned lamp of pure crystal; it was of Persian manufacture, and bore some figures or letters of enigmatic purport, perhaps having reference to the tenets of the ancient fire-worshippers. She examined this lamp curiously, wiping away the dust with her handkerchief, and assuring herself that it contained no crack or imperfection. Finally she placed it upon the table near the fire; and having rung the bell, bade the servant summon Madame Cabot.

"Madame," said the Marquise, when the old lady appeared, "I am expecting some one to call here this evening,—Monsieur Fillmore."

"Yes, Madame la Marquise."

"I wish you to lay out the black satin gown, and the diamonds,—you understand?"

"Yes, Madame la Marquise."

"I am going out now,—alone: I shall not need your company. If any one calls in the meantime, say I shall not return until to-morrow. At no time to-day is any one to be admitted except Monsieur Fillmore: he will arrive about seven o'clock. Will you attend to this?"

"Certainly, Madame la Marquise. Will Madame dine at the usual hour?"

"No; you will dine by yourself to-day. That is all."

"Au revoir, Madame la Marquise."

The old lady courtesied and went out. Perdita sat down at her desk and wrote several letters, which she locked up in a drawer. Her dejection seemed to have been lightened: her demeanor was grave, but not oppressed or unnatural. Occasionally she would fall into reverie for a few minutes, but the abstraction was not painful, and was easily cast aside. In the course of an hour or so she closed her desk, and going to her room, put on a dark pelisse and veiled bonnet, and went out.

The sky was overcast, and the air cold; but there was neither rain nor wind. The streets were full of people, and the shops were doing a thriving trade in Christmas goods. Perdita mingled with the crowd, and seemed to take pleasure in observing them: in gazing into the shop windows, shoulder to shoulder with them: in listening to the confused noise of voices, tramping feet, and rattling wheels. On the Strand she happened to notice four ragged children flattening their noses against the glass of a candy-shop. "I choose this," said one little girl. "Oh! I choose this!" said another, in the pride of superior discernment. "Don't yer wish yer may git it?" remarked a boy, the eldest of the party, with gloomy cynicism. "Come in here, youngsters," said Perdita; "you shall have all the candy you want!" With the matter-of-course acceptance of miracles characteristic of children, they followed her into the shop, and presently came forth again with candy enough to last them for a week. None of them thanked her, any more than we thank the sun for shining through a break in the clouds—the supposition being that the sun is made for that purpose. But Perdita was not in need of gratitude. She wanted to feel the actual contact of human creatures for a few hours, and that was all. Resuming her walk, she passed through St. Paul's churchyard, and along Chancery Lane, where she entered a shop and made one or two purchases on her own account. Thence she turned in a southerly direction, and presently came in sight of London Bridge. It was a quaint, narrow, high-backed structure, with jutting piers, affording spaces for venders of apples and other cheap merchandise to set up their little stalls. The bridge was roaring with vehicles and crowded with foot-passengers; there was no noisier or more populous place in London. There was a high balustrade on each side; but by stepping upon one of the semicircular stone seats over the piers, it was possible to look over at the broad stream beneath. Perdita did this, and remained for a long time, absorbed by the spectacle. The brown river, rushing at the arches of the bridge, fell through them in boiling cataracts, with a sound that was audible over the tumult of the vehicles and the foot-passengers above. On either bank, the wharves were thronged with shipping—straight masts and cobweb cordage, dense as primeval forests. Black chimneys belched forth blacker smoke, which trailed and brooded over the city: huge, ugly buildings of stone or brick looked down into the dark water. Millions of human beings had done all this: millions of human beings lived and moved here, labored and hungered, fought and conquered, struggled and succumbed, were born and died. Here was the centre and concentration of the human race, the culmination of the history of five thousand years; and what a gloomy, dirty, toiling, roaring, sordid Babel it was! And yet, what a strong charm and attraction! We battle and shout and hope in the face of death; we know that our hopes are vain and that death is sure; we know that life is weariness and that death is rest; we bury our parents and know that our children shall bury us; and still generation succeeds generation—appears and disappears—and each maintains the turmoil with as much energy and earnestness as if to it alone belonged not the present only, but likewise the future and the past. Earthly life, the oldest of all deceivers, the mightiest of all hypocrites, exposed and condemned at each passing moment of recorded time—by what spell does it still retain its mastery over us? Does it inspire the wish to be cheated that it gratifies? or is there something behind—within it—some reality whereof it is but the symbol, which leads us onward to another goal than that we aimed at,—a goal which, were it revealed to us, we never should attain?

Chilled by long contact with the stone parapet, Perdita stepped down from her perch, and returned along the bridge. In one of the narrow streets leading toward Cheapside, she noticed a small inn or ordinary, where a card nailed to the door-post announced that a dinner was to be had inside at a cheap rate. Perdita entered; the place was low and dark, and was tolerably full of customers, most of whom were seated at opposite sides of the little oblong tables projecting at right angles from the walls. A man, seeing Perdita stand there, made room for her beside him. He wore a dirty fur cap and a top-coat of coarse cloth; had a bold, not unhandsome face, and powerful but by no means clean hands. A plate full of some sort of food was put before Perdita, and she began to eat. The man who had nearly finished his dinner, now called for a pot of ale; and having glanced at Perdita once or twice, he addressed her:

"Say, my dear, you're a good-looking gal, do you know that?"

"Yes," said Perdita, "other men have told me so."

"What's your name?"

"Perdita."

"Perdita? Rum name, that! What's your lay?"

"Nothing, in particular."

"Flush, eh? Made a haul?"

Perdita nodded.

"Hello! you," said the man, raising his voice, "fetch 'arf a pint for this lady."

The ale was brought, and Perdita raised it to her lips, saying, "Here's your health!"

"Same to you, my dear," said the man, taking a gulp from his pewter. "By G—! you're one of the right sort. Do you know who I am?"

Perdita looked at him. "You're a stout fellow," she said; "you look as if you could take your own part. Are you a highwayman?"

"Easy! none of that!" exclaimed the man, in a low tone, catching her by the shoulder. Perdita eyed him composedly, and he presently relinquished his grasp, and chuckled. "All right," he said, "I see you know a thing or two. Now, look here. I ain't got no mort. What do you say—shall we strike hands? You and me together can do good business. What do you say?"

"What do you mean by mort?"

"Come, now? Walker! Well, wife, if you like."

"Do you mean that you'll marry me?"

"As sure as my name's—what it is!" said the man.

"Will you take care of me, and beat any man who insults me?"

"Yes, I will!"

"I have a great mind to let you marry me," said Perdita, after a pause. "You'd be as good as anybody else, and perhaps better. But I've been married once, and I don't think I shall ever marry again. I'm going to do something else."

"What?"

"That's no business of yours."

"Can't yer marry me and do that, too?"

"No."

"Well, look here! Think it over. I've got money, and I can make things easy for you. You'll find me here to-morrow. I ain't often met the woman I'd take to as quick as I would to you. Think it over. You ain't got any other chap in your eye, have yer?"

"I'll promise you this much," said Perdita; "if I don't marry you, I'll marry no one else."

"And will you be here to-morrow?"

"If I'm alive."

"That's hearty! Well, good-by, my dear, if you must go. Give us a kiss, won't yer?"

"Why?"

"Because I'm fond of yer."

"Truly?"

"Honor bright!"

"You may kiss me," said Perdita; and when he had done so, she added, "You have done what no other man will ever do. Good-bye!"

When the Marquise reached home, it was after five o'clock. In the dressing-room she found Madame Cabot; the black satin dress was laid out on the sofa, and the diamonds were on the dressing-table. The Marquise performed her toilet carefully, and when it was completed, she scrutinized her appearance with unusual deliberation. "Do I look well, Madame Cabot?" she asked at length.

"I have never seen Madame la Marquise look more beautiful."

Perdita smiled. "Well, I have need to look beautiful to-night. The gentleman whom I expect to-night—Monsieur Fillmore—is coming to claim my promise to marry him. A woman should appear beautiful in the eyes of her bridegroom, should she not, Madame Cabot?"

"Without doubt! Madame la Marquise is then resolved to marry?"

"I have resolved to change my condition," said Perdita. "I am tired of this lonely life, and am going to make an end of it."

"May Madame enjoy every happiness!"

"I don't think of that—I don't expect it!" said the Marquise, after a pause. "After my experience, Madame Cabot, I should be a fool to look forward to happiness, either in this state or in any other. But it will be a change, at least: a great change!" She added, after a moment, "I have spoken to you of this, because, when the change comes, I shall not any longer need your services. You have been comfortable with me, I hope, madame?"

"It will be a great grief to me to leave Madame la Marquise."

The Marquise seemed gratified. "You will be able to make yourself comfortable in your own way, hereafter," she said. "I have arranged that you shall want for nothing in the future . . . Well, you may leave me now. Remember that no one is to be admitted but Monsieur Fillmore; and that I am not to be disturbed till he comes."

"I shall not forget, Madame."

"Good-night."

"Good-night, Madame la Marquise, and much felicity!"

Perdita went into her boudoir and locked the door. The candles were lighted, the fire was burning cheerfully, everything was warm and luxurious. Perdita held in her hands a large vial containing a colorless fluid, and something done up in a piece of paper. These she placed on the table, beside the crystal Persian lamp, which has already been mentioned. She drew a chair to the table, and seating herself in it, unfolded the paper, which proved to contain a small wick. This she inserted in the lamp, and then filled the lamp full of the colorless fluid from the vial. Finally, she lit the wick from one of the candles. It burned with a pale bluish flame, emitting, however, an intense heat.

After contemplating this flame awhile, and testing its ardor by passing her hand over it, Perdita rose up nervously, and glanced around her. She had suddenly grown very pale, and her eyes looked black. Her lips also were white, and for a moment they trembled; but only for a moment. She held herself erect, and raised her head, looking straight before her across the table, as if at some one who stood on the other side. Her expression, at first, was haughty; but gradually it softened, and at last became exquisitely tender and gentle. Her bosom rose and fell with a long sigh. . . .

She raised her hands, and clasped them firmly over her eyes. She stooped quickly down, until her lips almost touched the bluish flame of the lamp, at the same instant drawing in a sharp, deep breath, that made the flame leap far down her throat. She tried to do it a second time, but only partially succeeded. She reeled backward, uttering no sound, and fell, as she had wished to do, on the sofa. A few convulsive movements shook her, and then she lay still, her head thrown back, and her eyes half closed. Her position had not altered by a hair's breadth when, an hour later, the door was broken open, and Fillmore came in.

Perdita's death was known to many persons in London that same night; but the news did not reach Hammersmith until the next morning. It so happened that Marion was the first to receive it, by a messenger from Lady Flanders. She read the few lines, scarcely comprehending their purport; but after waiting a few moments, she read them again, and understood them. She returned up-stairs with difficulty, for all strength seemed to have gone out of her. She entered the room in which Philip was, but was unable to speak. She held the paper toward him.

"From Lady Flanders, eh?" said he, recognizing the handwriting. "An invitation to dinner I suppose." He read what was written, and silence fell upon him.

Marion, though she would gladly have turned her eyes away from him, could not do so. She saw the change that came over his face, and it made her heart faint. He kept his eyes down, gazing at the paper, and it seemed to Marion as if he were never going to raise them. The suspense became more than she could bear, and it gave her the power to use her voice.

"Do you know why she did it, Philip?" was her question.

He looked up, at last, with a slow and heavy movement, as if his eyelids were weighted, and met his wife's gaze gloomily.

"If I do know," he said, "it was for something very worthless."

"Have you . . . anything to tell me?" asked Marion, just audibly.

"Perdita was honest and noble: she died pure. There is nothing to tell. A priest would absolve me; I can never absolve myself. Many a man who has sinned is worthier to be your husband than one who has avoided sin as I have."

There followed a deep silence. Then Marion moved a step nearer to him, and said, "Do you love me, Philip?"

"I used to say 'yes' last summer," he replied; "I thought I could do anything and be anything, then. Now it seems to me that I am nothing, and can do nothing. Whether I love you, or not, years must tell you, not words. Such men as I are the curse of the earth."

"You are not a curse to me!" said Marion, putting her arms around him, and looking up in his face. "You are my husband, and I love you: and neither years nor words shall make me believe you do not love your wife!"

[THE END.]

UNDERGRADUATE LIFE AT HARVARD.

"THE Harvard man does not conform to any fixed pattern in thought, word or action. . . . He is patriotic—in a degree. He is blasé—in a degree. He is a man of one idea—with a few more added. Nihil nimis, and not nimis even of nihil nimis (nothing too much, and not too much even of nothing too much), is the unconscious rule of life with him. . . . He has assurance—which seldom degenerates into impudence. He is a paradox—a man who has no distinctive characteristics, but is nevertheless entirely sui generis."

A pretty good portraiture this! and made by one of those whom it describes—having appeared not long ago in The Crimson, one of the five journals—two of them dailies—which are published by the undergraduates of Harvard University. Yet every such attempt to delineate a type must necessarily be rather vague in outline; and whether it will convey any distinct idea to dwellers at a distance, is more than doubtful. Outside of the limited circle of his own college life, the Harvard student is probably the least understood and the most persistently misrepresented of human beings. Not long ago an undergraduate received a request from a prominent New England paper to furnish three articles on college life, "to be written in a racy and exaggerated style, with just enough basis of fact to give the whole a coloring of truth."

To many a reader of religious journals, and especially of a certain recent novel, the Harvard student figures as a monster of iniquity—a cold-blooded rationalist, a dangerous companion for one's daughters, an idle spendthrift; in fine, a riotous, aristocratic debauché. To others he figures as a mere oarsman or batsman; while people who see the satirical sketches and cartoons published by the students, imagine that they are all swells—callow youths, with cigarettes, eye-glasses and canes; ridiculous creatures with bowed legs and arms and a peculiar gait—dress, outré in every respect; every superfluity pared away—very little hat, very little hair, very little brains; trousers painfully tight, coat-tails none, individuality nil. There are, it is true, a few disolute men, a few athletes and a few "howling" swells at Harvard; but the representative Harvard student is something quite different from any one of these types. As a matter of fact, he is simply a quiet, studious young man, only to be distinguished from other well-dressed young men by a certain air of intellectualism and that appearance of lofty disdain which characterizes students everywhere, especially those who are supported by the money of their parents and not by their own earnings. It is an error to suppose that more than a very few indeed of the Harvard students are intemperate or licentious. A man of licentious habits would be inwardly despised and treated with general coolness and reserve. The worst vices of even the "fast" students are the immoderate smoking of cigarettes, the occasional imbibing of beer at "Carl's," or of bottled beer and wine in their own rooms. Moderate drinking is indulged in by a few class exquisites, not because they are particularly fond of the liquors, but because they fancy it gives them an air of manliness and removes the stigma of freshness and inexperience which is impressed on their young and blooming faces. But the majority of the students do not drink strong liquors. One of the latest organizations at Harvard is the "Total Abstinence League." It was much laughed at by the students when started, because it seemed wholly unnecessary. Although only a few weeks old the society has at this writing some seventy-five members.

Neither is the Harvard student a mere athlete; only a very small proportion of each class makes a business of athletics. Then, finally, the Harvard man is really not so very aristocratic after all. At heart he is pretty much of a democrat. When from four hundred to six hundred young men, rich and poor, high and low, partake of the same fare in the same dining-hall, there is very little room for aristocratic pretension. It is a common remark in the college that there a man is estimated at his real worth, and all pretense and conceit is covered with ridicule.

During the past fifteen years a wonderful change in the undergraduate life has taken place. The sleep of the Cambridge citizen was once broken by the uproarious singing of students in the streets. Now it is very rare to hear any boisterous midnight singing—such out-door singing as there is being confined to the college yard, where it seems appropriate and pleasant. The old tricks upon property are now unheard of. Professors are no longer the natural enemy of the student. The old "cane-rushes" and terrible foot-ball fights are no more. It was formerly the custom, on the first Monday of the college year, for the sophomores to request the freshmen to meet them in the gymnasium, where a certain number of freshmen were tossed in blankets. This day was called "Bloody Monday." It has disappeared entirely from the traditional calendar. All such things as this belong to a long-past mesozoic era of Harvard life—to a time when the institution was a narrow college of the humanities, with an iron-bound curriculum, rather than a broad and liberal university, such as it is now—a place where young men are treated as gentlemen, and taught to love study for its own sake. The causes which have produced this radical change in the deportment of the students are partly the increased size of the classes, partly the more mature age of the students, but chiefly the elective system of studies, which gives to the young man a sense of responsibility and a feeling of manly independence. Two hundred years ago Harvard undergraduates studied Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, the Bible, the Catechism, Rhetoric, Arithmetic, Ethics, Logic and Greek in the ponderous octavos styled Collectanea Græca Majora C. G. Minora. What they study to-day may be seen in the Elective Pamphlet for 1882-83, which offers one hundred and fifty courses of study, twenty of which are in modern languages, four in Sanskrit and Zend, eighteen in natural history, six in the fine arts, etc. Elective studies, introduced at Harvard by Professor George Ticknor in 1825, flourished for twenty years, suffered a reaction, reappeared in 1867, and have since proved so successful that to-day in the sophomore, junior and senior classes there are no prescribed studies except themes and forensics. Rhetoric is prescribed for the sophomores, but may be avoided by an examination. It may not be generally known that quite recently the faculty of the college took a formal vote as to the propriety of making all the studies in the college course elective. The vote was nearly a tie, but the measure was lost. One of the objections of those who opposed the measure was that the average age of the Harvard freshman is only eighteen, while it is well known that when the students of German gymnasia obtain their Abiturientenprüfung, and enter the university, they are twenty-one years old on an average.

But the system as at present in operation works admirably. As far back as 1841, in President Quincy's time, it was proved that severe studies were not shirked under the elective system, and they are not to-day. The student, often with the advice of professors or parents, blocks out for his four years' course a plan of study which he feels to be suitable to his powers and best conducive to the symmetrical development of his nature. Most students select wisely. Of course there is a tendency for a few of the athletic men to choose the easiest studies, without reference to organic interdependence; and men studying for scholarships are tempted to take studies in which they can secure the highest marks. But these cases form only a fraction of the system. The old compulsory recitation, with marks, has disappeared. The recitation has become a conference. The student meets his instructor, not because he is obliged to, but because he can master his subject better with his help. The instructor often does the reciting himself, expounding and illustrating his subject, and occasionally calling on some member of the class to read or explain. In this way ground is rapidly traversed and everybody's time saved.

The courses in natural history, especially geology, are very popular, as are also the courses in fine arts. Mathematics holds its own steadily, and there is only a slight falling off in the study of the Greek and Latin classics. Indeed, the spirit of work for work's sake has permeated every department of the college, and it is becoming evident that Harvard is rapidly acquiring many of the characteristics of German universities, minus their barbarities and vices.

With the rise of the elective system the old class lines fade away, and social, intellectual and athletic organizations wax apace in number and in influence. Here again we see a resemblance to the German university, with its Kneipen, Seminarien, etc. Many of the societies at Harvard now have a membership equal to that of former classes. Previous to the revival of the elective system in 1867, there were but sixteen undergraduate organizations; now there are over forty. Many of them are for social purposes, but the majority have in view either intellectual or physical development. For examples of the intellectual society, take the Finance Club, the Historical Society, and the Harvard Union. One of the most famous of the social clubs is the Hasty Pudding, or "The Pudding," as it is popularly called. In the year 1795 the students were in the habit of carrying their pewter bowls to the buttery, at the east end of Harvard Hall, to receive each a piece of bread and a bowl of milk. One of them, wishing to vary his fare, engaged an old lady to make him "hasty pudding"—Indian meal pudding—regularly for his supper. Several classmates followed his example, and the Hasty Pudding Club was formed. Meetings were held "at the ringing of the evening commons' bell." The constitution of the society states that the purpose of the club was not merely to eat pudding, but "to cherish the feelings of friendship and patriotism." It further provides that "two members in alphabetical order shall provide a pot of hasty pudding for every meeting." The members still indulge in hasty pudding on certain festal occasions. The colors of the society are white and corn color, in allusion to their historical dish of fare. A prominent feature of the club is its burlesque theatricals, given in its own hall. The costumes of the actors in these plays are rich and varied. The singing is generally fair, and the small but choice audience, enveloped in cigar smoke, is in the best of humors, and never fails to applaud vigorously, in accordance with the intimation painted upon the stage curtain—" Seges votis respondet." The curtain is a pretty affair: in the centre the comic muse is seen, gallantly advancing in a chariot drawn by a crocodile, and a sphinx with prominent breasts. The crocodile is flourishing his heels in the air, and his eyes have a most wicked and mischievous expression. On each side of the curtain are grotesque and laughable figures in comic masks. The performance is warm and rich in its ensemble effect, delightfully cosy and merry, reminding one of the castle theatricals in "Wilhelm Meister" or of the more extensive Yale Thanksgiving Jubilee performances—in short, a genuine "he-festival," to use Walt Whitman's abominable but expressive phrase.

From hasty pudding the transition to college commons is easy. In old times the college furnished regular board, as well as "sizings," or extras, to the students; and many of its dues were paid in provisions, such as "porke," "rose-watter," "pullettes," "ane old Cow 4 quarters . . . and her hide . . . her suett and inwards," "two wether goots," "a ferking of soop," "tobacko," "a red ox," "appelles," etc. Some sixty-seven years ago commons were eaten in University Hall, the students messing at various tables, and the tutors and resident graduates occupying tables upon a dais, as at Oxford and Cambridge. On a certain occasion, according to the Hon. Henry Kemble Oliver, while the students were waiting for the arrival of the tutors, the door between the rooms occupied by the freshmen and sophomores being open, a freshman at a table near by, not having obtained his potato, and none remaining, invoked a friendly sophomore to supply the needful. Immediate compliance followed, and a bouncer came hurtling through the air, and plunged perchance into a bowl of milk, if nothing worse,—grava-men causa offensiois—spattering over everything and everybody. With a whoop and a hurrah, and some unparadisical idioms interjected, the fugitive vegetable was returned, and then came the tug of war, in which the two full hosts engaged, until the arrival of the upper-table officials ended the sport, and an unseemly and foolish sport it was.

The contrast between this early commons and the splendid Memorial Hall Dining Association of to-day is as strong as the contrast between the narrow little Puritan College of that time and the present Harvard University. The well-clad and suave Harvard student now dines in a splendid cathedral room sixty feet broad by one hundred and forty-nine feet long and measuring eighty feet to the roof. Ranged in perspective on either wall are rich portraits in oil of famous men, relieved here and there by a white bust of some alumnus famous in the annals of the world.

The students' wants are attended to by colored waiters, who can always be bribed by a little douceur. The sunlight falls through "storied windows richly dight," and stains with Iris the snowy linen of fifty tables. On six courses dines the esthetic Harvard man; and he often feels disposed to grumble at destiny if his pocket-book will not permit him to indulge in such extras as fresh salmon, strawberries in February, and all the delicacies that belong to the ménu of a first-class hotel.

Such a thing as a marked violation of good breeding is almost unknown at these tables. For six years from four hundred to six hundred students have eaten together in this the largest college dining hall in the world, and no disturbance whatever has occurred. Indeed, such a thing would be impossible among young men so well bred. The nearest approach to a demonstration that is ever made, is when a thoughtless onlooker in the visitors' gallery neglects to take off his hat. It may be mentioned that the occasional appearance in the gallery of objectionable female characters has recently led the students to vote the refusal of the hall during meal hours to all who do not hold tickets obtained from some member of the dining association. The fare is a little monotonous, but it is rich, well cooked and abundant. Students often remark that in Memorial Hall they get seven-dollar board for four or five dollars.

The religious culture of the students to-day, as formerly, is provided for by college preaching and by morning prayers. Since four-fifths of its students are not Unitarians, but either Trinitarians or undecided, the university very properly is unsectarian in its religious instruction. During the winter of 1881-82 a course of theological lectures was given in the Divinity School by the Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D. (Congregationalist). The professor of Hebrew and other oriental languages—Dr. Crawford H. Toy—is a Baptist; and for the past two years morning prayers have been conducted in turn by nine different ministers, belonging to four different denominations. During the same time Sunday services have been conducted by eminent ministers of various denominations. At morning prayers in Appleton Chapel the musical service is conducted by a college choir. In 1881 the responsive reading of a psalm was introduced into the service by the Rev. Drs. Edward E. Hale and Phillips Brooks, who conducted prayers during the months of October and November in that year. The students all rise during the reading of the psalm, and a large proportion of them join in the responsive reading.

Appleton Chapel is a rather dingy and sepulchral place, contrasting poorly with Yale's cheerful and richly sculptured Battell Chapel. It is known to everybody that from time immemorial students of every college have looked upon daily perfunctory prayers as the bugbear of their lives. To stand over a young man with a policeman's club and compel him to worship, hardly conduces either to the glory of God or to the student's religious edification. Coercion at Harvard especially is something anomalous and discordant. In 1880 a circular was sent to the parents or guardians of some eight hundred undergraduates, asking if they held daily family prayers in their households. The object was to find out "how much support morning prayers at college had in the habits of the families from which the students came." Out of seven hundred and forty-one replies received, two hundred and eleven answered Yes, and five hundred and thirty answered No.

One of the distinctive features of the college to-day is formed by the college undergraduate journals, of which there are five, two of them dailies. How the grim austerity of early days would have frowned upon the light, satirical humor of the present Harvard journals! It is not too much to say that these journals have called into existence a distinct variety of American humor. Reference is had to the satirical burlesques of American social life, which for some years past have been appearing in the columns of The Harvard Advocate, The Crimson and The Lampoon. Many of the pieces are broadly farcical, like the pages of Punch. But social satires, like the Little Tin Gods on Wheels, and many others, have a delicate fruit-bloom humor entirely their own. They rank rather with Thackeray than with Punch.

Since the subject of college athletics is a staple one with the newspaper press, it will only be touched upon lightly here, and what is said shall be chiefly of a descriptive nature.

Just back of the house where Oliver Wendell Holmes was born is an extensive common, called Holmes' Field. Across the intervening street on the north side lies Jarvis' Field. Upon one side of the Holmes House is situated the Hemenway Gymnasium, and on the other ground has been broken for the new Law School building. Holmes' Field is largely used by lawn-tennis players. On a fine afternoon the great field is almost covered by their white nets, as if huge spiders had been spinning there. The field is also used at certain times by the Lacrosse team, by the foot-ball team, for "scrub" games of base ball and for cricket.

Jarvis' Field, with its level surface and cinder-laid track, is used for athletic exhibitions, bicycling, walking, and, in part also, by the omnipresent lawn-tennis man, with his white flannel suit and nimble bat.

The luxurious new gymnasium, with its pendent apparatus, its numerous bowling alleys, its elaborate machinery for the development of every muscle in the body, its hot and cold-water baths, lockers, dressing-rooms, running track, club-room and rowing-room, has been the means of making gymnastic exercise attractive to nearly all the students in college. As one of them has said, "It is better for the whole college to have health and strength than to have all the muscle of the college embodied in the eight men who pull the oar, or the eleven who kick the leather sphere." In the year 1881, seven hundred and twelve students paid for lockers in the gymnasium—a good index of its use. Much of the interest taken by the young men in gymnastic exercise is due to the thorough and enthusiastic work of the young director, Dr. Dudley Allen Sargent. To show what can be done in such a place consider the following: A student, nineteen years of age, was examined January 20, 1880. At that time his actual strength, reckoned on a scale of 500 for the normal man, was 377.5. After a year and three months of faithful exercise his actual strength was found to be 600.

In the display of rich colors class-day at Harvard bears away the palm—the red-letter day in the college calendar, a festival blazing in purple and crimson sheen, the enjoyment of a year crowded into twenty-four hours, a day crowned with perfumes and with flowers, poetized by a most bewildering array of sweet faces with tender, glancing eyes, and ending at night with dance, with music and with song. Class-day comes five days before commencement, in the latter end of June, when the air is almost invariably soft and mildly tempered, the skies bright and the staid New England heart correspondingly light and gay.

At half-past nine in the morning the seniors form in procession and march to Appleton Chapel for prayers. At half past eleven o'clock they again assemble, looking distressingly uncomfortable in their ghastly-immaculate dress-suits and unaccustomed silk hats, and march to Sanders' Theatre, with a band of music at their head. Then follows the delivery of the oration, poem, ivy-oration and class-ode—in the course of which any allusion to the college victories on field or stream is received with thunderous applause. At the close of the meeting come the "spreads," or lunches, given by the students in their rooms and elsewhere, to such of their friends as are present. The rooms are usually tastefully decorated with flowers. At the general spreads given by the societies, or by wealthy individual students, more than a thousand guests are often entertained by a single set of men. In the afternoon there is promenading in the college yard, with music from the lofty stand in the centre thereof. At half-past four the college buildings are cheered by the seniors, and at five occurs the dance around the class-elm. The tree (rugged old giant), doubtless glad at heart over his rich collar of flowers, spreads his leafy shield benignantly over the fair forms seated below; then watches how the black-coated fellows despoil him of his flowers and utters never a word of censure. While the seniors in the centre are struggling to reach the high-placed wreath, the three lower classes circle rapidly about them in three concentric rings, the outer and the inner rings moving in one direction and the centre one in another. It would probably be difficult to find in the world just such another company of delicately complexioned, fragile, blooming young ladies as assemble to witness this spectacle, and to partake of the general festivities of the day. The display of rich and lustrous dresses—sky-blue, lavender, milk-white and pink silks and satins—is really remarkable.

After the exercises at the class tree, many of the guests are invited to "teas," and the same evening occurs the President's reception. At night the college yard, enclosed with pales and guarded, is crowded with happy promenaders and invited sight-seers. A universal hum fills the air, "like the low murmur of a hive at noon," and ever and anon, at the sweet, brazen clamor of the music, the steps of the promenaders quicken and their young hearts beat high: they move to and fro beneath the fairy light of ten thousand colored lanterns, while from time to time red lights throw gigantic nodding shadows on the lurid college walls, and fireworks blazon forth in many-colored gems, mottoes and figures appropriate to the time. A feature of the evening is the singing of class-songs by the Glee Club. Years ago attempts were made to arrange dances on the sward, but they were not popular. "Our grounds," remarks James Russell Lowell, "lack the seclusion and our summer climate the temperance favorable to what Cotton Mather would have called hypæthral saltation; and as for the prolonged gymnastics of the German in the embrowning shade of Harvard Hall with the thermometer at 90° in the shade, they are an insane anachronism, belonging rather to the age of 'Fox's Book of Martyrs' than our own."

At the present day the dancing takes place in several buildings simultaneously, but chiefly in Memorial Hall, whose vast and high-roofed nave is airily garnished for the occasion with drooping smilax and lustrous flowers, and snowed over, as to its floor, with whitest wax. Swift fly the twinkling feet to the sound of the softly-pulsing violins. The seared and whitened face of old Judge William Stoughton stares from its canvas in Puritanical horror at the scene, and seems to grow a shade paler than it was when he figured in the witch trials. Cardinal Bentivoglio winks weirdly and slyly with one painted eye, and the massive face of old Samuel Adams actually seems to relax into a genial smile as he looks out from his corner there under the gallery. When the wee hours draw near, the wee feet cease to move, and the brave and fair alike go home to dream.

Class-day has entirely overshadowed commencement as a festive occasion, the latter being now purely official and formal in nature, very stiff, very dignified and very dull—to outsiders.

THE HOUSEHOLD—MY PRESERVES.

My Preserves.

MAY a harassed female pour out her woes in the pages of THE CONTINENT? May I state a few strictly feminine grievances, and beseech some one of the housekeeping sisterhood to give me the benefit of her experience on the subject of preserving?

This art used to be considered a necessary and indispensable part of a woman's education, and, when I look back to my grandmother's light-colored peaches, her currant jelly, that always turned out; her quinces, her raspberry jam—all excellent of their kind—I shrink into myself in shame and mortification at the thought of my lame imitations of her productions. When I compare my whitish, shapeless strawberries (or, if not whitish, of a dingy brown,) with hers, that looked like strawberries, I despise myself, and despise with equal zeal the preserves I make, benefitted, too, as I am, by modern improvements, air-tight jars, and what I like to consider common-sense notions, slightly flavored with ideas got from what somebody aptly calls the "easy corners" of science.

Now when I "do" my strawberries, what am I doing? I don't know. I consult an oracle—my grandmother or a cookery book—not much matter which.

Oracle No. 1 says: "Boil your sugar very well. If the sugar is not thoroughly boiled, your fruit will not keep."

Oracle No. 2 says: "Do not boil the sugar; boil the fruit. The sugar merely requires drying or warming."

Oracle No. 3 says: "What you require is combination. Boil sugar and fruit well together."

Appealing once to a chemist on the subject of boiling sugar, his reply was: "Never boil sugar—you turn it to molasses."

I would remark in passing that there is an unexplained mystery about currant jelly, which, in utter defiance of the idea that by boiling you drive off water and thereby thicken it, actually becomes thinner by continued heat.

"Skimming" is another puzzle. Why skim? Some oracles say you are skimming the sugar; others that it is the fruit. I do it sometimes; sometimes not—the result is the same whether done or left undone. One oracle says you are skimming albumen. Perhaps I am.

But the great and lasting and apparently insurmountable difficulty is "mould."

"Use the air-tight jars," say the oracles. Mould laughs at my air-tight jars. "Dip a piece of paper in brandy," says another oracle; "lay it on top of your jar." I lay paper dipped in brandy on top. The mould laughs louder than before; brandy evaporates; the paper makes a nice, smooth surface for the mould, which spreads itself in a thick mass, sometimes of a dull bluish color, sometimes of a dark purple, sometimes in the form of a black dust, tainting my sweetmeat to the utmost depths of the jar.

What matter to me that it is no doubt beautiful to any one having a microscope and time to use it? Branching plants, no doubt; ferns, fruit, flowers and nuts, perhaps, in exquisite profusion, but to me only mould. Will any one tell me what to do? In despair I appeal to my sex. Don't say, O my sex, in answer, "Put your jars in a dry place." I have tried that. Say something else.

A LITTLE COMPANY.

Amber Soup.

Salmon, with Lobster Sauce. Cucumbers.

Chicken Croquettes.

Beef à la mode.

Potatoes. Green Corn. Egg Plant. Beets.

Reed Birds in cases.

Tomato Salad, with Mayonnaise Dressing.

Cheddar Cheese. Wafers.

Green Apple Pie. Raspberry Ice. Cake.

Watermelon.

Coffee.

AMBER SOUP.—One soup bone—two or three pounds, a small slice of ham, one chicken, one onion, half a small carrot, half a parsnip, a stick of celery or a teaspoonful of celery essence, two teaspoonfuls of salt and one even one of pepper, four cloves, two tablespoonfuls of butter, whites and shells of two eggs; brown the beef bone or two pounds of lean beef in the butter; brown the onion, and then stick the cloves in it. Put over all the ingredients with one gallon of cold water, boiling slowly for four hours. Take out the chicken when tender, which will need from one hour to two, according to age. Strain the soup into a jar and leave over night. Next day remove the cake of fat from the top, take out the soup, which will probably be a jelly, avoiding the settlings; beat the whites of the eggs and the broken shells with a spoonful of water and mix in. Bring all just to boiling point, skim off all the egg from the top, without stirring the soup itself, and strain through a jelly bag. It can then be re-heated before serving. If more color is desired, brown one tablespoonful of sugar in a small saucepan, and when a bright brown add half a cup of water and let boil a moment, then strain into the soup.

SALMON, WITH LOBSTER SAUCE.—Salmon must be put into boiling water to preserve the color. Allow two tablespoonfuls of salt and two of vinegar to the water, or the juice of a lemon, and allow eight minutes to the pound for boiling. If there is no fish kettle sew in a cloth, that it may be taken out without breaking. For the sauce, make half a pint of drawn butter, chop the meat from the tail and claws of a lobster into small bits; add this to the drawn butter, with a pinch of cayenne.

CHICKEN CROQUETTES.—Cut the meat of the chicken used in the soup into small dice; mince a small onion and two sprigs of parsley very fine; melt in a saucepan a piece of butter large as an egg; add the onion and parsley, and two heaping tablespoonfuls of sifted flour, and stir till a bright brown; then add slowly, stirring steadily, a cup and a half of stock. Stir till perfectly smooth, remove from fire; add the juice of quarter of a lemon, half a small nutmeg grated, one teaspoonful of salt and half a teaspoonful of pepper. Last, stir in the chicken, and when cold mould into croquette shape, egg and crumb, and fry in boiling lard. If moulded in pear shape, stick a clove in the small end when fried, to imitate the stem.

BEEF À LA MODE.—As per rule in No. 26 of OUR CONTINENT.

POTATOES.—As in No. 2 of OUR CONTINENT.

GREEN CORN.—If young and tender, twenty minutes boiling will be sufficient. Serve in a napkin.

EGG PLANT.—Peel and remove the seeds; boil half an hour in salted water; mash fine, stir in two beaten eggs, two tablespoonfuls of milk, two of flour, half a teaspoonful of salt, and a saltspoonful of pepper; drop in spoonfuls in a little hot butter and fry brown.

BEETS.—As per rule in No. 5 of OUR CONTINENT.

REED BIRDS IN CASES.—The rule is one adopted by Henry Ward Beecher. Cut sweet potatoes lengthwise; scoop out a place large enough for half the bird; season each with butter, pepper and salt, tying the two pieces of potato around them. Bake in a quick oven about forty-five minutes, and serve in the potatoes.

TOMATO SALAD.—As in No. 19 of OUR CONTINENT.

GREEN APPLE PIE.—Make a puff paste, or rich pie crust, and line a deep pie plate; fill high with tender, acid apples, sprinkling a cup of sugar between the layers, and adding a grate of nutmeg; cover, pinching the edges together securely, and bake about forty minutes. Eat hot or cold.

RASPBERRY ICE.—Boil one quart of water and one pound of granulated sugar for half an hour; add a pint of fresh raspberry juice, or a tumbler of the jam, in which case add the juice of a lemon, and strain all through a fine sieve, to avoid the seeds. Freeze when cold, adding whites of eggs—and proceeding as directed in No. 21 of OUR CONTINENT.

COFFEE.—As in No. 1 of OUR CONTINENT.

HELEN CAMPBELL.

WE say farewell to Perdita, Marion and Philip, the leading characters of Mr. Hawthorne's "Dust," in this number of THE CONTINENT, and begin next week a story by Rhoda Broughton which will treat the drama of life from a feminine standpoint, if, indeed, Miss Broughton's views can properly be classified as strictly feminine in the common acceptance of the term. At all events, we can promise our readers a novel as powerful and striking as any that this popular writer has given to the world.

PROFESSIONAL beauties are not the exclusive product of modern English society, although the term itself is of recent invention. That they lived and flourished before and during the reigns of the Georges is appropriately set forth in the first of Mrs. Barr's two papers on the "Wits and Beauties of the Eighteenth Century." At a time when America is forming her estimate of an acknowledged "professional beauty"—albeit she has retired behind the footlights—these portraits and sketches are peculiarly timely. They picture a state of society which was an essential forerunner of one which evolved the type of which Mrs. Langtry is, or at least was, a confessed leader—that is, the social professional as distinguished from the professional professional. Conditions exist in this country which lay an absolute embargo on the evolution of the social type. Pre-eminence is claimed by half a dozen different "sets" in each of our large cities, and the reigning beauty of each may be queen of her own realm, but is not acknowledged outside of it. We have no Prince who can tell us, with any hope of being listened to, which of our daughters is the most beautiful. It will be noted that we have magnanimously refrained from intimating that pretty women are far more abundant here than in England.

SINCE our reference to the question of a Sabbath for brain-workers, public interest has, to an unwonted degree, been centered on the matter of Sunday laws in consequence of a sudden and yet not altogether spasmodic attempt on the part of the police of New York City to enforce the old observances of the statutes. The immediate occasion of this attempt was the going into effect of a new penal code, which rendered the police liable to indictment in case they allowed trading in any shape on Sunday. To New Yorkers this seemed very tyrannical, but not so much so, by any means, to the rest of the country, particularly outside of the great cities. The New Yorker has long been accustomed to see groceries open until nine or ten o'clock of a Sunday morning, tobacconists open all day, news-stands and the like on every important corner, and, in short, a pretty active trade among sundry small dealers. The same state of things exists, more or less, in all the large cities, license increasing in the South and in the West. In the rural districts, however, no one thinks of buying anything on Sunday, unless, perchance, it be a medical prescription at the druggists'; and, in fact, laws nearly identical with those of New York have been enforced in many of the states, and the courts have passed sentence accordingly. Nevertheless, there has been, in most parts of the country, a general relaxing of Sunday customs. People go to ride and walk more than they did, and are far less strict than they were a generation ago in the matter of reading. In nothing is this more marked than in the character of Sunday-school books which are read by all save the strictest of Sabbatarians.

This brings us to the second phase of the subject, namely, the acknowledged decline of clerical authority. If the Protestant clergy could have had its way, there is no doubt that the Puritan Sunday, or something very like it, would be the rule now, as it was fifty years ago. If clerical authority could have been maintained, the day would have been observed now as strictly as it was then; but, for whatever reason, the authority has passed away, and with it has gone much that gave the day its sacred character. We need not here discuss the rights and wrongs of the question; the fact remains, and is, as Professor George P. Fisher, of Yale College, points out in the North American Review, the natural result of a tendency that has existed ever since intelligence began to penetrate the masses and stimulate their minds to independent thought. So long as superstition was general, priests were clothed with a certain supernal authority; and this seems to have endured until Henry IV of England, in the eleventh century, set up his opinion against that of Hildebrand. Since then the movement has been slow, with the exception of certain notable strides, as at the time of the Reformation, but it has been inexorably sure, until now the State everywhere, save perhaps in Spain alone, takes precedence of the Church. THE CONTINENT numbers among its readers both Protestants and Catholics, and these will no doubt agree, though from very different motives, in alleging for the Roman Catholic priesthood something approximating the old-time clerical authority; for the strict Protestant, it is to be feared, while bewailing the loss of his own pastor's influence, too often stigmatizes as "priest-ridden" the condition of his Catholic brother. Whatever may be the truth, however, as between the individual Romanist and his priest, we need only look at Italy to convince us of the direction in which mankind in general is tending; the Pope describes himself as a prisoner in the Vatican, and the revenues which were formerly administered by the Church now constitute a "Public Worship Fund," managed by a board of laymen. When the loss of clerical authority is referred to, however, it must be confessed that the word "Protestant" is generally understood; and that it has greatly declined few will be found to deny. Professor Fisher, in the article referred to, takes this decline for granted; but he suggests, in conclusion, that sacerdotalism was unknown in the primitive Church, and intimates that existing tendencies may point to something better even than that clerical authority which prevailed in colonial times and which only lost its hold when the laity began to have opinions of its own.

OFFICIAL definitions are always entertaining when they can be accepted as official—that is, as conclusive—and it would be eminently instructive if we could persuade the great corporations, especially in this country and England—for these, we take it, are the great company-ridden peoples of the world—to give us their ideas as to the purposes for which the individual man exists. All great corporations profess to be actuated by the common conviction that they can do better for man than he can possibly do for himself, but the constant tendency is for them to insist upon doing what no individual at all wants to do on his own account. The individual stockholders of a company are probably as honest as the rest of the world in their personal capacity, and would never think of oppressing their fellow-citizens. But organize them under a president and a board of directors, and the rest, and they will make it exceedingly lively for any one who chances to stand in their way. The court records of nearly every state in the Union abound with instances where individuals have tried to fight corporations and have been disastrously worsted. Indeed, a case of this kind is well nigh hopeless where there are two sides—as there must be almost of necessity—to the question involved, for the strength of a combined purse suffices, in many legitimate ways, to outmaneuver abstract justice. Given a large number of stockholders with their money invested for a common cause, and they are at once irresistible and helpless. Irresistible in that their representatives, the directors, can command an enormous aggregate of capital; helpless in that, scattered as they are, it is well nigh impossible for them to unite their votes, should they be dissatisfied with the management, oust the incumbent officials and reorganize on a new basis. This is sometimes done where there is a lack of daring or unscrupulousness on the part of president and directors; but it is nearly impossible where there are no scruples as to using the available means for retaining the balance of power. How to regulate the concentration of wealth and power in the hands of corporations is one of the questions that is sure, sooner or later, to crop out in politics, and there will be room for more wisdom than the average law-maker has habitually shown in legislating—enough, that is, and yet not too much.

THE Archæological Society of Greece, as we are informed by a correspondent who reads the Athenian papers in the original, has recently uncovered the remains of an ancient temple in Epidauros. It was probably a temple of Æsculapius, as a bas-relief in it represents Æsculapius seated on a magnificent throne, while before him is seen the Goddess of Health, between two female forms, one of them a Goddess of Victory. The temple is surrounded by Doric columns, and each gable contained a group of sculpture, the fragments of which were found lying on the ground. The group on the eastern end is supposed to show the battle of the Centaurs. The other is a marine group, composed of six Nereids, two floating on the waves and four riding on sea-horses, each with an arm thrown gracefully around the creature's neck. Not far from this temple there had been previously discovered several interesting buildings, among them one in circular form called the Rotunda of Polycleitos. Successful excavations have been made on other sites also. While foreigners are recovering from beneath the ground many buried treasures of ancient art, it is pleasant to see the native Greeks organized into a society for the same generous service.

THE Chevalier de Hesse-Wartegg is a name very unfamiliar to American ears, and yet he might easily, save for name, claim a position with the most Yankeeified of Yankees, every page evidencing the same traits of unflinching good-humor, persistent curiosity, indefatigable in question and research, and a mental alertness not popularly considered a German characteristic. His book is the result of a very recent visit to a country hardly known outside of its own boundaries.¹ Such civilization as it has attained is chiefly in the adoption of garish ornament and patent leather boots, but the author pronounces Tunis to be “much less affected by European influence than the Egyptian or Algerian towns,” and adds, of the rich Tunisian, that he “will hang three or four large glass chandeliers in a small room, and put besides some candleabra on the side-tables, and at least two or three clocks between, which do not go. These clocks are a true picture of Tunis, which is also at a stand-still, waiting for the Europeans to wind it up.” His picture of the bazars, which, like in many points to those of Oriental cities in general, still have marked peculiarities of their own, is very graphic, and his comments on general government and the Tunisian army still more so. Amusing and valuable quotations might be cited from every chapter, the final paragraphs on the army giving his style and mental habit as fully, perhaps, as any others in this exceptionally interesting book of travels.

“My first acquaintance with their heroes I made immediately after my landing in Goletta, the harbor of Tunis. There stood a Tunisian guard before a sentry-box. His dress consisted of a black jacket with red braid, black trousers reaching to the middle of the calf, a red fez with a brass shield, and (probably) a shirt. He wore yellow kid slippers, and by his side, in a leather sheath, dangled a sabre which had no point, and his gun—leaning against the sentry-box—exhibited a rusty percussion lock. The man himself had a stocking in his hand, which he was knitting. An officer passed him, when he put aside his stocking, took up his gun and presented arms, after which he put it in the corner again, from which proceeding I concluded that the feminine occupation of knitting is allowed him also when on duty. Before the War and Marine Ministries, the sentries idled about in the same way, and even in the capital before the palace of the Bey, the sentries were knitting stockings. The best of it was that not a single soldier wore stockings.

“About the organization of the army little is known. The Almanach de Gotha gives us seven regiments of infantry, four of artillery and a division of cavalry, with a total strength of 20,000 men. According to the information, however, which I got from the Ministry of War in Tunis, there are only five regiments of infantry and one of artillery. The cavalry is only to be found on paper. In reality it consists of a few colonels and twenty men without horses. The real total number of troops—comprising the whole army—is about two or three thousand men, of whom one thousand are garrisoned in the capital and the rest in the province.

“On the ministerial lists I only found the officers mentioned, while the total strength of the troops was utterly unknown to them. For this army there are about one hundred generals and one thousand officers of all degrees, from a lieutenant of fourteen years (Molass) up to a colonel, who, as a rule, served the Bey formerly as pages, and did all sorts of services for him, of which the details cannot be recorded here, but for which they got promoted without ever having seen a gun or drum. There is no military school, unless the harem be considered as such. Of the officers emerging therefrom, some remain in the household of the Bey, others are employed in the ministries, and the greatest number are put into the army invested with the same rank to their last day, promotion being very rare.

“The pay of this valiant army is equivalent to its services—that is to say, a little more than nothing. All officers as well as the rank and file receive from the Government board and lodging, and are also clothed and receive besides a nominal pay, which would be sufficient for the modest wants of Orientals if they really got their pay, their board and their clothes. The proper accounts are handed in, no doubt, but the money goes through the hands of so many generals, colonels and captains, that of the pay nothing remains, of the clothing only rags, and of their board bread and bad oil.”

CAMBRIDGE is to have a new illustrated weekly called Science, the first number of which appears early in January, and to which the leading scientific men of the country will contribute.

THE agreeable English nobleman in Mr. James' "Portrait of a Lady" is said to have been taken from Lord Otho Fitzgerald, a handsome and brilliant young man, who died recently of blood-poisoning.

IN spite of Mr. Clark Russell's squabble with the Harpers over the copyright question, in which, by the way, he is proved to be in the wrong, his new novel, "A Sea-Queen," is to appear first in this country in the pages of Harper's Weekly.

D. APPLETON & Co. have published a new edition of "The Household Book of Poetry," thoroughly revised and greatly enlarged, the poems now numbering eleven hundred and seventy-five, and the selections being made with a care and judgment that place the book in the front rank of such anthologies.

THE Dictionary of the French Academy, begun two hundred years ago, is still unfinished. Charles Nodier, writing to a friend, says: "You ask me when the Dictionary of the French Academy will be finished. Nostradamus could not reply to the question. For myself, I am firmly of opinion that the Academy will be finished before its Dictionary."

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS have published an amusing little novel, semi-musical, semi-esthetic, entitled, "The Benefit of the Doubt," by Mary Clare Spenser. There is a family ghost and a general series of complications, the surprise being that anything so good can be so bad, and vice versa. There is promise enough, however, to make one look confidently for better work. (16mo, pp. 371, $1.00).

SAVE for a slightly scrappy character and the need of a little better editing, "Pennsylvania Dutch and Other Essays," by Phebe Earle Gibbons, is a very pleasant addition to the literature of peculiar peoples. Most of it has appeared in various magazines, but the present edition has been revised and enlarged, and the whole is a very faithful record of a keen observer, giving many details which have never before been noted. (12mo, pp. 427, $1.50, J. B. Lippincott & Co.)

ONE of the most practical and reasonable of recent books upon music is found in "Artistic Singing," by Mrs. Sabrina H. Dow. The writer is herself an authority on such matters, and has studied the various modern theories of voice culture with a growing conviction that most of them are tinctured with error, and that safety lies in a return to those of the early Italian school, which succeeded in preserving voices almost unimpaired up to fifty and even sixty years of age. The little book is exceedingly suggestive and holds hints even for those who may disagree with its conclusions. (pp. 115, $1.00, Lee & Shepard, Boston).

IT is an open question how far Mr. J. Mortimer-Granville's little book, "Youth: Its Care and Culture: an Outline for Parents and Guardians," deserves the reprint it has received. Many of the points made are excellent, but many more are exaggerated. His chapters on "Boy Manhood" and "Girl Womanhood" touch on topics of profound interest to all parents and educators, and in the main are of real value; but there is a certain priggishness, in the final pages especially—a lofty and superior tolerance of women in particular—which does not seem a necessary part of a treatise half-medical, half-educational. (pp. 167, $1.00, M. L. Holbrook & Co., New York).

"CLERICAL SORE-THROAT," and the various throat difficulties incident to continuous use of the voice, ought to decrease if manuals on voice-training have any influence whatever. In "Gymnastics of the Voice: a System of Correct Breathing in Singing and Speaking, Based Upon Physiological Laws: a Self-Instructor in the Training and Use of the Singing and Speaking Voice," by Oskar Guttman, the elaborate title holds all the description necessary. The directions are plain, and the book scientifically correct in its theories and methods, the gymnastics outlined being of special service for all weak throats and lungs, and making pure and clear tones a possibility for all. (pp. 138, $1.25, Edgar S. Werner, Albany).

TIME brings to light unexpected revelations with regard to American antiquity. We have architectural works which are perhaps older than the oldest Europe can boast; and now Dr. D. G. Brinton comes forward with a work on "American Hero Myths: a Study in the Native Religions of the Western Continent," which brings out much that is new and interesting to American archæologists. He points out that heretofore myths have been but imperfectly distinguished from traditions. It is singular that a common element in many of the aboriginal religions is the belief in a divine being, born of a virgin, who comes from the East. The Algonkins, Aztecs and many others hold this legend, which, we need hardly point out, has singular parallels in the creeds of other nations. (Philadelphia: H. C. Watts & Co.)

As a story, "Divorce," by Margaret Lee, is in many points a very fair piece of work. The heroine is an improbable creature, who, if she had had one quarter the insight with which she is credited, would have opened her eyes long before to the real nature of the husband who wasted her property, and cared simply and always for number one. He is a very consistent rascal; a handsome, pleasure-loving, cultivated animal. The complications which finally ensue are handled with delicacy, and there is promise in the book of far better work to come. It is astonishingly cheap, the publishers' intention being to show that work by American authors can be produced at as low a rate as English reprints; but is fairly well printed and bound. The system of punctuation is an extraordinary one, commas in many pages taking the place of periods or semicolons; but the author may not be responsible for this. (pp. 411, 50 cents, John W. Lovell Co.)

WHEN new books swarm like bees, who shall think of the old, unless, indeed, the old are chosen as refuge and the new set aside to test their chance of immortality? Those in the nature of guide-posts are most likely to hold place, and of this order is "The Great Epics of Mediæval Germany. An Outline of their Contents and History," by George Theodore Dippold. Wagner's later operas have made us familiar, to a certain extent, with the Nibelungen Lied, and the various legends preceding or arising from it, but the forces that made them the national voice of the people are less known, and nothing so clear and full has yet been done by way of explanation and elucidation as this work of Professor Dippold's. The fruit of long research is embodied here, and though the student may miss some details familiar to him through the work of German scholars who give a life time to one phase of a topic, every busy American will welcome so compact and scholarly a condensation of theories and facts as the present. (16mo, pp. 323, $1.50, Roberts Brothers, Boston).

MRS. SPOFFORD, in her stories for young people, ceases to be the Mrs. Spofford we know—in other words, drops her superabundant adjectives, and tells a pleasant story in a simple and pleasant way. "Hester Stanley at St. Marks" is the history of a passionate but loving child, born in the South Sea Islands, and having unlimited control over an immense household of servants. She is imperious, impetuous and absolutely ignorant, not only of books, but of every-day American life. Necessarily, when placed at boarding-school, revolt is instantaneous, and the year which follows is full of very amusing and sometimes very pathetic efforts at self-government. That she conquers at last is due in part to the unfailing gentleness and understanding of the large-hearted principal, one of the best-drawn characters in any recent book for girls, and whose portrait is a very necessary foil to that of the overbearing and tyrannical assistant, whose conflicts with Hester are the most objectionable feature of the book. The story well deserves the popularity we hope for it. (pp. 194, $1.25, illustrated; Roberts Brothers, Boston).

ENGLISH wood-engravers are puzzling over the superiority of American work, and seize the first opportunity to defend their own methods. The St. James's Gazette of London says: "The notion that Mr. Elbridge Kingsley's 'Wood Engraving from Nature' in the current number of The Century is an entirely novel method, is erroneous. Bewick constantly engraved direct from nature, and unless we are much mistaken, Mr. W. J. Linton and other living wood-engravers have often worked in this way. Indeed, no really good wood-engraver would trust entirely to memory or to the design on the block if he could have in front of him the object, the view or the picture to be reproduced. This is particularly true where the design has been placed on the block by photography, for photography invariably gives false values, and very often distorted outlines: faults which the new-style American wood-engravers render as a rule with remarkable precision. Nor is there anything new in the fact that Mr. Kingsley executed his block almost entirely with one tool: Mr. Linton's gravers are of the fewest, and perhaps the finest landscape he has done was cut with one tool. Yet it shows a variety of textures, an expressiveness of handling which Mr. Kingsley's pretty work entirely lacks."

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD has long been credited with originating the phrase, "sweetness and light," but though almost synonymous with the thought of him, one who represented anything but these characteristics, is the real author, the matter being cleared up by Mr. Smalley in a recent letter: "In the 'Notes on Mr. Stephen's Swift,' sent you the other day from abroad, I gave the quotation from Swift of 'sweetness and light,' saying I could not recollect whether Mr. Matthew Arnold had himself assigned it to Swift. This is what came of having a bad memory and no books at hand to help it out. The reference of the phrase to Swift will be found in the first chapter of Mr. Arnold's 'Culture and Anarchy.' The fact none the less remains that Swift's phrase had slumbered and slept for a century and three-quarters—had never passed into currency or signified much to the world till Mr. Arnold gave it a fresh start. I am not disparaging Swift. The secret is this, that Swift used the words once for a particular purpose, and had done with them. Mr. Arnold, who has a genius for procuring what words are fitted to catch the ear and abide in the memory and stand as symbols of a doctrine, used them and re-used them till they became as familiar as a political cry during a campaign. In Swift's mouth, moreover, they are purely physical; in Mr. Arnold's they are metaphysical."

AMONG the various records of the rebellion, nothing more amusing or interesting has been written than the very pugnacious chronicle, the full title of which best indicates its character, "Detailed Minutes of Soldier Life in the Army of Northern Virginia; 1861-1865," by Carl-ton McCarthy, private Second Company, Richmond Howitzers, Cutshaw's Battalion Artillery, Second Corps, A. N. V.; with illustrations by William L. Sheppard, Esq., lieutenant Second Company Richmond Howitzers, A. N. V. (pp. 224, $1.50, Carlton McCarthy & Co., Richmond.) Mr. McCarthy adds one more to the list of author-publishers, and his book will be of value not only to every Confederate soldier, but to all a little north of Mason and Dixon's line who would recall the spirit of that half-forgotten time, and realize of what stuff our antagonists were made. The spirit of the "new South" has no place in these graphic pages. The Yankee is still a hated enemy, whose final victory was brought about by mercenaries, and in whom there is only occasional capacity for honor or decency. As a reminder of what spirit still lives, it is well for every Northern man who forgets that bitterness ever existed, to ponder over the deep animus still shown and what its leadings may be. From the outside standpoint it is worth reading as a record of heroism amid unparalleled hardships, which may make us proud that we own the same country. Apart from this, it is simply a stirrer-up of old strifes and issues which, if they are not dead, had better be, speedy burial being the only safe course with such exceedingly unpleasant corpses.

FUNGI is the name of one of the orders of the class Cryptogamia of Linnæus, which consist of flowerless plants, the most obvious representatives being those that are well known as toad-stools, which include the numerous species of the mushroom tribe. It also includes a number of microscopic bodies, such as mildew, moulds, dry-rot, etc., which grow on living but more abundantly on decayed animal or vegetable matter. They are important factors in reducing all organized bodies to their original elements. The number of so-called species may be said to be beyond calculation; indeed, it seems as though new forms spring into existence according to the nature of the substance upon which they grow. They almost appear to be organisms of chance, many coming into existence and living but a single night. They are found in all countries and situations where animal and plant life exist. They not only grow on lofty trees, in dry pastures and buildings, but also in mines, cellars, drains and ditches. Penicillium glaucum is the blue mould of cheese, jelly, preserves, and woven fabrics when long damp; the iron mould (so called) on linen is a kind of mildew. The most formidable, however, are the potato murrain, grape mildew, dry-rot, smut, coffee and salmon disease, all caused by microscopic species. Fungi are the sole agents in fermentation of sugary liquids, and it is found that yeast, which causes dough to rise, is a fungus. Many such—as mushrooms, morels and truffles—are wholesome and delicious food, while others are poisonous in the highest degree; many of the latter being similar to and taken for the true mushroom, and used as such have led to fatal results. Fungi are reproduced by spores, which are so numerous that in the puff-ball, when ripe and pressed, they are seen to rise in the air like smoke; but to determine their size and form requires the aid of a powerful microscope. They float in the air, and alighting on substances congenial to their development and growth, they thus become spread in different localities. Those that emanate from foul cisterns, water-closets and drains are now considered to be the probable cause of contagious diseases, such as typhoid and scarlet fever, cholera and even diphtheria. It has been proved that milk quickly becomes impregnated with microscopic fungi from dairies not being kept clean, and the vessels washed with foul water, which a few years ago was found to be the cause of typhoid fever in London, and it led to an act of Parliament being passed for the inspection of dairies. Wine cellars are often infested by a filamentous fungus, which covers the walls and casks with a coating like felt; it also attacks the corks of wine bottles, and its appearance is considered a test that the wine is old. This has been taken advantage of by some dealers to make new wine have the appearance of being old by placing over the cork a false “zasmidium” (or coating made of spiders’ webs, rotten sawdust and logwood); the wine then passes off as crusted old port. The walls of cellars and mines are also liable to be covered with a fungus growth—some are phosphorescent to such a degree that in the coal mines near Dresden the roofs, walls and cellars are often entirely covered with them, and their light is so bright as to dazzle the eye and give the idea of an enchanted cave. Phosphorescent fungi are also commonly to be seen in the dark or decayed wood, rotten leaves and other decomposed vegetable substances. Tallow stores are often infested with a microscopic fungus, known as grease mould; it covers the wall with a filamentous web; it also attacks the casks and pervades the grease, destroying all fatty matter, and often causing great loss to the merchant. In gardens a species of mould fungus is a great pest; it appears suddenly in a night, spreading rapidly over all moist surfaces, doing irreparable mischief in propagating pits, by overrunning low plants, cuttings and seed pots. Fruits are often attacked by a fungus originating from a small wound in the skin, which renders them extremely bitter and unfit to eat.

THE consumption of saké in Japan amounts to about six gallons per head per annum. The preparation of this liquid may be regarded as taking place in three stages. (1) Preparation of koji: Rice is cleaned and the outer skin removed. It is then beaten or trodden with water, and lastly steamed. The embryo is thus killed and germination rendered impossible. The steamed rice is mixed with a little tanc, a yellowish powder, consisting of the spores of a fungus, and the mixture exposed on trays for several days, during which time the temperature of the surrounding air and also of the mixed rice and fungus spores rises very considerably. These operations are conducted in underground chambers, cut off from the influences of the outer air. Koji contains dextrose and dextrine, unaltered starch, mineral matter and a diastase-like substance or substances. It converts cane-sugar partially into inverted sugar and gelatinized starch into maltose, dextrose and dextrine. (2) Preparation of moto: Steamed rice, koji and water are mixed and maintained at a low temperature for some time; the starch of the rice is thus for the most part changed into dextrose and dextrine. (3) Fermentation: The moto is heated by placing closed tubs of boiling water in the liquid; temperature rises, fermentation begins and is continued for twelve or thirteen days by the introduction of fresh heaters. From time to time the mash is divided into portions, each of which is mixed with more moto, steamed rice and koji, and then fermented. The fermented liquid is filtered, cleared by standing and heated in order to prevent it from souring. Saké does not keep for any length of time in warm weather, and must be repeatedly heated by the brewer.

FUCUS is the name of a Linnæan genus of sea-weeds, which are more or less abundant on the rocky coasts of most countries. They are strong-growing species, and may be considered as the shrubs of the ocean. During storms the force of the waves uproots large quantities of sea-weeds of different species, which are wafted on shore and left by the receding tides, such being known by the name of wrack, the drying and burning of which at one time furnished employment to large numbers of people in Scotland and Ireland. The ashes, containing carbonate of soda, were called kelp, and were used in the manufacture of soap and glass, but since carbonate of soda has been manufactured from salt for these purposes, the burning of sea-wrack has almost ceased. From the ash of sea-weeds another important chemical substance called iodine is obtained, and is well known in medicine as a powerful absorbent. In agricultural districts wrack is eagerly sought after for manure; its virtue as such depends principally on the salt it contains. On some parts of the coast of Japan sea-plants are largely collected. They are exported to China and conveyed to the interior, where salt is scarce. Many of them are also edible.

A FEW days before his death, Professor Henry Draper, of New York, entertained the members of the National Academy of Sciences, over fifty in number, at a dinner given at his house. At that time he gave a novel illustration of his interest in the fascinating field of scientific inquiry opened up by the discoveries in electricity. The tables were set in the parlors, and from the arch between the two rooms there hung a large chandelier, representing a bouquet in brouze. In the chandeliers were twelve bell-shaped flowers, resembling morning glories, with red, blue and yellow petals, and a stamen of ground glass, inclosing one of Edison's incandescent lights. Under the chandelier was an aquarium, surrounded by vines and filled with gold fish. A submerged incandescent light illuminated the water, and the fish swam unconcernedly around it. Electric bouquets, like the chandelier, were placed on the tables, and alternating with them were bouquets of natural flowers surrounding electric lights. The electricity was supplied by a gas engine in Professor Draper's laboratory.

It has been observed that the blood of crabs and other crustaceans at Ostend has the same strong and bitter taste as the sea water, and proves to have the same saline constitution. Crabs in brackish water, on the other hand, have a less salt blood, and the crayfish of rivers have very little of soluble salts in their blood. An exchange of salts seems to take place in these animals between the blood and the outer medium, producing approximate equilibrium of chemical composition. This probably occurs through the respiratory organ, and is according to the simple laws of diffusion. On the other hand, the blood of sea fishes has an entirely different saline composition from that of the water.

C., aged seventy-five years.—Daniel Ratcliff, a lawyer, of Baltimore, Md., died, aged seventy-five years.—The chapel of Drury College, Springfield, Mo., was burned; loss, $45,000.

THE DRAMA.

MR. JOHN S. CLARKE has received high praise from the English press for his "Dr. Pangloss," in "The Heir-at-Law," at the Strand Theatre, London.

MR. JOHN J. GRAHAME, who came over as leading support to Mrs. Langtry, has been engaged by the Madison Square Theatre for next season, and is to appear only in New York City.

"THE ROMANY RYE," after its run of ten weeks in New York at Booth's Theatre, and four weeks in Chicago, reaches Haverly's Theatre, Philadelphia, in the beginning of the new year, for a stay of three weeks.

THE recent celebration of the fiftieth dramatic anniversary of Mr. Cresswick, in London, brought him $3000. Mr. Wilson Barrett paid $250 for a seat in the gallery and Mr. Toole a like sum for three seats in the orchestra.

MR. IRVING'S production of "Much Ado About Nothing" is not only a great artistic success but an equally satisfactory financial one. The Lyceum, London, under this eminent actor's management, has yet to be credited with a failure.

MISS IDA MEYERS, of Baltimore, recently made a brilliant début at the Royal Niccolini Theatre, Florence, in the title rôle of "Linda di Chamounix." The lady is described as possessing great beauty of face and figure and a voice of marvelous richness and power. Enthusiastic applause, shouts of brava! brava! and heaps of floral tributes rewarded the young aspirant's endeavors. Miss Meyers will be known in the operatic world as Ida Morena.

MR. CHARLES R. THORNE, JR., has left the Union Square Theatre, New York, where he has been the popular leading man for over ten years past. Mr. Stetson, manager of Booth's Theatre, paid the Union Square management $1200 to release Mr. Thorne from a two years' contract. Mr. Thorne's first appearance under his new manager will occur in a short time at Booth's Theatre in a revival of the "Corsican Brothers." Next season he will "star" in the romantic drama.

M. SARDOU'S latest drama, "Fedora," written especially for Mme. Sara Bernhardt, was produced at the Vaudeville, in Paris, on December 11th, and proved a positive triumph for both the distinguished playwright and world-famed artiste. This was Mme. Bernhardt's first appearance in Paris since her secession from the Theatre Francais, three years ago. This reappearance in the French capital obliges her to pay her fine of 100,000 francs to the directors of the Theatre Francais, and this is just the sum guaranteed her for one hundred performances at the Vaudeville. "Fedora," the name of the heroine, affords the greatest scope for the display of every emotion. The story treats of Nihilism. The American right to the play has been purchased for $10,000.

THE name of "Lotta" has become a synonym for good fortune, and the required exception to the rule has lately come to pass. During a visit to London last summer she learned that Mr. Charles Reade was engaged in writing a melodrama with Mr. Henry Pettitt. Relying upon the reputations of the authors and upon the demand of the public for lurid melodrama, she purchased the American right to the production, for the enormous sum of $10,000, paying in advance $2,500. The play was christened "Love and Money," and was presented some weeks since at the Adelphi Theatre, London. It proved a disastrous failure. The transaction was an outside investment on Miss Lotta's part, as she did not intend the play for her own use—so the deficit is but chargeable to the profit and loss account of speculation.

"THE QUEEN'S SHILLING" was indifferently received at Wal-lack's after Mrs. Langtry's withdrawal. It was followed by Mr. Boucicault's comedy of "Old Heads and Young Hearts," with the veteran Mr. John Gilbert in his favorite character of "Jesse Rural." This in turn is to be followed by the production of "The Silver King," in which Mr. Osmond Tearle makes his reappearance. This play succeeded "The Romany Rye," after its prolonged run at the Princess' Theatre, London, and scored a great hit. The story, though somewhat melodramatic, is intensely interesting, the plot hinging on the fact of the hero being present, in a state of drunkenness, at the murder of a man whom he intended killing for great wrong done him, and believing, when he becomes sober, that he really is the murderer, though the audience are aware that he is entirely innocent. After much suffering everybody is made happy in the last act.

II.

BETWEEN THE ACTS.

I. Mr. Schuyler Rhett, the embodiment of inherited Northern and Southern chivalry, is shocked to the depths of his courteous soul at the impoliteness of thirsty theatre-goers, who turn their backs on ladies in passing before them.

II. Mr. Rhett is never guilty of that discourtesy—not he! He has been taught to face a lady in passing before her; and he will bump every knee and put out every eye in the house, rather than acknowledge that the anatomy of the human frame renders downright rudeness, after all, the most considerate way of getting out.

N. B.—Yet even he will not forego his entr'acte egress. He has no cloves with him, and a clove he must have.

The Mason—A Riddle.

ONE day, when life was hushed with heat,
And cloudy shadows eastward whirled,
And in a flood of blue and white
The sunlight blotted out the world,
A builder came, and all alone
Builded his house beside my own.

A skillful architect was he,
That wisely builded on his plans;
So perfect was his joinery
It put to shame a common man's.
So fair my neighbor's dwelling shone,
I longed to have it for my own!

I envied him his smooth, hard walls;
His chambers' soft and creamy tone;
Fain would exchange for his cool halls
My sultry den of wood and stone.
I watched him all the summer through—
The while my envy greater grew.

For lo! his waist how slim and small!
His russet coat and yellow boot;
His velvet cap and overall,
The flashing gauze of his surtout!
His eye, whose molten gold defies
The kindred torrent from the skies!

My grim, gaunt image, haply glassed,
Shows me a waist of slender size;
But where the surcoat's burnished cast?
And where the splendor of the eyes?
And where the dainty step and air
My neighbor's neighbor ought to wear?

Sure Nature was in joyous mood
When this deft builder fashioned she!
O'er him her royal gifts she strewed,
But very sorely stinted me!
Else had my neighbor lived and died
Unloved, unenvied at my side!

Maybe his nimble wit divined
My thought; for, coming from the field,
I saw his house, with every blind
Shut tight, and every portal sealed;
And were he in or were he out
I had no heart to solve the doubt!

And now the house is dull and bare—
Its beauty all he bore away;
And what is here to make me stare?
These tiny cells of senseless clay?
I only say—my heart is full—
My neighbor made them beautiful!

GEORGIANA, DUCHESS OF DEVONSHIRE. AFTER SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

WITS AND BEAUTIES OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.—II.

THE lovely Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire, was ten years younger than Lady Bunbury. It is not easy, looking at her portrait, to convey any just idea at this day of the fascination she exercised over her contemporaries; for her personal charms were her least ones; nor did her beauty consist, like that of the Gunnings, in regular features and faultless forms—it lay in the grace of her deportment and the charm of her society. Her hair had a tinge of red and was very lovely, but her face, if it had not been illumined by her mind, would have been a very ordinary one. She is particularly famous for the personal exertions she made in favor of Charles Fox, during the great contested election for Westminster in 1784. During the canvass she visited the abodes of the humblest electors, dazzled and enslaved them by her many fascinations, and even carried the poorest mechanics in her carriage to the hustings; nor can there be any doubt of the fact that she purchased the vote of a stubborn butcher with a kiss. It was during the excitement of these scenes that the well-known compliment was paid her by an Irish laborer, who, gazing with admiration on her beautiful face, exclaimed, "I could light my pipe at her eyes!" She seems to have been as bewitching to women as to men, for Miss Berry gives her this charming eulogium: "Every eye followed her, every heart beat at her approach. Selfishness forgot itself in her presence, and avarice became liberal under her influence." She died in 1786, at the early age of forty-nine years.

Many lovely and noble women, standing in the front rank with others, almost equally lovely, exerted a powerful influence over their century; yet that influence was small, compared with the intellectual ascendancy exercised by the circle of esprits forts which first gathered in the salons of Elizabeth Montagu. This lady was the daughter of a Yorkshire 'squire, and in her youth was almost a pupil of the celebrated skeptic, Conyers Middleton. She had not a very peaceful home, for her brother's unbridled wit and her father's sarcasm needed often the intervention of the mother (called on that account 'the Speaker'), in order to maintain a decent calm.

At fourteen years of age she was a correspondent of the great Duchess of Portland, the female Mæcenas of her day—a lady deserving fame, not only for her splendid collections of vertu and her gift of the Harleian manuscripts to the British Museum, but because, among the patrons of literature and art of her day, she, above all others, understood that high breeding which is not only free from pride but free from affability—its most mortifying deputy.

At twenty-one, the young Yorkshire girl, who thought "Solomon wrong when he said all was vanity and vexation, and was very willing to take the vexation, if allowed the previous vanity," married the very dull and very respectable Mr. Montagu—a gentleman whose whole soul was devoted to mathematics; so she, who "doated on a pink negligée trimmed fort galamment," was pinned to the society of problems and decimal fractions. After the death of her only child, however, her character appears in a far loftier view. Her house in Portman Square became the centre of wits, poets, statesmen, churchmen and women eminent for culture and wit. There might be seen the stately and learned Elizabeth Carter, the witty Lady Townshend, Mrs. Chapone, Fanny Burney, Dr. Beattie, Horace Walpole, Dr. Johnson, Lord Lyttleton, etc., etc., and among them old Admiral Boscawen, who looked on and laughed, and in his bluff sailor way called them a party of "Blue Stockings," because full dress was not required there.

In her youth Mrs. Montagu had been a skeptic, but in maturer years she lost that revolting attribute of the esprit fort, and became an earnest and practical Christian. Probably this was the reason she had such a warm friendship for Lord Lyttleton, for he also had known and escaped the perils of religious doubt. His "History of Henry the Second" is a standard work, and often quoted by Hallam; but his "Dialogues of the Dead" ("Dead Dialogues" Horace Walpole calls them), are forgotten. Dr. Johnson's life of him was unfair and malignant, and Mrs. Montagu quarreled with Johnson for it. One morning she met the learned savage at Mrs. Thrale's: he had just been bullying Mr. Pepys into a quarrel about the same thing; but, in order to please Mrs. Thrale, he tried to conciliate Mrs. Montagu. But Mrs. Montagu was very haughty, and Johnson sat watching her like a setter, longing for the attack. Dr. Beattie says he was jealous of Mrs. Montagu's wit, which is scarcely probable, and even his rudeness was manageable; it was always disarmed by the sweet disposition of Elizabeth Carter, Mrs. Montagu's most intimate friend.

Like Mrs. Montagu, she had been in youth devoted to pleasure; had written to a friend "for all the trumpery tinsel things, for all the gold and silver lace, she could rummage up," yet afterwards she became eminent not only for her learning, but for her piety. Her attainments in Latin and Greek were extraordinary, and Dr. Johnson once said of some celebrated scholar, "He understands Greek better than any one I have ever known, excepting Elizabeth Carter." Besides being a fine classical scholar, she spoke fluently French, Italian, Spanish and German, and wrote for the Gentleman's Magazine under the name of "Eliza." Her piety, if stilted, was deep and earnest, and she heads the great band of modern female saints, an honor more frequently given to Hannah More, for on her fell most obviously the mantle of Mrs. Elizabeth Carter.

Mrs. More's residence was near Bristol, and her chief visiting place in London was at Garrick's; for Garrick interested himself greatly in the production of her tragedies, "Percy" and the "Fatal Falsehood;" and doubtless their great success was due, in some measure, to his care and influence. But when in London she frequently visited Mrs. Montagu, and there she met Dr. Johnson, who, after listening to the way in which she and her sisters lived, exclaimed, "What! Five women living happily together! I will come and see you! God bless you! You live lives to shame duchesses!" And on another occasion, when he met her with Mrs. Carter and Fanny Burney, he said, in his positive way, "Three such women are not to be found in the world!"

Few women have written so much or spent such busy lives as Hannah More. She was made a member of the French Academy in 1784, and the next year, retiring to her hermitage near Bristol, she devoted the rest of her days to the advancement of great moral works. She was of immense service to Wilberforce in his anti-slavery movement, and to her efforts Sunday schools owe more than to any other single individual. In a tract comprising a good part of a county she soon had five hundred children in training. Her tracts for Sunday schools and the poor had an unprecedented and amazing sale, more than two millions being sold in the first year.

With Hannah More the mind naturally associates Mrs. Chapone and Mrs. Barbauld. Mrs. Chapone's educational works have now been superseded, but they were highly valued in her own day, and in 1776 she was personally complimented on them by the King and Queen. On the contrary, Mrs. Barbauld's writings will always be young and fresh. Her "Hymns of Praise" are, in their distinctive style, the most exquisite prose in the language, and only inferior to those of Holy Writ. What an enduring charm there is in the following one, a charm existing in every page she wrote: "The winter is over and gone; the birds come out on the trees; the crimson blossoms of the peach and the nectarine are seen; the green leaves sprout, and on every hill and in every green field they offer the sacrifice of thanksgiving and the incense of praise. The snowdrops and the primrose make haste to lift their heads above the ground; when the spring cometh they say, 'Here we are!' The carnation waiteth for the full strength of the year, and the hardy laurustinus cheereth the winter months. Every field is like an open book; every painted flower hath a lesson written on its leaves. Every murmuring brook hath a tongue; a voice is in every whispering wind. They all speak of Him who made them: they all tell us He is good."

Mrs. Barbauld suggests Mrs. Inchbald, and Mrs. Inchbald Mrs. Siddons. The two families were very intimate, and at one time lived together. Both were then poor and unknown. Mrs. Siddons had been rejected at Drury Lane, and the "Simple Story" of Mrs. Inchbald lay in her desk, its great fame unknown and unsuspected. Mrs. Siddons occupied herself in the severest household duties, while John Kemble—who was then studying for the Roman Catholic priesthood—sat reading in a corner. No woman was ever more of a queen in private life, whatever humble duty claimed her attention; she moved as if scarcely deigning to touch the earth; her air, her manner and her grand beauty was as remarkable when ironing her husband's shirts as when portraying tragic royalty on the stage. In the troubles of her early life, the triumphs of her maturity, and in her long decline and seclusion, her character and genius were not only remarkable, but also free from reproach. The noble form lodged a soul that avoided even the appearance of evil.

MRS. WOLLSTONECRAFT. AFTER F. OPIE.

Very different from these women was the lovely and every way unfortunate Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin, the first agitator of the question of "Woman's Rights." No woman, with the exception of Madame de Staël, made so great an impression on the public mind, and her errors alone have caused her to be forgotten much sooner than her powerful mind and fine sensibility deserved. Her new and startling doctrines were seized with an avidity scarcely credible at this day, and her famous book, "The Vindication of the Rights of Women," was the theme of the most violent and the most universal praise and abuse. Thomas Paine, the author of "The Rights of Man," was one of her familiar acquaintances; but their intercourse was an argument, their views neither on this subject or any other coinciding. In these arguments Paine either lost his temper or became sulky, and the female champion won an easy victory. Until her marriage with Mr. Godwin, she was the friend of Mrs. Siddons and Mrs. Inchbald, but they, with the majority of her admirers, declined to sanction this union; for she had married, some years before, an American called Imlay, to whom she had been a most devoted and serviceable wife. The man, however, took advantage of the fact that the marriage was only a civil one, performed in Paris, and deserted her. Then she married Mr. Godwin, but this act placed her in a position no charity could explain away. Death, however, soon covered her faults with a pitiful oblivion. She left an infant daughter, a few hours old, who afterwards became the wife of Percy Bysshe Shelley.

As clever and independent a woman, though not nearly so amiable as Mary Wollstonecraft, was Lady Mary Wortley Montagu. Her character is a peculiar and not a lovely one; but we must remember that she was born in a circle and at a time that thought "a youth of frolics and an age of cards" sufficient for woman's happiness; and also that she had no mother and only a very careless and imprudent father. "It was my fate," she says, "to be much with the wits—my father was acquainted with all of them." Every one knows the license given to the wits of that day; and the clever, vivacious girl, associating familiarly with them, learned much of their coarseness. She was the daughter of the Duke of Kingston, and if a careless father, he was at least a proud one. When she was but a child he proposed her as his toast at the Kit-cat Club, and had her brought to the club to be introduced to its members. She was accepted by acclamation, and passed from the arms of one poet and statesman to another. Her picture was painted for the rooms, her name engraved on a drinking-glass and enrolled in the books as a standing toast.

But her alleged remarks, even at nineteen years of age, fall unpleasantly upon the ear. She "despises the impertinences of dress," and "looks upon the world with contempt." Hence we are not surprised that she says, forty-seven years later: "I have passed a long life, and may say with truth I have endeavored to purchase friends. Accident has put it into my power to confer great benefits, yet I never met with any return, nor, indeed, with any true affection but from dear Lady Oxford, who owed me nothing." And again: "The little good I do is scattered with a sparing hand against my inclination; but I know now the necessity of managing the hopes of others as the only links that bind attachment, or even secure us from injury."

Her marriage with Mr. Wortley, the grandson of the Earl of Sandwich, was one of very decided inclination on her part; and when he was sent as British Ambassador to the Porte, Lady Mary went with him. To this journey we owe her "Letters from the East," one of the noblest contributions to English literature that ever proceeded from a woman's pen, not only for their charming style, but for their graphic pictures of an unknown life, and for their historical accuracy. Her return to England was hailed with delight by the Court and by every fashionable and literary circle in London. Then she fixed her residence at Twickenham, and there cemented that friendship with Pope whose rupture was trumpeted to the world and futurity in the bitterest satire and invective. Pope lost no opportunity of wounding her, and how he could sting no one need be told. Lady Mary, not unjustly, called him "the wicked wasp of Twickenham." But her retorts made even Pope writhe, though in their galling spleen and spite she loses all her womanly dignity and modesty.

The reason of this famous quarrel is no better understood than is her real motive for voluntarily leaving her husband, children and home, and spending twenty years of her life alone in foreign lands. The plea of advantage to her health may be true, but few women would care to purchase health by the rupture of every social and domestic tie. She left England in 1739, and traveled for some time in Italy. Horace Walpole saw her in Florence in 1740, and his account of her is not attractive: "Her dress, her avarice and her impudence must amaze any one who never heard her name. She wears a foul mob that does not cover her greasy black locks, that hang loose, never combed or curled; an old blue wrapper that gapes open and discovers a canvass petticoat. Her face, swelled violently on one side, is partly covered with a plaster and partly with white paint, which, for cheapness, she has bought so coarse that you would not use it to wash a chimney." But even in youth she was careless of dress. Pope speaks of her diamonds and her dirty smock; and there are frequent contemporary allusions to her want of personal delicacy and cleanliness. Twenty years after Horace Walpole saw her in Florence, he met her again in London, and says: "I think her avarice, dirt and vivacity are all increased. Her dress, like her language, is a galimatias of several countries—the groundwork rags, and the embroidery nastiness. I went last night to visit her. I give you my honor the following is a faithful description: I found her in a little miserable chamber of a ready-furnished house, with two tallow candles and a bureau covered with pots and pans. On her head she had an old black laced hood, wrapped entirely round, so as to conceal all hair or want of hair;" and the rest of his description may be spared. Certainly the fall is great enough from the toast of the Kit-cat Club and the beauty in oriental costume who for some time reigned supreme in the highest circles of London.

Abroad it was her custom to take possession of some deserted palace and employ herself in her gardens and vineyards. She raised poultry and silk-worms, and rented out the right to fish in her streams—upon the whole, turned her pennies as carefully as if she had been dependent on her profits. Still she was undoubtedly a woman of masculine ability and of wonderful clearness of intellect, and she secured an honorable place in the graver records of her country as the introducer of the first known alleviator of the once fearful plague of small-pox. She had the courage not only to test inoculation on her only son, but also to brave the vituperations with which she was consequently assailed, and to persevere in her efforts until she succeeded in establishing the practice. She died in England, having returned there after the death of her husband, August, 1762, and is buried in Lichtfield Cathedral.

Many other women, whose names are still familiar, illuminated this century, of which it may at least be said that it unfolded the germs from which the England of 1700 grew into the England of to-day. How charming must have been that Fanny Burney, whose friends—Charles Fox and Horace Walpole among them—sent a round-robin to her father, begging him to recall his daughter from the court to the literary world, gathering at Mrs. Montagu's and Mrs. Thrale's! How fascinating those Misses Berry whom Horace Walpole adored and to whom he left little Strawberry Hill! not to speak of Joanna Baillie and the clever, brilliant ladies who formed the "elect" of the society that gathered round the pious Selina, Countess of Huntingdon.

The first half of the eighteenth century has a bad name among us; reformers heap abuse upon it politically, moralists condemn its coarse vices, and churchmen almost blot it from their calendar. It is universally voted an unspiritual, materialistic and unideal age, an age of animal enjoyments; and Mr. Thackeray bids us notice how fat people were under its influence. But during the latter half of it there was a great change in its spirit. We hear no more of such doings as went on while Miss Chudleigh was one of the maids of honor. Literature became purer; Tom Jones and Clarissa Harlowe became impossibilities; Wesley elevated the religious atmosphere; Johnson, Cowper and the women who gathered around Mrs. Montagu purified the intellectual one. For, taking them as a whole, the women of this circle had no littleness, nor had they the perversity and daring of modern esprits forts; and while their minds were masculine, their manners were womanly and domestic. It will be long, indeed, before the "Blues" will have a queen like Elizabeth Montagu; and if they had, where shall we find such subjects as thronged at her bidding to Portman Square?

AMELIA E. BARR.

MEDICAL EDUCATION IN PHILADELPHIA.

THE student who takes his place to-day in the amphitheatre of the University Hospital and watches the stages of some critical and delicate operation, or who finds the dissecting-room lighted and his "subject" made, by modern applications of science, as little offensive as possible, has small conception of the difficulties that even fifty years ago made medical study something to be snatched at in secret. The traditions of the past hedged about every practitioner and barred the way to investigation for every student. The physician of the past held the same relation to the general public that the "medicine-man" of the present does to the circle of believers who watch his movements with an awed conviction that his power comes straight from another world. To them the black art and medicine are synonymous, and for all rude communities this is more or less the accepted view. Religious rites are an essential part of the medical system for the savage, and this theory has been perpetuated by the fact that the clergy were also the physicians of the early colonists, and that pill and powder had an added unction and efficacy when administered by holy hands. Each step toward any real scientific basis has been hampered by such traditions and by the credulity and stupidity of the present, and even now the most distinguished scholars in the profession admit that medicine cannot yet be called an exact science.

In such admission is its surest hope for the future, and the eager experimenters who, at all the great centres of the civilized world, are searching into the secrets of life and of disease, are building up a system which has truer foundation than any laid since the story of disease and death began for the world.

In such researches Philadelphia has in many points led the way for American students. In Boston the chief physician for a time was also a Presbyterian minister, the Rev. Thomas Thatcher, who in 1677 published the first medical treatise written in this country, "A Brief Guide to the Small-Pox and Measles." Guides, whether brief or otherwise, were sadly needed, both of these diseases again and again decimating both colonists and Indians, while it raged among the passengers of the Welcome, from which Penn and his companions landed just two hundred years ago. Two trained physicians, Thomas Wynne and Griffith Owen, were with him, and found ample occupation for years in fighting not only small-pox and measles, but yellow fever, "American distemper" and the various fevers and acute diseases consequent upon the hardships and irregularities of life in a new country. The common people followed Indian prescriptions, using golden rod for dysentery, boneset for agues and consumption, and alder-buds and dittany for the blood. Herbs and roots, if they did not cure at least did not kill, and their reign was infinitely better than that of the patent medicine of to-day.

When fifty years or more had passed, the corps of physicians from abroad began to be replaced by a generation born on American soil. The pioneers had been English and had studied in London or Edinburg or Leyden, as the case might be. Dr. John Kearsley and Dr. Thomas Graeme were as popular as Wynne and Owen, and even more public spirited, Dr. Kearsley having been a member of the Assembly, and was often, after a telling speech, borne home on the shoulders of the people. John Kearsley, Jr., in time filled his place with almost equal efficiency, forming one of a brilliant and memorable group—Lloyd Zachary, Thomas Cadwallader, William Shippen, Sr., Thomas and Phineas Bond, John Redman, John Bard. These men encouraged students and gave the most thorough medical education possible at a time when neither colleges, nor hospitals, nor dissecting-rooms were in existence, but the majority were forced to complete their studies abroad. Two of these students, Dr. William Shippen and Dr. John Morgan, both natives of Philadelphia and both educated abroad, saw the absolute necessity for better means of study at home, and began in 1762 a course of lectures on anatomy and midwifery accompanied by dissections, before a class of ten students, the first systematic courses ever delivered in America, save those given by Dr. Hunter, at Newport, in 1756.

Dr. Morgan gained notoriety in an unexpected direction, being the first man in Philadelphia to carry a silk umbrella. Dr. Chancellor and the energetic Tory, Parson Duché, afterward kept him company, and, though at first every one sneered at them as effeminate and full of airs, they won the day in the end. Dr. Morgan also refused to compound or carry his own medicines, and sent to the apothecary for them, an innovation even more startling and provoking more opposition than the umbrella. It may be judged that he was a gentleman with very decided opinions and no hesitation in their expression, and these characteristics were essential to any success in the new movement.

Dr. Cadwallader's lectures given in 1750, after his return from the London schools, had been of little effect from being unaccompanied by demonstrations, but Dr. Shippen's marked the beginning of a new era, and the announcement of them may still be seen in the Pennsylvania Gazette for November 25, 1762 :

"Dr. Shippen's Anatomical Lectures will begin to-morrow evening at six o'clock, in his father's house, in Fourth Street. Tickets for the course to be had of the Doctor at five Pistoles each, and any gentlemen who incline to see the subject prepared for the lectures and learn the art of Dissecting, Injections, &c., are to pay five Pistoles more."

Looking at this with modern eyes, it seems a straightforward and business-like announcement of some very essential work, but the people of Philadelphia in 1762 took a very different view. The anatomist pursued his investigations at the risk of his life. Mobbing was talked of and feared, and the quiet house on North Fourth street, then some distance out of town, was looked upon as the haunt of body-snatchers and the favorite abiding place of ghosts. A long back yard led to an alley, and here the students stole in and out, shrouded in their long cloaks, and not daring to enter till darkness had settled down. With the more sensible citizens the agitation soon passed, but the prejudice lingered, traces of it being perceptible even to this day.

Until within a few years a lonely building by the stone bridge over the Cohocksink, on North Third street, was considered a receptacle for dead bodies brought there by the dreaded body-snatchers, "where their flesh was boiled and their bones burnt down for the use of the faculty;" and as "No Admittance" was on the door, and once a fortnight saw volumes of noisome and penetrating black smoke issuing from the chimneys, why should any one care to admit that it was simply a place for boiling oil and making hartshorn? Certainly not the boys, who went as near as they dared, and re-treated suddenly, singing :

"The body-snatchers! they have come,
And made a snatch at me;
It's very hard them kind of men
Won't let a body be!
Don't go to weep upon my grave,
And think that there I'll be;
They haven't left an atom there
Of my anatomy."

Three years after Dr. Shippen's course had been established Dr. Morgan joined him, but their united energy would have failed had not Franklin, alive to the deep importance of the subject, used all his influence to establish something permanent and befitting the needs of a growing city. "The College of Philadelphia" had been founded by Franklin and others in 1749, and chartered by Thomas and Richard Penn, but it was not until May 3, 1765, that the board of trustees of this institution unanimously elected Dr. Morgan Professor of the Theory and Practice of Physic, thereby creating the first medical professorship in America. A few months later, Dr. Shippen was elected Professor of Anatomy and Surgery.

The foundation for good work had already been laid, not only in the courses of lectures already given, but in the organization of a hospital. As usual, Franklin's energy was the moving power, his great popularity securing public contribution, though the needs of the sick and wounded in the growing colony had long been recognized by the physicians into whose hands they came. No class of men in the community do as much gratuitous work—not only gratuitous, but unrecognized—and there is therefore no cause for wonder that their action in the beginning of the undertaking held the same spirit which still rules all true members of the profession.

"At the time of the incorporation of this charitable institution (the Pennsylvania Hospital), when, on an appeal for assistance being made to the Provincial Assembly, one of the objections offered to the measure was that the cost of medical attendance would alone be sufficient to consume all the money that could be raised, it was met by the offer of Dr. Zachary and the Bonds to attend the patients gratuitously for three years. This became the settled understanding with the Board of Physicians and Surgeons, nor have we learned that the compact has ever been annulled or abrogated during the period of one hundred and thirty-one years (from 1751 to the present date), an instance of disinterested philanthropy which has been generally followed in the charitable institutions depending on medical attendance, not only of this city, but throughout the length and breadth of the land."

The necessity for a library was at once apparent, and partly through private, partly public contribution, it was founded one hundred and nineteen years ago. At present it contains nearly thirteen thousand volumes, accessible, under the necessary regulations, to all students and physicians.

Here, as in the United Kingdom, two medical degrees were to be conferred—the Bachelor's and the Doctor's. For the former degree it was necessary that the candidate should exhibit a sufficient acquaintance with the Latin tongue and with mathematics and philosophy; he must have a general knowledge of pharmacy, and have been apprenticed to a reputable practitioner in physic. He was obliged also to attend one course of clinical and one of didactic lectures, as well as the practice of the Pennsylvania Hospital for one year. After being privately examined by the faculty, he was then submitted to a public examination by the medical trustees and professors and such professors and trustees in other departments as chose to attend. To obtain the Doctor's degree it was requisite that three years should have passed since the conferring of the Bachelor's degree; that the candidate should be full twenty-four years old, and that he should write and publicly defend a thesis in the college.

A separate chair of Materia Medica and Botany was created in 1768, to which Dr. Adam Kuhn, who had studied these branches in Sweden under Linnæus, was at once elected, holding the position until he assumed the Chair of Practice, a period of twenty-one years.

Commencement, however indifferently it may be regarded by the outer world, is a season of profound excitement to those more closely concerned; but that of June 1st, 1768, held a deep significance to every citizen who watched the course of progress for the colony. In the old minutes of the board of trustees may still be read the stately paragraphs in which this "Birthday of Medical Honors in America" is described in full, and we can see the imposing procession of "the several Professors and Medical Candidates in their proper Habits proceeding from the Apparatus-Room to the Public Hall, where a polite assembly of their fellow-citizens were convened to honor the Solemnity."

"Solemnity" it undoubtedly was, for what hopes and fears had not entered into this three years of laborious experiment? The Provost gave voice to the magnitude of the occasion in sonorous Latin, and an oration in the same tongue followed, lightness and grace being given to the rather ponderous ceremonies by the first public discussion: "A Dispute Whether the Retina or Tunica Choroides be the immediate Seat of Vision? The argument for the retina was ingeniously maintained by Mr. Cowell; the opposite side of the question was supported with great acuteness by Mr. Fullerton, who contended that the retina is incapable of the office ascribed to it, on account of its being easily permeable to the rays of light, and that the choroid coat, by its being opaque, is the proper part for stopping the rays and receiving the picture of the object."

Ten graduates received the degree of Bachelor of Medicine, not a man among them having failed to win honor in the after career, and several of them transmitting both honor and the same ability to descendants who are in active life to-day.

King's College, in New York, which had in 1769 given the degree of B. M., followed in the ensuing year with that of M. D., this honor not being conferred by the Philadelphia college till 1771; and thus, though Philadelphia led the way in the award of any medical degree, New York can, of course, claim priority in having given the doctorate.

No chair of Chemistry had at first been founded, but one of the most brilliant students Philadelphia has ever known made the new chair a matter of course. Though but twenty-four when he received the appointment, Dr. Benjamin Rush was widely known, not only as chemist, but from the notes made by him in his seventeenth year on the yellow fever of 1762—the only record of that epidemic in existence. He brought with him from London, where he spent some time after his graduation at the Edinburg School, a chemical apparatus presented by Thomas Penn, the only member of the Penn family who had any interest in the intellectual progress of the city they still counted as theirs. Probably so juvenile a faculty has never before or since met within the walls of any college. Rush was but twenty-four; Kuhn, twenty-eight; Shippen, thirty-three, and Morgan, the patriarch of the assembly, thirty-four.

"The thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts," and these boyish professors, planning far beyond any present possibility, lived to see their dearest wishes fulfilled, and the college, to which the vigor and best energy of their early manhood had been given, unrivaled in its accomplishment, and sought by students from every state in the Union.

The war of the Revolution proved a serious check to the steady growth of the school. During the occupation of the city by the British all instruction was suspended, and some of the professors took their places as medical officers in the army. In 1779 the college charter was abrogated, its officers removed and its property transferred to a new organization, the "University of the State of Pennsylvania," which received much more extended educational privileges and larger endowment. For twelve years the two schools gave independent courses of instruction, but at the end of that time they agreed to sink differences and unite. At the same time, following the precedent of the University of Edinburgh, the degree of B. M. was dropped and the time of study limited to two courses in the institution, and three years' pupilage under some respectable practitioner.

Up to 1810, Obstetrics had no chair; but was taught in connection with anatomy. Dr. T. C. James was its first regular professor. Another novelty came in at the same time, being applied to the preliminary examination of the student, which took place through a screen, only the dean knowing the applicant's name. This structure, known as "The Green Box," and looked upon with much the same terror as that inspired by a hidden corner in the Inquisition, was maintained for ten years, but the name still clings to the dreaded ordeal. Public examination also has been abolished, and the student is now examined in private by each professor.

An auxiliary faculty of five chairs was added in 1865; Zoology and Comparative Anatomy, Botany, Hygiene, Mineralogy and Geology, Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology—lectures on these courses being given three times a week in April, May and June.

A building which became known as Surgeons' Hall, on Fifth street, below Library, was the first one erected specially for the school, and was used until 1800, when a house on Ninth street, between Market and Chestnut, was bought, which had been built as a mansion for the use of the President of the United States, the cornerstone bearing the inscription:

"THIS CORNER-STONE WAS LAID ON THE 10TH DAY OF MAY, 1792.
THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA OUT OF DEBT.
THOMAS MIFFLIN, GOVERNOR."

Three generations came and went before new and larger quarters were found, with ample space for any future growth.

At Thirty-sixth street and the old Darby road, made now by corporation stupidity into Woodland avenue, a name as meaningless as the old one was suggestive, stands a group of the most beautiful buildings in the city—the medical hall and laboratory, with the hospital at the back. The medical hall is the largest building of its kind in the United States, containing the museum, library, private rooms of the professors and the laboratories of physiology, experimental therapeutics, histology and pathology, as well as the various lecture-rooms. An area of over seven thousand square feet is covered by the adjacent building, which includes the two laboratories of chemistry, the dissecting room, and on the ground floor the dental operating room. Each of these occupies an entire story, while separated only by a street is the University Hospital, with its dispensaries; and one square away the Philadelphia Hospital, with its thousand beds.

No more beautiful group of buildings is to be found in the United States. The great trees of Harvard and Yale are lacking, and the few set out here and there seem to find the struggle for mere life hard enough to prevent any attempt at growth. But velvety turf slopes away on the eastern side almost to the busy river. The city lies beyond, its many spires clear against the sky, and the student will hardly find an alma mater more worthy of honor or remembrance.

Up to 1879 the course of study was not especially rigid in its demands, and as rumored lack of thoroughness existed, the graded course was instituted, and attendance upon three winter sessions made imperative if a diploma was to be secured. Recently an exceedingly thorough (optional) medical course of four years has been organized, meeting with considerable success, while an entrance examination upon the main branches of a sound general education has also been added. Details of methods adopted are full of interest, but have no room in this sketch of the general system. It is sufficient to say of this parent school of American medicine, that it has always held fast to that which was good; has stood ready and eager to respond to the demand for higher medical education, and that, while always conservative, it represents a conservatism which has ever been both enlightened and generous.

The Jefferson Medical College, of Philadelphia, chartered April 7, 1825, began as a branch of the Jefferson College, of Cannonsburg; but became, thirteen years later, a distinct corporation. Its first teachings were given at 518 Prune, now Locust street, in very humble quarters, the building standing beside what was then the Potters' Field, now Washington Square, the old Walnut Street Prison still further darkening its outlook. A small beginning for a school which now ranks as one of the most successful in the country, and which contended from its inception against deep-seated prejudice and opposition. Time has proved that the founding of a second school, so far from injuring the first, has, by the competition thus introduced, largely aided in giving to Philadelphia its reputation as a great centre of medical education.

The first sixteen years of the life of "Old Jeff," as it is affectionately called by its alumni, were disturbed by public opposition, internal dissension and frequent change in office. The faculty had organized with Dr. George McClellan, the founder and ruling spirit, and Drs. John Eberle, Jacob Green, William P. C. Barton, Benjamin Rush Rhees, John Barnes and Nathan R. Smith, Dean; but one chair alone had eight incumbents during the period mentioned, and uncertainty was the only certain thing about the new venture. With 1841 and the resignation of Dr. McClellan, came a "reorganization," and the assured financial success of this alma mater of some of our most eminent practitioners, the new faculty having been headed by Dunglison and represented by Mitchell, Mütter, Meigs, Bache and Pancoast.

The catalogue for the session 1828-29, announced that "The present session of the lectures is held in the very elegant and appropriately furnished new building in Tenth street," and there the college remains to the present day. The building has been lately remodeled, and the city has lost the picturesque Grecian front, but much space has been gained by the change. The new building contains two large lecture rooms, each capable of seating over six hundred students, and well-appointed laboratories of chemistry, experimental therapeutics, pathological histology and of physiology. In the last named are given demonstrations of the principal facts in experimental physiology and histology. A valuable and rapidly growing museum is in the same building, and the dissecting rooms are large and convenient, being open from October to the middle of June. West of the main building lies the Jefferson College Hospital, separated from it only by a narrow passage-way. Five stories high and one hundred and seven feet square, it is so planned as to easily accommodate one hundred and twenty-five patients, and at the same time give ample space for both the dispensary department and for the amphitheatre, where daily clinics are held. In the past year it is stated that over one thousand surgical operations have been here performed. Two resident physicians, as well as several clinical assistants in the dispensary, are appointed annually from the most recent graduates of the college.

The system of instruction is still that which has long been popular throughout this country—a non-graded course of two winter sessions, each of nearly six months' duration. An optional three years' course has lately been introduced, with encouraging results, but no entrance examination is required. Lectures from eight chairs are given, and, in addition to the demonstrations previously mentioned, there is required practical work in the chemical laboratory, while the graduating class, in sections of convenient size, practice in minor and operative surgery and bandaging, besides instruction in physical diagnosis. A spring course of lectures on special subjects is given, lasting nearly two months, and a preliminary course of three weeks in the fall.

Active discussion still goes on as to the merits and demerits of a non-graded course, but no student will deny the difficulty of obtaining any satisfactory grasp of diagnosis, therapeutics and surgery with at most only a partial knowledge of anatomy and physiology. Undoubtedly able physicians are graduated upon the non-graded plan, for there is scarcely one of the prominent practitioners of this city whose studies were not pursued under this method. But it is an equally undoubted fact that the graduate whose studies have been followed in their logical sequence through a period of three years, equal ability being conceded, is better fitted in the end to enter upon the duties of his profession, and that both he and the public at large are the gainers by his increased expenditure of time and money.

More than a decade has passed since an urgent appeal was made by Dr. Gross, one of the most honored names in medical science, for a higher standard of education, in an address given before the alumni association of this college, at its first anniversary, March 11th, 1871, in which he says:

"The time of study should be increased to four years, embracing four courses of lectures of nine months each. The examinations for the degree of Doctor of Medicine should be conducted by a separate board, one entirely independent of the school in which the student has attended lectures. A higher standard of preliminary education should be demanded, and no applicant should be admitted unless he is a man of high culture and refinement; or, in other words, a thorough gentleman, ambitious to uphold the honor and dignity of the profession."

Thorough knowledge and training are certainly at the command of every student who chooses Philadelphia as his working ground, for within the limits of the city are thirteen general hospitals and fourteen for the treatment of special classes of diseases and injuries. In addition to these are four hospitals for lying-in and the diseases of women, and two for the diseases of children, with eight general and six special dispensaries. Valuable free clinical lectures are given in many of these institutions, and nearly all are accessible to the energetic student.

The mere mention of the Woman's Medical College recalls the absolute fury of opposition encountered, not only here, but at any point where the medical education of women was suggested. The pioneers in the new departure have lived to see many dreams fulfilled. The movement has had the usual course, the story of any unfamiliar truth, scientific or otherwise, having been from the foundation of the world the same. Violent opposition, often ending in death for the propounders of the obnoxious fact; an intermediate stage of partial assent; a final one in which the thing suddenly becomes a part of the established order of the universe, and it is denied that anybody ever thought of denying. We have not gone as far as the little boy who was born and reared in a woman's hospital among women physicians. He stood by a mantel in a friend's house, looking at a plaster group representing a doctor and his patient. After examining the doctor with a puzzled air, he turned to his mother, with a look of scornful astonishment, exclaiming: "Why, mother! it's a man!"

The educational bias in this case was a trifle one-sided, though perhaps none too much so when the weight of all opposing generations is taken into account.

The Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania was incorporated by the State Legislature on the 11th of March, 1850, under the name of "The Female Medical College of Pennsylvania," and is the first institution ever chartered to grant to women the title of M. D. The first incorporators of the college were William J. Mullen, Dr. Frederick A. Fickhardt, Dr. Henry Gibbons, Ferdinand J. Dreer, Dr. William J. Birkey, R. P. Kane and John Longstreth.

The college was opened for instruction the 2d of October, 1850, and its first commencement was held at the Musical Fund Hall December 30th, 1851. From that day to this the friends of the institution have labored for its success with an energy and zeal that are rare except in the annals of the oppressed. It suffered both from the apathy and the ridicule of the general public and the distrust of the profession at large, and, within its walls, from attempts to introduce heterodox teachings and from great poverty. One by one, through the unflagging and disinterested labors of the faculty and incorporators, these obstacles have been surmounted. While the college lacked money, its courses of instruction were given in a most unpretending building in the rear of 229 Arch street. When contributions from generous friends were received—and in its early years the school was far from self-supporting—they were applied only to immediate practical needs; and thus, though the institution has felt poverty, it has never been burdened by debt. Its place is made, and to-day the Woman's Medical College and its hospital number among their lecturers and consultants some of the most prominent representatives of medical teaching in Philadelphia.

In 1868 the college received a large bequest through the will of the late Isaac Barton, by the aid of which the present building, on the corner of North College avenue and Twenty-first street, was erected. The corner-stone was laid October 1, 1874, by T. Morris Perot, "in the name of Woman and for Her Advancement in the Science and Practice of Medicine."

The college is a handsome four-story brick building with a frontage of nearly two hundred feet. Much care was exercised in making its arrangements subservient to its special end, and numerous peculiarities, such as placing the lecture-rooms upon one floor, the easy stairs, the cloak-room and toilet arrangements, and the carefully screened windows, mark it as a building expressly adapted for the use of women. This college was the first to introduce the optional three years' course, and has since made the attendance upon three graded winter sessions a requisite for graduation. The order of lectures and examinations and the conditions of graduation are practically the same as those in the University of Pennsylvania, except that there are preliminary examinations in chemistry, anatomy and physiology at the end of the first session and that there is at present no entrance examination. A weekly "quiz" upon each branch taught forms a part of the regular instruction and is free to every student. In addition to the didactic instruction, there are well-stocked laboratories of chemistry, physiology, pathology, histology and pharmacy, in each of which practical work is required. An important extension of the session is found in the spring term, which, as the list shows, is attended by about seventy-five per cent of the entire number of students registered, and which is nearly equally divided between laboratory work, lectures, and instruction.

In view of the fact that the practice of the graduates of this school is almost exclusively confined to female patients and children, its clinical facilities are exceptionally good. The Woman's Hospital, where over four thousand patients are annually treated, is in the immediate neighborhood of the college, and its dispensary service and free bedside instruction are daily open to the advanced student. Several clinics weekly are held here by members of the staff; and clinical instruction in the Philadelphia, Wills and Orthopædic Hospitals, as well as in the Philadelphia Lying-in Charity, is easily accessible. Four graduates are annually appointed assistants to the resident physician in the Woman's Hospital, and the large out-practice of this institution is mainly under their charge. The college has a small but well-selected library and a reading-room.

No notice of this school would be complete without the mention of two physicians, to whom it owes much of its present reputation. I refer to Mrs. E. H. Cleveland and Ann Preston, both deceased. To very many Philadelphians their names are synonyms for professional thoroughness and zeal, and their lives give conclusive proof that there is no necessary incompatibility between the trained perceptions of the physician and surgeon and the possession of all womanly gentleness and grace.

A homœopathic medical school the Hahneman Medical College, is also located in this city, and bears the highest reputation among institutions of its class.

In this paper reference to medical teachers now in active life has been purposely avoided. For the facts embodied, and for much valuable information which might readily have escaped an unprofessional observer, the author is indebted to Dr. N. A. Randolph, of the University of Pennsylvania.

HELEN CAMPBELL.

A MAIDEN.

VAIN are the common metaphors of song
To paint this lovely one ;
All language does her wrong
In which the praise of other maids is sung.

The misty tenderness of Spring,
A young dove with its lifted wing,
A lily ere its dew is shed,
Snow-drops with roses overhead,
Clear coral blooming in a purple sea,
Pure pearls, and soft-carved ivory,
A gliding fawn in jasmine shade,
A May-flower smiling half afraid,
An airy cloudlet's fleecy tress,
Tinged with the new moon's chaste caress,
Faint odors of pale mignonette
With Twilight's languid kisses wet,

The Dawn's first blushes, and the look
That gleams within a mountain brook—
All hint of her, but none express
Her nature's perfect loveliness—
Her purity of look and tone,
The light of love about her thrown,
Her delicate and winsome grace,
The chiseled clearness of her face,
The sweet repose in which she lives,
Unconscious of the joy she gives :
Of all that's finest, naught but her
Can be her clear interpreter.
Her beauty is a spirit true,
To all that is divine in you ;
A sight of her is a new sense
To one in love with innocence.

Qui ce matin avait disclosé,
Sa robe de pourpre au soleil
A point perdu ceste vesprée,
Les plis de sa robe pourprée
Et son teint au vostre pareil.
Las ! voyez comme en peu d'espace,
Mignonne, elle a dessus la place !
Las ! Las ! ses beautez laissé cheoir !

O vrayment marstre Nature
Puis qu'une telle fleur ne dure
Que du matin jusques au soir
Donc si vous me croyez, Mignonne,
Tandis que vostre âge fleuronne

CHAPTER I.

"Along the crisped shades and bowers Revels the spruce and jocund Spring."

NOT less lustily than elsewhere is the spruce and jocund Spring reveling in the Grosse Garten at Dresden on this May Day. And though there is still in her very frolic a disposition to pinch sharply, a certain tartness in her green smile, yet many glad subjects have come forth to do homage to her new Queendom. Yes, many : for to-day the Dresdeners—as I am told is their custom on each fresh May Day—have issued out on foot and in carriage to welcome the year's new sovereign. They are holding a sort of flower-feast ; everybody is throwing bouquets to everybody else. Above their heads the trees are breaking into little leaf ; upon the side-paths throng the foot-passengers ; along the drives the carriages gayly roll. Here is a very smart turn-out. Surely this must be the King and the Queen ? Not at all ! It is only Graf von S., reclining with a self-satisfied air alone in a barouche, richly filled with choice nosegays, and drawn by four chestnut horses, with a crimson velvet postilion jiggling up and down in front, and a crimson velvet outrider trotting bravely behind. An Englishman would feel a fool in such a position, but far indeed from a like frame of mind is that of this splendid and happy German.

Well, here come the King and Queen really now, with their mouse-colored liveries ; come, bowing and smiling with as much affability as if they were real big royalties ; no one troubling himself to get out of their way ; not a policeman to be seen ; no open space imperatively cleared, as when the Princess of Wales comes trotting serenely down the drive. Here are soldiers in plenty ; but soldiers thinking for the most part neither of war nor beer ; soldiers with their martial hands full of innocent daffodillies and fresh sweet Nancies. Gardereiters in their light blue uniforms and flat blue caps, pricking hither and thither on their sleek horses, carrying bouquets of roses, azaleas, deutzias, hyacinths, and seeking here and there with grave gray eyes for the happy fair ones for whom they are destined.

Two bands are clashing merrily out ; a great booming thump on the big drum makes the horses start and fidget. Now, for a change, comes a real English turn-out. One need not look twice to decide its nationality. The square-sitting, bolt-upright servants in their quiet liveries ; the plain but shining harness ; the great glossy-coated bays stepping together like one horse—who can doubt concerning them ? Now more English in hired carriages ; but do not judge us by these, O kind Saxons ! these are not our best ! And yet it is in one of these very hired carriages that are sitting a pair of young women of whom their England has no need to be ashamed, and who are not at all ashamed of themselves. Not that the present is their happiest moment, for the expression of one face is cross, and of the other anxious.

"Shall we go home, Belinda ?" asks the cross one morosely.

"Why, we have only just come," objects Belinda.

A Russian carriage passes ; a coachman with a hat like a beefeater and a long cloth frock pulled in with gathers at the waist. Then more Germans, with bunches of narcissus at their horses' ears, and in their servants' breasts. Now a Gardereiter perched on the box of a coach, driving six-in-hand, and with a confiding lady in a pink bonnet beside him tranquilly enjoying her position, nor anywise disturbed by the hopeless muddle into which her hero has got his innumerable reins. Another blue Gardereiter flings her a bouquet, but it is ill-aimed, falls upon the road, and the wheels pass over it. This sight is too much for the fortitude of Belinda's sister.

"I must take some desperate step to attract attention," she says crossly, yet with a vein of humor streaking her ill-temper ; "what do you recommend ? Shall I be frightened at the big drum, and give a loud shriek, or will you ?"

"Certainly not I !"

"I cannot think what has happened to them ! They must be wrong in their heads ! Are you aware that not one of them has thrown us a single bouquet ?"

"Why should they ?" answers Belinda. "We know none of them."

"Even though they do not know us, they might toss us a handful of flowers," said Sarah grumblingly. "I am sure we look wistful enough, and that requires no great amount of acquaintance !"

"I should think it extremely impertinent if they did !" replies Belinda loftily.

The other pouts.

"For my part, then, I wish that they would begin to be impertinent at once !"

But for such insolence the Saxon army appears to have no sort of bent. In silence the neglected girls drive on. And the sun shines, and the east wind blows, and the big drum booms, and the great brass instruments blare, and still they trot round the bit of dull water, up the straight drives, past the Museum of Antiquities. A rain of spring nosegays falls around them ; but not one is aimed at their humble landau, not one drops, even by accident, into their empty laps.

Here come the King and Queen again; the mouse-colored and silver outriders; the suave and middle-aged pair of little royalties. The gloom on Sarah's face deepens, and even in Belinda's eyes the anxious, seeking look has grown intensified. If they know no one in this gay foreign throng, whom is she seeking?

"After all," she presently says, "you knew, Sarah, when you were so anxious to come, that we should meet no acquaintance here except Professor Forth, and—"

"Well, and why is not he here, pray?" cries Sarah, with a burst of genuine ill-humor that seems sensibly to ease her. "Did not I order him to be punctual to the moment? Even he would be better than nothing!"

Belinda smiles ironically.

"That is an enthusiastic form of encomium upon the man that you are going to marry!"

But Sarah does not heed. Her eyes are directed to the sidewalk, where the brisk foot-passengers pass and repass.

"There he is!" she cries in a disgusted voice; "certainly there is no mistaking him! Did you ever see such a gait in your life? Look at him slouching along on his great flat feet!"

Belinda looks as directed; and sure enough, amid the strapping soldiers erect and tall, detects without difficulty a slovenly middle-aged figure, clerical, if you judge by its coat; scholarly, if you decide by its spectacles. With his hands behind him, and his hat set somewhat on the back of his head, he is mooning absently along.

"Is it possible?" cries Sarah, half-rising from her seat, and in a tone that is almost awful from its ire. "Yes; it is monstrous; it is unbelievable! but it is nevertheless true that he has not brought me a bouquet after all!"

"Yes, he has," replies Belinda quietly, "only it is so small that it requires a keen sight to perceive it."

As they speak the object of their observation becomes aware of their vicinity, and turning his moony scholar's gaze toward them, awkwardly aims at them a tiny bunch of not particularly fresh violets. It falls into his betrothed's lap, but not long does it remain there. With an angry gesture, and before Belinda can stop her, she has tossed it out into the road; and the Gardereiter, with his six black horses, and his confiding companion, who are just in the act of again passing, drive over it, and grind it into the dust. Thanks, however, to his near-sight the donor is saved from witnessing this humbling spectacle.

"I am afraid that my aim was not good," he says innocently, as the carriage draws up at the sidewalk, exploring, as he speaks, the interior through his spectacles in search of his missing posy. "I fear that the nosegay I directed towards you must have fallen short, and never reached you."

"Oh yes, it did," replied Sarah, with a sort of ferocious playfulness; "but as it was too large for me to carry, I put it outside."

"How late you are!" cries Belinda, hastily trying by a rapid change of subject and a sweet, good-natured smile, to erase the traces of this suave speech. "After playing us so false, you cannot expect to find us in a very good humor."

"I was delayed by an accident," replies the lover irritably. "I found the east wind so very much keener than I was aware of"—shivering a little, and buttoning his coat more tightly over his narrow chest—"that as I am extremely susceptible to cold, I was compelled to return to my lodgings for a second overcoat. Sarah knows!"—with a rather resentful glance at his fiancée—"that I am extremely susceptible to cold."

But Sarah heeds him no more than she does the east wind of which he complains.

"Ah! Bravo!" she is crying joyfully, as another bouquet—a real one this time—large as a Cheshire cheese, fragrant as a hot-house, choice and costly as should be young Love's tribute, comes flying into the carriage.

She has stretched out both hands to grasp it; no doubt as to its destination troubling her triumph, although to a looker-on it would have seemed as if it were aimed more at the other sister, at Belinda, who has also half-stretched out her hands, but has quickly withdrawn them, and turned with patient attention, though with something of a blank look on her face, to the Professor's fretful sarcasms on the absurdity of an al fresco entertainment in such weather. But though he misses nothing in her civil listening, though her head is turned toward him, and quite averted from her sister, yet her ears miss no one syllable of that sister's exuberant thanks.

"Come near, that I may bless you!" she hears her cry coquettishly. "You see I have not a hand to give you; but you must blame yourself for that. What a giant it is! How fresh! How good!"—evidently smelling it. "It has quite put me into good humor again with this odious entertainment. I assure you I never was so flouted in my life! What boors they are! How different it would have been if they had been Frenchmen!" etc., etc.

Perhaps it is that her volubility leaves no space for answers from the person she addresses. Certain it is that he is strangely silent. Is it not odd to accept gratitude so bounteous with so entire a dumbness. In pondering on this problem, Belinda presently loses the thread of the Professor's complaints; awakes from her musing to find him first gazing at her with surprised offense, then gone; then succeeded in his station at the carriage-door by some one; some one else who has no spectacles, who does not stoop nor cower before the east wind; some one young, in short—word of splendid compass! He is young: not with the conventional youth loosely assigned by society to any unmarried male under eighty, but really young; some one who three-and-twenty years ago did not exist.

Who that was not young and callow would be staring at her with all his eyes, and saying aggrievedly under his breath:

"Why did you not catch it? You knew I meant it for you!"

She looks back at him: a happy, red smile warming the face that men have often blamed as chill and high.

"I did my best!"

"What are you two gabbling about?" cries Sarah restlessly, cutting ruthlessly short a sentence of her betrothed's. "Are you saying anything about me? Ah! I see you both look guilty!"

Neither deceives her.

A quarter of an hour later the two girls are bowling homewards to their grandmamma and their apartment in the Lüttichau Strasse, leaving behind them the King, the Queen, the Graf von S. in his barouche, and the brave soldiers, both blue and green. Belinda has bent her delicate head, and is laying her cheek most tenderly against the blossoms in her sister's lap.

"Let me beg of you not to mumble them," cries Sarah politely, interposing a prohibitory hand. "You always seem to have an idea that flowers ought to be eaten."

Then seeing a quite unaccountable flash of indignation in her sister's eyes, adds generously: "If they were not all wired, as I see they are, I would spare you an orchid or two."

"Would you indeed!" replies Belinda ironically. But further than this, her magnanimous silence does not give way.

CHAPTER II.

A NIGHT has passed since the Professor's damaged violets bit the dust. It is now morning, and at the window of her bed-room in the Lüttichau Strasse, with the sash flung high (to the deep astonishment of the German Dienst-mädchen, to whom the smell of an unaired room, further flavored with departed sausages and old beer, is as dear as to the rest of her nation), Belinda sits, the sun warming her hair, and the tart air freshening her face. She is looking fixedly out on the pear-tree in the garden-scrap below, the pear-tree that a week ago was pinchedly struggling into flower, that has been daily whitening ever since, and now seems to stagger under its burden of blossom-snow. Yet I doubt whether she sees it.

"Is it possible?" she is saying to herself, almost with awe—the awe that a great joy gives—"is it possible?"

A slight noise makes her turn her head and see the tall white door open to admit her sister.

"Are you alone?" says the latter, cautiously peeping.

"Of course I am alone," replies Belinda crossly. "Am I in the habit of receiving in my bed-room?"

This not particularly gracious answer is, however, quite enough for Sarah, who forthwith enters, and steps friskily across the sunshiny parquet, looking as clean as a cherry, as pink and white as a May-bush.

"The moment is apparently not a propitious one," she says, laughing, and drawing a chair close up to her sister's knees; "but as my need is sore, I am afraid I cannot afford to wait for a better. I have come, my Belinda, to ask a favor of you."

"Then you may go away again at once," replies Belinda with surly decision, "for I tell you, once for all, I will not grant it."

"What! refuse even before you hear what it is?" cries the other, lifting those brows which nature, slightly abetted, perhaps, by a pair of tweezers, has drawn in the thinnest straight line across her wrinkleless forehead.

"Do you think I do not recognize that well-known formula?" asks Belinda severely. "I am sure that I have heard it often enough. It means that you expect me to tell Professor Forth that you have every intention of jilting him!"

"You word it coarsely," replies Sarah composedly; "but I have heard worse guesses."

"Then I absolutely and flatly refuse the office!" rejoins Belinda firmly. "WHY you engaged yourself to him in the first instance?"

"WHY indeed?" interrupts the other, casting up both eyes and hands to heaven. "You may well ask!"

"And yet," pursues Belinda, regarding her sister with an air of stern wonder, "when you wrote to announce your engagement to me, you said that you did not know what you had done to deserve such happiness!"

"I did not—I did not!" cries Sarah, reddening for once with genuine shame, and putting her fingers before her face. "Do not say it; it is not true! It was not about him; it was one of the others!"

"One of the others!" echoes Belinda, scornfully curling up her fine nose. "How pleasant and dignified to be bandied about! ONE OF THE OTHERS!"

"It may not be dignified," replies Sarah impudently, though under the lash of her sister's words even her throat has crimsoned, "but it is not so very unpleasant!"

"You know," continues Belinda sternly, "that I took a solemn oath to wash my hands of your affairs, last time, when I had that painful scene with poor young Manners, and he walked round the room on his knees after me, clutching my skirts and sobbing!"

"He always sobbed!" interjects Sarah hard-heartedly. "I have seen him cry like a pump!"

"I have already told six men that you had only been making fools of them," continues the elder sister, contemptuously passing by her junior's lame attempt at palliation.

"Six! Come now, gently."

"I repeat, six! In fact, I think I am rather understating it; and I will not tell a seventh!"

"A seventh!!!"

"If you imply that I am exaggerating, I am quite willing to count. First"—checking off on her long white fingers beginning with the thumb—"first, young Manners!"

"We have had him once already!"

"Second"—traveling on to the forefinger—"Colonel Greene. Poor fellow! he sobbed too!"

"More shame for him!"—brazenly.

"Third, the young clergyman whom you picked up at the seaside, and whose name I never can remember."

"No more can I!" cries Sarah, with animation. "How strange! Pooh! What was it again? Did it begin with a B?"

"Fourth," continues Belinda relentlessly, arriving at her third finger—"fourth, old Lord Blucher, who was so deaf that I could not get him to understand what I meant."

But Sarah's light mind was still on the track of her lover's lost initial.

"I am almost sure that it began with an L!" she says thoughtfully.

"Fifth"—extending her little finger—"Mr. Brabazon."

"You counted him before!"

"I did not!"

"I think you did."

"I am sure I did not; but to make certain, we will begin all over again. First"—returning to her thumb—"poor young Manners—"

"Stop!" cries Sarah loudly, putting her fingers in her ears, and abandoning the search for the young clergyman's name. "I will grant that there were six, sixteen, sixty—anything to put an end to that intolerable arithmetic of yours!"

Belinda is preparing to begin on her other hand, but at this concession she lets them both drop in her lap, and ceases counting. There is a silence. Sarah's roving eyes are despondently fastened on the white earthenware stove, and Belinda's large grave gaze is straying through the window, taking in at once the poetry of the blooming pear-tree and the prose of the Bohemian railway, and the ugly straight stuccoed houses beyond it.

"What could have been your inducement in this case," she says presently, turning with a judicial air to the offender, "I am quite at a loss to conjecture; it certainly could have been neither pleasure nor profit!"

"It certainly could not," answers Sarah, sighing profoundly, and wagging her head from side to side; "any one who saw him would exonerate me from the suspicion of either motive!"

"Such a conquest could not have even gratified your vanity!" pursues Belinda relentlessly.

"Yes, but it did!" replies Sarah, abandoning her dispirited pose, and speaking with an animation which shows that she does not altogether relish this wholesale depreciation of her latest victim: "you may not think much of him, but I can assure you that he is considered a great luminary at Oxbridge. At the house where I met him they could not make enough of him; it seems he has written a book upon the Digamma!"

"And what is the Digamma?" asks Belinda curiously, totally unmoved by this evidence of erudition.

"You do not know what the Digamma is?" cries Sarah, lifting her eyebrows, and speaking with an air of pompous astonishment. "Well, then," breaking into a laugh, and even demeaning herself so far as to be guilty of the faintest possible shadow of a wink, "to tell you a secret, no more do I!"

"You cannot live upon the Digamma, I suppose!" says Belinda grimly, not much infected by her sister's mirth.

"I should be very sorry to try!" still laughing.

"Then I am quite as much in the dark as ever!" rejoins the other, inexorably grave.

"Well, it was not only the Digamma, of course," says Sarah, frowning in reluctant retrospect; "though as far as I could make out that appeared to be his cheval de bataille; but he was looked upon as a genius generally. You should have seen how they all sat at his feet—such feet—and hung on his words. There was one girl—she was at Gorton—who waited on him hand and foot; she always warmed his great-coat for him, and helped him on with his goloshes!"

"Well?"

"Well, you know," impatiently, as if stating something too obvious to be contradicted, "one would not have been human if one could have stood calmly by and looked on. I rushed into the fray. I, too, warmed his great-coat and put on his goloshes. Ugh! what a size they were! I could have lived roomily and commodiously in one of them!"

"Well?"

"Well, indeed! I do not call it at all well! I call it very ill!"

"There I have the good fortune thoroughly to agree with you."

"Well, as I was saying," resuming the thread of her narrative with a heavy sigh, "I rushed into the fray. I was successful, dreadfully successful! You know the sequel, as they say in books."

"I do not know the sequel," replies Belinda sternly; "all I know is that I will have neither part nor lot in it!"

"No? and yet," fawningly, "it would come so much better from you."

"Better or worse, it will not come from me."

"When you break it to them," sidling up with a cajoling air, "it does not hurt them nearly so much! I declare I think they almost like it!"

No answer. A silence cut into only by the uncouth shriek of a departing engine.

"Why, at least, did you drag him here?" asks Belinda presently, still opposing a front of granite to her sister's blandishments.

"I am afraid I cannot quite defend it," replies Sarah, in a small voice, and again hanging her head; "but to tell the truth—which, indeed, I always try to do—times were slack! There was nobody else much just then, and I thought I could at least make him fetch and carry!" Then, with an acute change of key and excess of emotion: "I was grossly deceived; he is too disobliging to fetch, and too much afraid of over-fatiguing himself to carry!"

Another pause. A quick wind-whiff tosses through the window a little storm of pear-petals, and throws them on Belinda's lap.

"Now, if the cases were reversed," says Sarah, kneeling down at her senior's elbow, and folding her hands with an extremely insinuating gesture of supplication, "if you were in difficulties—"

"I never am in difficulties."

"I do not see much to brag of in that, for my part!" springing to her feet again.

"No more do I," replies Belinda dryly. "I am never in difficulties, as you call them, because I never have any temptation to be; perhaps if I had I might; but as you are well aware," stifling a sigh, "I have not, and never had any charm for men!"

"It is very odd, is not it?" says Sarah, not attempting to combat this assertion, but looking at her sister with an expression of compassionate curiosity. "I cannot think why it is. I have often wondered what the reason could be; sometimes I think it is your nose!"

"My nose?" repeats Belinda hastily, involuntarily glancing round in search of a mirror, and putting up her hand to her face; "what is the matter with my nose?"

"There is nothing the matter with it," rejoins Sarah, still speculatively gauging her sister's attractions; "perhaps it would be better for you if there were: it is only too good! I cannot fancy any man venturing to love such a nose; it looks too high and mighty to inspire anything short of veneration!"

"It is not so very high either!" cries Belinda hurriedly, drawing from her pocket a very fine handkerchief, and applying a corner of it in careful measurement to her traduced feature. "There," marking off a small portion with her thumb; "only that much."

"It is not a case of measurement," says Sarah gravely; "I have seen noses several hands higher that were not nearly so alarming. It is a case of feeling; somehow yours makes them feel small. Take my word for it," with a shrewd look, "the one thing that they never can either forgive or forget is to be made to feel small."

Belinda laughs a little bitterly.

"It is clear, then, that nothing short of amputation could make me attractive, and I am afraid even that might fail; but I do not know why we digressed to me at all."

"I had a little plan," says Sarah, her airy gayety giving sudden place again to gloom at the returning thought of her own sorrows; "but you have frightened it away."

"What is it?" very shortly.

"Well, you know," instantly resuming her wheedling air and her coaxing posture at her sister's knees, "that we are going to drive to Moritzburg to-day, you and I; of course Professor Forth," with a slight grimace, "will be on duty there to meet us; equally of course, young Rivers, who seems to have contracted a not altogether reprehensible habit of dogging our steps, will be there too."

"Well?" averting her head a little.

"Well, I thought—but you are not a pleasant person to unfold one's little schemes to—I thought that for once you might be obliging, and pair off casually with my dear, and take an opportunity of softly breathing to him that nobody—I least of all—will try to stop him if he effects a graceful retreat to Oxbridge and the Di-gamma!"

"And meanwhile you?" in a rather low and suppressed voice, and with face still turned away.

"And meanwhile I," replies Sarah, jovially, "killing two birds with one stone—keeping the coast clear, that is to say, and marking my gratitude for that haystack of gardenias—shall be straying hand-in-hand through the vernal woods with—"

But that sentence is destined never to be ended.

Belinda has risen from her seat with a gesture so sudden and violent as almost to destroy the equilibrium of the girl so caressingly propped against her, and has thrust head and neck out of the window, as if, even in this fresh room, she gasped for air.

It is a moment before she speaks; and even then her voice sounds odd.

"I have already told you that I utterly decline to be mixed up in your entanglements. I forbid you to mention the subject to me again."

"Whew-w-w!" says Sarah by-and-by, in a low key, when she has recovered the breath reft from her by her stupefaction at her sister's procedure, enough to speak at all; remaining seated meanwhile in stunned isolation on her lonely stool. "Forbid! What an ugly word! After all," speculatively, "I am not much surprised that men are frightened at you. I am frightened at you myself sometimes; and so no wonder that they shake in their shoes, and dare not call their harmless souls their own."

"How many times are you going to tell me that?" cries Belinda, veering round in sudden passion. "Do you think that it can be very pleasant to hear that I can never inspire anything but alarm and aversion? I am as well aware of it as you can be; but I am a little tired of hearing it."

"And you might inspire such different feelings," says Sarah, in a tone of the purest artistic regret; "it is a pity to see advantages which would have made me famous if I had had them, absolutely thrown away upon you! I suppose," with a sigh, "that it is the old story of the people with large appetites and nothing to eat, and the people with plenty to eat and no appetites."

CHAPTER III.

"For mirth of May, with skipplis and with hoppis,
The birds sang upon the tender croppis,
The curiose notes, as Venus' chapell clerkis:
The roses yong, new spreading of their knoppis,
Were powdered brycht with hevynly beriall droppis,
Throu' bemes rede birnyng as ruby sperkis,
The skyes rang for schouting of the larkis."

AWAY they go to Moritzburg, when the noon sun is warm and high; away they go, handsome, gay and chaperonless. There is no reason why their grandmother, who is a perfectly able-bodied old lady, should not escort them; but as she is sixty-five years of age, has no expectation of meeting a lover, and is quite indifferent to spring tints and German Schlosses, she wisely chooses to stay at home.

"If you cannot behave like young gentlewomen without having me always at your heels, why all I can say, my dears, is that I am sorry for you," is the formula with which she mostly salves her own conscience and dismisses them.

The result is perhaps not worse than that of more pretentious exhortations; for the girls, having a sense of being on parole, do behave like young gentlewomen: at least Belinda always does, and Sarah very often.

They get into their carriage in a quick and cautious manner; casting, meanwhile, apprehensive glances toward a house a good deal lower down the street, and which they will be obliged to pass.

"Sarah," says Belinda impressively, unconsciously speaking half under her breath, "if you hear a window open, mind you do not look that way: she is quite capable of bawling at us from the balcony, and if she finds out where we are going to, she is certain to insist on coming, too."

"If she gets into this carriage to-day," replies Sarah firmly, "it will be over my dead body!" and away they go.

With lowered parasols and held breath they pass the dreaded house—pass it in safety. Not a sound issues from its silent casements. Away they go, across the Elbe, over the many-arched bridge, where the people, more leisurely than in our breathless London, are standing to watch the rafts floating down the river, and guided between the piles; through the Neustadt, where the Strong August forever prances in bronze; past the Leipzig railway station, under the Acacia alley, leaving on their right the great, new, dreary barracks, backed by the pine-wood; along, along, between the young birches that silver-trunked, baby-leaved, stand on each side of the way; off a-pleasuring into the country.

They do not talk much—at least to each other. To herself, Belinda is saying over and over the same one thing continuously: "He will not be there! I do not at all expect him." She says it superstitiously, in the trembling hope that if she can cajole the envious gods into believing that she does not count upon it, they may let her have her wish. "He will not be there!" But her racing pulse and her flushing cheeks say differently; differently, too, say the wedded birds and the springing grasses and the opening buds. They say, altogether:

"He will be there! He will—he will!"

But perhaps, beside him, there may be some one else, not quite so eagerly desired.

They are not far beyond the town, and are jogging tranquilly along in the sunshine, when Belinda is roused with a start from her love-musings by an agitated series of ejaculations from Sarah.

"Belinda! She is there! On your side! Quick! Hold down your parasol! Perhaps she may not see us!"

Swift as lightning Belinda has obeyed. Totally irrespective of the sun's position, her en-tout-cas stoops till it shields—imperviously, one would think—the inmates of the carriage from all passers-by on that side.

But there are eyes, hard, horny and inquisitive, to which an en-tout-cas—nay, a stone wall, if need be—is as glass. The coachman checks his horses; and Sarah, leaning angrily out to bid him drive quicker, perceives that he has no alternative, if he would not drive over a burly, middle-aged figure gesticulating, with raised arms and waved umbrella, in mid-road, and crying: "Halt, Kutscher!" with all the power of a strong pair of lungs.

"It is no use!" says the girl, sinking back in disgusted resignation on the cushions. "It never is any use!"

The next moment the lady to whom she alludes is presenting a hot, red face, a grizzled fringe of hair, and a large-patterned black and white plaid gown at the carriage-door.

"I was afraid you might not see me!" she says, shaking hands warmly. "How are you? Where are you going to? I thought I must just stop you for a minute, to ask where you are going to? To Moritzburg? How pleasant! I wish I were going to Moritzburg, too!"

Then, as no invitation follows this very broad hint: "I dare say, now, as you seem to have plenty of room, you would not mind giving me a lift."

"It would be delightful!" said Belinda, with suspicious precipitancy; "but I am afraid—"

"I do not in the least mind sitting back, if that is what you are going to say. It is all one to me how I sit. If you had traveled as much as I, it would be all one to you!"

"If Belinda had traveled as much as you," says Sarah sarcastically, "I am sure that her one hope and prayer would be to be allowed to stay at home for the rest of her life. Well," with a would-be valedictory wave of the hand, "it is too unlucky; but as we have unfortunately promised to meet some people—"

"Some people! What people?" repeats the other inquisitively. "Any one I know, I wonder? Professor Forth, of course, for one," with a meaning smile. "I saw him setting off this morning somewhere. I knew that it must be an excursion of some kind, because he had two overcoats; but I could not make out where. I asked at his lodgings, but the Dienst-mädchen did not know. And Rivers—young Rivers?—are you going to meet him, too? Apropos, what Rivers is he? I want to find out what Rivers he is; I know so many Rivers."

"I will ask him at once," says Sarah gravely. "I will say to him, 'What Rivers are you?' Au revoir. Drive on, Kutscher."

"Where are you going to-morrow? What are you going to do to-morrow? Will you come to Wesenstein? I want you all to come to Wesenstein! With a little packing we might all get into one carriage. What do you say to a long day at Wesenstein? or, better still, Tharandt? What do you say to a long day at Tharandt?"

But the carriage has rolled inexorably away; and the latter part of these propositions is addressed to the empty air.

"A form of thanksgiving to be used on land!" says Sarah, drawing a long breath, and blowing a kiss in ironical adieu to the lessening figure of their baffled friend.

They are nearing their goal now. Along the straight avenue of young horse-chestnuts and limes they trot; the wind-swept flat plain on either hand, and the long vista of tree-shaded road, ended by the Schloss.

They are driving up to the Gast-hoff Au Bon Marché. Belinda shuts her eyes. If he is here, he will be to be seen at once, or not at all. If he is not here, she will be ignorant of it for yet one moment more. She shuts her eyes; but in an instant Sarah's sarcastic ejaculation, obviously called forth by the first sight of her betrothed, "My king! my king!" makes her open them again; open them to see that she has succeeded in tricking the gods; that he is here; and that, judging by his looks, he too has been shutting his eyes and dreading.

"How do you do?" says Sarah gayly, giving him her hand; "I have a message for you from Miss Watson; she wants to know what Rivers you are! I was so afraid of forgetting that I thought I had better deliver it at once; think it over, I advise you, against you meet her next. Bah! he does not hear a word I say!"

A quarter of an hour later they are all seated on deal chairs at a deal table under a primitive shed, that does duty as an arbor; waited on by a civil, homely Dienst-mädchen in a blue bib, and eating beefsteaks. At least two of them are. Two of them are past eating. For them the beefsteak cuts juicily; for them the schnitzel swims greasily; for them the excellent light lager beer foams in lidded mugs—in vain. It is indeed dubious whether any one except Sarah enjoys the luncheon quâ luncheon. The Professor is doubtful as to the digestibility of the schnitzel, and more than doubtful as to the prudence of lurching out of doors in a high wind on the 2d of May. He had indeed gone so far as to have luncheon laid in the little beer and smoke-stained inn parlor; but his betrothed has explained to him so kindly yet firmly that if he lunches in-doors he will lunch alone, that he has sullenly submitted, merely putting on ostentatiously, one atop of another, the two overcoats which, as Miss Watson faithfully reported, he had providently brought with him. And yet, though the wind is high, it is not spiteful. It rocks playfully the tall oleanders in pots, and swings the little wooden boxes hung in the trees to oblige the birds, who find them a quite satisfactory substitute for nests, judging, at least, by the easy cheerfulness with which the short-tailed, wise-faced starlings go in and out of the tiny apertures.

Whether or not it has pleased or been digestible, luncheon is now ended, and Professor Forth is surveying the bill through his spectacles.

"Six marks, sixty pfennigs!" he says, proclaiming the total in a tone which announces how very far from content he is with it; "one mark, sixty-five pfennigs a head! A very high charge, I should say; undoubtedly prices in Germany have doubled since the war! Viermal Bistek!" reading aloud the items—"as it turned out, zweimal would have been ample. Zweimal Kartoffeln!"

He breaks off suddenly, for Sarah has twitched the paper out of his hand.

"In mercy spare us!" she cries. "What can be more dreadful than the recapitulation of the items of the food one has just swallowed! it is like beginning luncheon all over again, to which, with my present feelings, death would be preferable!"

By-and-by they set off to visit the Schloss—the four-towered Schloss, with its round red domes, and all its little pinnacles and dormer windows—falling, as they go, into two couples, though this is not accomplished without a slight maneuvering on the part of one.

"In heaven's name stop a moment to admire this pump!" says Rivers, in an eager whisper to Belinda. "Nothing to admire in it?—of course there is not! I never saw an uglier pump in my life, but it will give them a good start!"

"Are you so sure that they are anxious to get a good start?" asks Belinda with a significant look ahead at Sarah, who, continually throwing back restless glances over her shoulder, lagging, stopping on every possible pretext, if she cherishes a desire for a lête-à-lête, certainly disguises it admirably.

"I am not at all sure," replies the young man, with a dry laugh. "What I am sure of is that I wish it."

"Do you think that her back looks as if she were being tolerably civil to him?" pursues Belinda, talking on quickly and nervously; "one can gather so much from a person's back. I am afraid that the way in which she is jerking her head about does not augur very well for him. Was not she rude to him at luncheon? he must have heard her whisper to me that he was an old skinflint."

"Perhaps they are all right when they are alone," replies Rivers sanguinely.

Belinda shakes her head.

"I doubt it!"

They have reached the Schloss and its broad slabbed terrace. Belinda is leaning on the old stone balustrade, low and weather-worn, that runs around it. Her eyes are fixed on the carved stone figures, weather-worn too, that stand out against the pallid fair sky in their old-world quaintness; the fat Cupids with abnormal Dachs-hunds; the ancient vases, rough with stone lilies and roses; the fat Cupids again.

Belinda looks at the Cupids, and Rivers looks at her; looks at her as a wholesome minded and bodied boy of twenty-two does look at his first love. To him nothing now exists save that opaque white cheek: that small disdainful nose on which Sarah hangs all its owner's mischances; that lovely stature that makes other women look squat and bunch. To him all creation that is not Belinda—sun, moon, stars, Schloss, Professor, bifsteaks—is an irrelevant and impertinent accident.

"He might not in house, field or garden stir,
But her full shape would all his seeing fill."

"After all," he says, with a trembling in his vigorous, fresh voice, "I do not think that I should much mind how like a dog the woman I loved treated me in company, if she were—if she were—as I would have her when we were alone!"

"Would not you?" replies Belinda, suddenly changing color at the application that she herself makes of this speech; and then in fevered consciousness of her own untimely flush she adds with a callous, cold laugh: "I think I should agree with the poet:

"Perhaps it was right to dissemble your love,
But why need you kick me down stairs?"

The poor boy looks terribly thrown back; and indeed what ardent young lover would not, at such a turn given to a tender speech? And yet in her heart she had felt as tender as he, though no human being could have guessed it. Both now lean their elbows on the balustrade, and look down on the garden grass, and the stiff fir-trees cut into prim yew-shapes; so that unless you look at them very closely you would swear that they were yews. And beyond the grass and the firs comes the ruffled blue water, which like a broad moat girds the Schloss around. The water is running to-day into little waves and ridges; and trees just greening are verdantly bordering its brim. In the garden beneath the fir-trees a pair of figures are seen soberly pacing.

"There they are!" cries Belinda, pointing to them, and thankful for a safe subject with which to break the strained silence; "is it possible that she has taken his arm? No; I thought it could not be! I wonder what progress she has made toward telling him that she does not mean to marry him."

"Is that what she is telling him?" says Rivers, roused to interest by fellow-feeling, and craning his neck to look; "unhappy old devil!"

Belinda nods.

"I think so; that is what she meant to tell him; and if I do not mistake, his haggling over the luncheon gave him his coup de grâce.

THE GULF COAST OF FLORIDA.

THE season is at hand when those who, like the birds of summer, take annually their flight southward will be thinking of running away from winter. There are many who seek genial airs and sunlit waters for pleasure only, others to escape from the chilling discomforts of winter; and the great invalid corps, turning its back on cold and death when the leaves fall, makes its pilgrimage to sunny lands.

In the choice of a climate for invalids in general, there are certain health-giving factors which may be summed up as equability of temperature, purity of atmosphere and comparative dryness.

I regard it as essential for most invalids that the temperature shall be such that they may be able to remain for an indefinite time out in the open air without discomfort, and to freely permit it to enter their apartments at all hours of the day and night.

The general prevalence of bright, clear, sunny days, with the rarity of cloudiness and a light rainfall, are essentials of a winter health resort for lung diseases. The physiological, and specially the stimulating and morphological, effects of sunlight on the human system, are well recognized; but, owing to the in-door habits of invalids, are too little regarded.

The discomfort and depression produced by the prevalence of violent winds are familiar to most conditions of invalidism, and climates of continuous and moderate air-movements are found to be the most desirable.

An atmosphere of varying electric conditions, with the consequent production of ozone, purifying the air and keeping it free from septic germs, is favorable.

A dry soil of sand or gravel, which quickly absorbs and filters away the rainfall from its surface, and does not keep the air moist by evaporation, is an essential of a winter health resort for pulmonary affections.

The salubrious atmosphere from extensive pine forests, with their ozone and antiseptic influences, should incline invalids to a choice of such proximity.

Facility for sea-bathing, at a tolerable temperature throughout the winter, gives occupation and pleasure and is an important adjuvant in the treatment of some morbid conditions.

As in incipient and developing pulmonary tuberculosis, and in many other diseases prevalent among the dwellers in cities, it is essential that there shall be a change of habits from a sedentary to an out-door life, the region for a health resort should be one in which there are abundant opportunities for amusement or for agreeable and profitable work in the open air. In a region of country where open-air amusements can be varied by riding, hunting and sailing, and where the scenery is an attractive blending of vistas of forests and stretches of water, the conditions most favorable to an out-door life will be most happily presented.

The poorly-nourished victim of tuberculosis should not be banished to a land where his diet may be impoverished by the lack of fresh meats and vegetables. If he is where he can add to his fare by the products of his recreations of hunting and fishing, then will good digestion be most likely to wait on appetite.

Agreeable society is an essential of happiness and a preventive of depression of spirits in that class of invalids who are obliged to seek winter quarters away from home. Their associations should not be in a crowded caravansary, where the halls echo with the sad sound of coughing, and the corridors seem sepulchral with the hoarse voices of sufferers. Far better is it to find companionship with the woodsman or the fisherman, and be entertained by their woodcraft or simple lore of boats, bays and streams.

The ideal winter climate for invalids, embracing perfectly all the essentials and suited to the fancy and caprice of sufferers, may not be found, but it can be approximated in its most important requisites.

It is evident that in Europe and in this country mild or warm climates have of recent years grown most in favor as winter health resorts. In our own land Florida has become the great winter sanitarium for consumptive invalids, for the nervous and debilitated and for valetudinarians of all degrees, with the prospect of increasing in repute as the merits of some of its most advantageous localities become more generally known. My personal observations of Florida have extended over the regions usually visited by invalids and tourists, and over a domain of wilderness beyond the ready access of travelers. The greater part of the territory of the entire state still remains inaccessible to invalids, and the tide of travel is mostly confined to the great water-course of the St. John's river and its vicinity; but the increased developments of railroads and the coast and interior navigation are about to speedily spread travel over a most attractive sanitary region. That there are portions of Florida much more suited for winter homes than those generally resorted to it is the object of this article to state.

Florida is a land of many waters. It has a coast line of about twelve hundred miles. Its rivers, lakes, everglades and lagoons are numberless. It is estimated that from a fourth to a third of the entire state, varying with the season of the year, is covered by water. To its extensive and peculiar water containings and surroundings is due its unique and wonderfully mild and equable climate. Florida is our nether land, which, as Sidney Lanier wrote, by "its peninsular curve whimsically terminates our country in an interrogation point." It geographically and climatically resembles Italy, but its air is more bland and healthful, and its soil has even a greater range of productiveness.

No known land is exempt from the liability of its inhabitants to pulmonary consumption, but in this country statistics of the last two decades show that the disease progressively diminishes from our extreme Northern States southward to Florida. The mortality from consumption, as compared with all other causes of deaths in Florida, is, by the census, but 58 to the 1000; whilst in the State of Maine it is 258 to the 1000; Connecticut, 179; Pennsylvania, 142; and South Carolina, 90.

The low consumption mortality of Florida exists, notwithstanding the number of Northern invalids who seek too late its healthy air, only to end their days and add to the normally very low death rate. The best authority on the subject, Dr. Kenworthy, of Jacksonville, who has given much intelligent attention to climate in the cure of consumption and to sanitary statistics in general, believes that the mortality from consumption among the permanent residents of Florida does not actually exceed thirty deaths to the thousand from all causes.

Of the extended seaboard of Florida the Gulf Coast stretches over seven hundred miles. The climate of this coast has, in my opinion, more of the essentials of a good winter resort for invalids than any other of which I know. I make this statement after some personal experience over a large extent of the coast, from much conference with invalids who have happily tested its merits, and from a comparison with the thermometric and hygrometric records of many of the various popular health resorts of the world. The west, or Gulf, coast of Florida has a temperature more mild, equable and dry than that of the corresponding Atlantic border. As compared with that of the much-frequented region of the St. John's river, in the winter season it is free from malarious influences, fogs are unknown, and the opportunities and inducements for an out-door life are far greater. Sidney Lanier, the poet, whose failing days were prolonged by a residence in Florida, says that the air of the Gulf Coast is "milder and dryer than on the eastern coast in midwinter; and it is to be greatly hoped that increased facilities for reaching these favorable regions will soon render them practicable to those who now find the journey too trying."

For the agriculturist and the orange-grower, and for the gardener who raises early vegetables for the Northern markets, this coast offers a fertile soil and a climate freer from destructive frosts than any other part of the peninsula. To the capitalist and the investor, for speedy increase in values of lands—the rapid development of railroads—now stretching their competing lines to the fertile hummock lands and numerous harbors of this coast region it gives assurance of a flood time of immigration—

'The first faint wash of waves where soon
Shall roll the human sea.'

The Gulf Coast has great advantages in its many excellent harbors, and is, in this respect, more favored than the Atlantic border of the peninsula, which, south of the mouth of the St. John's River, has not a single good harbor. The best harbors of the west coast are at Cedar Keys, the Anclote River, Clear Water Harbor, Tampa Bay, Charlotte Harbor and San Carlos Harbor; but there are innumerable inlets, with moderate depths of water, passing in between the thousands of beautiful islands which border the entire coast line. These islands or keys are lovely, fertile tracts, mostly in primitive wilderness, capable of high cultivation, with a delightful climate, and their only disadvantage is the liability to partial overflow from the occasional hurricane tides of late summer or early autumn. Residences on them can be safely located only on eminences above the possible reach of the waters, which may rise six or eight feet above the normal level.

The whole of the Gulf Coast, from Cedar Keys southward, is attractive for health and pleasure-seekers, but the southern limit is sharply defined near the end of the peninsula by a region so afflicted with insect annoyances as to render human existence intolerable. How far southward the coast may be in all respects desirable for winter residences, my explorations have not determined; but from Homosassa down as far as the Ten Thousand Islands, a region included between the 26th and 28th degrees of latitude, the invalid will find a winter climate presenting the essentials, as I have stated them, of equability of temperature, purity of atmosphere and comparative dryness.

At the United States Signal Station at Punta Rassa, about two hundred miles south of Cedar Keys and one hundred north of Cape Sable, the mean temperature for the five cold months for a period of five years is shown in the following table:

	November.	December.	January.	February.	March.	Mean for 5 months.
Punta Rassa	69.7	64.8	65.5	65.9	69.8	67.1

Another table shows the maximum and minimum temperatures for the same months in the years 1878 and 1879:

Punta Rassa.	November.	December.	January.	February.	March.	Mean.
Maximum	81	76	79	77	81	78.8
Minimum	48	38	41	44	55	45.2

Here is shown a winter temperature which, with its well-known equability, renders out-door life agreeable, and dwelling apartments can always be kept open to the free admission of air. The winter temperature is rarely so low as to require even the open wood-fire. The skies, from sunrise over the tops of the pines and palms to the dip of a red sunset into the warm waters of the Gulf, are almost always bright and blue, checkered only by white flying clouds. The balmy breezes blow mildly and almost without ceasing, excepting during an occasional lull of calm at the sunset hour, so that the advantage to health of continuous and moderate air movements prevails.

As to purity of atmosphere the situation and surroundings are extremely favorable. The breezes blow from either the vast area of waters of the Gulf or from over great forests of pine, palm and cypress, with their ozonizing influences. It is due to these agencies and to the remarkable dryness that an aseptic condition of the atmosphere exists. I have seen venison, game birds and other meats remain for many days, or even for weeks, hanging unprotected in the open air, free from taint and merely become hard and dry without decomposition.

No claim for the sanitary merits of the Gulf Coast of Florida will create so much surprise as that of the comparative dryness of its atmosphere. The natural and popular inference that it has a moist climate must be from a consideration of its vast traverses and surroundings of water, fresh and salt, and not from the trustworthy reports of the Signal Service or from personal observation. I am not able to give a reasonable explanation of the cause of the remarkable dryness of the atmosphere, amidst such a realm of waters, but that the climate of this coast is comparatively dry and bracing can be proven by the records of official observation and attested by the permanent residents of the region. The following table, from official data, of relative humidity of some winter resorts of Europe and America shows particularly well for Punta Rassa, on the Gulf Coast of Florida, during the five cold months:

	Years.	November.	December.	January.	February.	March.	Mean for 5 months.
		per ct.	per ct.	per ct.	per ct.	per ct.	per ct.
Mentone and Cannes.	3	71.8	74.2	72.0	70.7	73.3	72.4
Atlantic City, N. J.	5	76.9	79.1	80.6	77.3	76.8	78.1
Breckenridge, Minn.	5	76.9	83.2	76.8	81.8	79.5	79.6
St. Paul, Minn.	5	70.3	73.5	75.2	70.7	67.1	71.3
Punta Rassa, Fla.	5	72.7	73.2	74.2	73.7	69.9	72.7
Key West, Fla.	5	77.1	78.7	78.9	77.2	72.2	76.8
Jacksonville, Fla.	5	71.9	69.3	70.2	68.5	63.9	68.8

Data supplied by the United States Signal Service prove that during the five cold months the relative humidity of Florida, as taken at a number of widely-separated stations of observation, is less than that of what is popularly the "dry winter climate of Minnesota."

For an attractive out-door life in the winter for invalids I know of no region equaling the Gulf Coast of Florida, with its great bays and harbors for sailing, its wonderful fishing and excellent deer hunting, and the great abundance of feathered game in the forests and on the waters. There is perpetual inducement to spend time in the open air. The sun does not parch, the winds do not chill, and the atmosphere has that indefinable poetic quality called "dreamy." I have felt comfortable in the bracing air when very lightly dressed, and not oppressed when heavily clothed. Sea-bathing is agreeable on the shelly or white sandy beaches all through the winter, and I have found the water warmer on the western than on the eastern coast of the peninsula.

The reason why the Gulf Coast has not been more popularly known as a sanitary resort was the want of convenient access and of accommodations for sojourners, but a happy change is at hand. Coasting steamers now run into all of the more important harbors, as those of Anclote, Tampa, Charlotte and San Carlos: and railroads are rapidly being constructed to reach the towns all along the coast. The want of convenient residences for invalids is now quite overcome, and comfortable accommodations can be had in every village. The hospitality of the people renders the stay genial and social, and it is a common remark, which I have happily verified, that in Florida wherever you see a house you can find a home, for every home seems open to welcome the stranger.

At a most attractive and salubrious location on the high peninsula between Tampa Bay and the Gulf Coast, on the shore of Lake Butler, a beautiful sight for villas is being developed, and a large hotel will be ready this winter for the accommodation of health or pleasure-seeking visitors. This locality can be readily reached by the coasting steamers from Cedar Keys to the Anclote River, about seventy-five miles. A railroad tending in that direction, by way of Waldo, Ocala and Brookville has now reached within a short stage ride of the coast near Lake Butler. The land here is much elevated, overlooking the Gulf of Mexico, Lake Butler and the great Tarpon Spring. The elevation of this region, which is the highest on the coast, and its extensive water surroundings render it most favorable for a winter resort, and indeed for residence during the entire year. A number of persons from the North are about erecting cottages on the shores of Lake Butler, so that abundant accommodations will soon be ready for winter visitors to this favorable locality.

To all who would escape from the severity and dangers of our Northern winters and seek a mild, equable and comparatively dry climate, free from malarial influences, and where life in the open air is always practicable and agreeable, I commend a journey to the Gulf Coast of Florida.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

BRIDGING THE CHASM.

UPON the day when Dawson Fox was to arrive, Mr. Kortright was unusually busy. He requested the other members of the committee to accompany Mrs. Kortright in his carriage to the station, two miles away, to welcome their distinguished guest to his old home. Only the wife fathomed the subtlety of this maneuver. To her the silent, reserved man had year by year become more and more transparent. She saw through his loving artifice when he told her that morning how he had planned for the day.

"And I shan't be home till supper; so you must take care of him, and not let him wear himself out talking to everybody. You'd better keep him quiet here at home, or perhaps take him out riding toward evening."

The comely dame looked at him with a loving smile, and said:

"I didn't know much about you when we were married."

"Not know me?" said the 'Squire in amaze. "Why, we were boy and girl together."

"Yes," meditatively.

"And you knew all there was to know about me."

"It takes a long while to learn a man."

"There's where you're mistaken. One sees clear through us at first sight. It's you women that are deep. Only think how long we had lived together and I never knew—"

"There wasn't anything to know," interrupted the matron, with a blush that swept like a wave over her comely face and up to the line of her soft gray hair.

"And there isn't anything to know now," laughed the 'Squire, as he put his left arm about her, and with the cane dangling by its crooked neck over his right, lifted her chin and looked lovingly down into her face.

"Oh, yes, there is," she said, as she laid her head on his shoulder. "I shall never learn all your kindness and thoughtfulness for others—"

"There, there," said he, with a sudden moistening of the eyelids. "Don't let us be a couple of old fools. I just thought the poor fellow mightn't feel quite so bad if he got used to seeing you again without having me around to remind him of his loss."

"And my gain," said the quick-witted woman, looking up at him archly and proudly.

"See here, I'm a-going," said the 'Squire, as he limped quickly away (he had always limped and always carried a cane since that first day we saw him). He turned as he reached the door, shook his head at his wife, and went away with a warm light upon his thin gray face and in his deep gray eye.

There was a light in her face, too—a love-light that deepened its matronly beauty and made the soft, silvery crown above seem like a refulgent halo to the weary-looking man who came down the platform between Shields and Van Wormer and was introduced to her as the Rev. Dawson Fox. There was a half-startled look in his eye, his lip trembled under the grizzled moustache, his hand clasped hers half-nervously. Then he looked into her eyes; saw the light there, read the earnest, quiet welcome before it fell from her lips, and, taking the seat beside her, felt a strange sense of rest. There was no spurious sentimentality about the man. He had loved Mattie Ermendorf, and had never loved any other. But that love had been pure and unselfish. His ceaseless prayer had been for her happiness. The older and broader he had grown the deeper and tenderer had become his devotion to his youthful dream. He had dreaded to be awakened from it. He feared to read in her eyes something he would not wish to see—the evidence of a life not altogether complete and perfect. He feared to find the trace of sorrow, tears and discontent. Instead, he found only the ripe fruitage of peace and love. He was content. He saw with languid interest the young city through which they drove. He heard the rumble of the water-wheels and listened to the story of Lake Memnona's subjugation. He noted here and there a remembered object—asked dreamily after this and that half-forgotten name. He had lived here once—or some one like him—but it was in some previous state of existence. He had wandered over the hills—he had known the woods and fields; yet he hardly realized that it was himself who had once dwelt there. His life lay between—a life of labor and disappointment and ill-success—in another world. He tried to go back to that old time, but he could not. What there had been he dimly remembered; for what there was he hardly cared. The world had gone away and left him. He was dead already save where he touched the world's life at one vital spot. He laid himself back on the cushions, closed his eyes, and tried to think whether he were dreaming or waking. His face was pinched and worn. The long tawny beard only half hid its ghastliness.

"He's just about tuckered out," said Shields in a whisper. The younger man assented with a nod. The woman watched him keenly, and knew better than they the secret of his weariness. He roused himself in a moment and begged pardon for his incivility. The committee stopped at the store of the younger, and Dawson Fox and his hostess drove on alone across the new bridge, past the old school-house to the mansion of Harrison Kortright. He reached out and took her hand. A soft, contented smile passed over his face. He was at rest. Then they came to the end. Two tall, drooping evergreens flanked the doorway—two glimpses of the orient. He saw them; guessed their origin in a moment, pressed the hand he held fervently and turned dewy eyes upon his companion. He was satisfied. The past had been suddenly bridged. The boy was alive again. Weariness, pain and defeat were all forgotten. He had been remembered—kindly, tenderly, truly. Happiness had not induced forgetfulness. The love which shone in her eyes for the man she had married had not led her to cast aside the memory of the lover whose passion had been unveiled too late. When he had been shown to his room he fell upon his knees and asked that a blessing might rest upon the home he had entered. The broken life had been reunited, and when in the afternoon Mrs. Kortright took her guest to ride, hunting up the old scenes and pointing out the changes that had been wrought, there was no longer any apathy or weariness. The man had become a boy again. His eye beamed; his voice was full of glee. The woman and the man touched hands across the chasm of the years and were once more boy and girl together. Their route led by Sturmhold, and the fond mother proudly told the story of her son's love and its return by the bright, gifted heiress. As she showed him through its rooms and chattered of its history, the master's life and the prospects of her son, they came suddenly upon Lida. The poor woman gazed a moment vacantly into the bright face of Mrs. Kortright, then, with a cry of recognition, sprang toward her and seized her hand. Mrs. Kortright was surprised. She had heard that the woman had sane intervals and that they were becoming more and more frequent, but she had never seen one of them before. In her surprise and ignorance she uttered the very worst thing she could have said.

"How do you do?" she cried, warmly clasping the other's hand. "How pleased Hilda will be to know that you are well again. I shall write and tell her."

"Hilda?" said the other with a startled look.

"Hilda? Oh, yes—I know—Hilda." Then her look changed to one of mortal hate. She snatched away her hand and said impetuously, "You need not trouble yourself, madam; I shall write to Hilda myself."

Then she turned and stalked angrily away.

"That woman looks too dangerous to be at large," said Fox, watching her retreating figure.

"Oh not at all," said Mrs. Kortright. "Her attendants are very careful, but she has never shown any inclination to do mischief."

"She glared at you very angrily."

"Yes, indeed. She seems always to dislike me since her misfortune, and that is as near being violent as she ever gets."

When they returned home Mr. Kortright came out upon the porch to receive them. There was a thrill of rapture in the heart of the still fair woman, who stood by and watched their hearty greeting at the thought that these two men had loved her—aye, loved her still. A blush came to her soft cheek with this last thought, and then as the two men turned to the old times, each evidently full of admiration for the other, she laughed as she followed them within at the thought that her Martin, if present, would be as full of the future as they were of the past. They were not old men. Both of them were progressives, who counted the present but the stepping-stone of to-morrow; but they had reached the age when retrospect grows pleasant as the background of to-day. She almost wished that Martin were there, as he would have been but for her fear that the excitement of the morrow might awaken his longing to take part in the struggle then going on in Kansas and stir his enthusiasm to a pitch which might defy even his word of honor plighted to the absent Captain Hargrove. As this name floated through her mind, she wondered where he was and what had befallen the master of Sturmhold. The time was drawing near when in obedience to his request, if he were not heard from, her husband was to take charge of his affairs and act upon the presumption of his death. Her heart stood still with foreboding as she sat down in the unlighted sitting-room. The two men's voices sounded far away, though she could almost reach them with her outstretched hand. She was nervous, she said to herself, as she went out to see that the evening meal was in readiness.

CHAPTER XXIX.

A HARD BARGAIN.

SKENDOAH is full of life, yet strangely silent. The wheels stand idle. The water ripples peacefully over them, trickles through the mossy trunks, overflows the silent flumes and runs in a sparkling current down the rocky channel. The mills are silent, and the rows of windows in the factories only give back the light that shines from the public hall, or reflect the beams of the moon as it wades through fleecy autumn clouds. The water had been shut off at four o'clock, and when the water was shut off Skendoah was dead. The head-gate by which the race below was fed was the great aortic valve of the village life. When that was closed all its activities ceased. The pulleys, belts and spindles were still. The cogged wheels ceased to grind and gnaw. The trip-hammers hung poised and motionless. The breath of the forges failed. The anvils grew cold and silent. The din of warfare betwixt man and matter ceased. The laborers had left their stations. The dust was settling slowly within, even as the silent dew without.

It was two hours since the autumn twilight began, and more than an hour had passed since the glare of torches, the beating of drums and blare of brazen instruments, with the tramp of many feet had sounded in the streets. The town had gathered in its council hall. The miniature republic had assembled its witanagemote, where rich and poor and high and low and old and young—male and female—considered of the nation's weal. One of the prime integers of republican power took counsel as to the country's future and its part therein. The people, in whose hands is the sceptre of authority, had met in the town hall to decide as to how it should be exercised.

They were not all agreed. The struggle of parties in the little town had been very fierce. Yet in that free-working, free-thinking community the majority had daily grown stronger and the minority weaker as the contest between liberty and slavery approached its culmination. At first there had been little rancor. Among the scattered farmers of the hillsides political thought and controversy had been, in a great measure, a diversion. The conflict of parties had seemed like a great national game, in which all took a part and all felt an interest, as in any other game; but very few took the result seriously to heart. As one or the other side achieved success the jest of defeat was shifted back and forth, and Whig and Democrat exchanged condolence or congratulation with only enough of chagrin or exultation to give zest to the recurrent conflict. When, however, the question of human right came to be actually and directly involved in the contest, it gradually took on a more serious cast. The line of demarcation was more sharply drawn. Neighbors grew cool to one another. Friends began to abate something of customary warmth. Business followed in the wake of preference. Churches were divided. Families were sundered.

In Skendoah these rules had suffered no exception. So there were some who were by no means pleased at the demonstration that was taking place. There were some who took no pride in Dawson Fox, and no interest in the cause he represented. Or rather, there were some who contemned him because of the cause he represented. These were not many, however, and the limit of their opposition was silence, or at the utmost, sneers. Those who indulged in these were generally considered to be largely moved by jealousy of Harrison Kortright and envy of his remarkable success. Saving these few, who sulked at home, and those others whom care or illness kept away, the town had poured itself into the great rectangular hall, whose platform, from its first dedication to popular use, had been a veritable tribunal of liberty. Save for its flashing windows and a few feeble lights here and there, the town was dark. But for the regular shouts of applause, the steady rhythm of an orator's full and animated tones, a burst of song or a snatch of martial music, the town was silent. The horses of those who had driven in from the neighboring county were hitched around the public square. A few of the shops were yet open, in the hope of catching a penny from some belated purchaser. The long rows of factories that lined the water's edge were dark and desolate. There was something weird in the contrast between the abundant life and light within the hall and the silence and darkness without.

Dawson Fox was telling the dwellers of his boyhood home the story of Kansas—"bleeding Kansas," as it was then the fashion to style the territory on which the skirmishers of the two great hosts were encamped, and not unfrequently engaged. The crowded hall showed a sea of earnest faces. All types and nationalities were gathered there. Almost every part of Europe had its representatives. A half-dozen colored men and women were there, some with the watchful, hunted look of the fugitive, and others with that self-importance which naturally arose from a consciousness that their race was in fact the bone of contention, the cause of war. But the most noticeable in numbers and in evident preponderance of character, were they of that type of face we call American—keen, watchful, scrutinizing, almost skeptical in its attent earnestness. They were jurors in the greatest assize of earth—knights and barons, holding in capite under the Great King, and accountable to Him alone. Dawson Fox was the advocate, not of himself nor of the Free-State settlers of Kansas, but of the principle they represented—of the cause that underlay their occupancy of the boundless prairies. He had entirely lost his worn and haggard look of the day before. The inspiration of the orator and the fervor of the prophet had overborne his physical infirmities. His thin face was flushed, his spare form erect and full, and his step upon the platform was as proud as that of a conqueror. His faith discounted the ages, and the triumph he foretold was of the far millennial days. His audience listened calmly. The crowd's feet about the keen, watchful eyes grew deeper and plainer. The sharp, worn faces—men's faces and women's faces—on which the struggle of life had carved lines of care—the indices of self-reliant, independent natures—followed his words with keen, curious looks of questioning or approval, until little by little their language became unanimous, and the orator led them without dissent to his conclusions. Then his eloquence grew more fervid. He had not only to convince them that he was right, but to inspire them to act on that conviction. He sought not only to awaken faith, but to secure the works that testify belief.

The night without grew dark. The clouds that swept across the moon's face were denser. The autumn wind arose and moaned pitifully around the nooks and angles of the building. The signs upon the streets below creaked and clattered. The horses fastened to the railing along the public square looked wistfully about for their masters, and shifted their positions to avoid the wind and the clouds of dry dust which it whirled before it.

The orator became more and more impassioned; the audience more enrapt. The chairman, the Hon. Harrison Kortright, leaned forward, his keen white face aglow with interest. His deep gray eyes flashed fire, and his sharp, firm mouth was closed with almost angry determination. He had no need to be convinced, but only to be awakened. By his side sat Shields, one of the vice-presidents of the meeting, and the oldest of the orator's youthful acquaintances. His thin features seemed thinner than ever before, as little by little he drew forward his chair until it stood almost at the speaker's side. His narrow bald head shone in the light of the overhanging chandelier, while his scattering gray locks were thrust back upon one side, and his left hand, encircling the upturned ear made surer that he should lose no word the speaker uttered. And those words came thick and hot. Mrs. Kortright listened with a pale, wondering face to the story which he told of struggle in that new western land. She heard how the legions of slavery overran the border; how homes were ravaged and burned; the stock driven off and crops destroyed. Oh! many a heart stood still as the tale of murder was told—cruel, unprovoked, save by the advocacy of free thought and free speech. He told how, under the forms of law, men were arrested, torn from their families, exposed to every privation and torture; and even women and children made victims by infuriate bands to whom slavery seemed fair and sacred, and liberty—the liberty of the colored man—foul and unmeasurable wrong to the white man. The audience listened breathlessly. Mrs. Kortright thanked God in her heart that Martin was not present. She was sure that no power could restrain him should he hear this impassioned plea.

The light poured out of the windows and shone with a red, fitful glare upon the windows of the factory opposite. The clouds shut in the moon. The wind whirled in boisterous gusts through the unpaved streets. How the factory windows glowed! It was almost ghostly the red reflection from the lighted hall. One could almost fancy the usual night work in progress. What a row of glittering panes! Two hundred and forty feet of shafting in one line! Ah! what a forest of belts and pulleys and wheels! How the floor was studded with wondrous combinations of wood and iron! How many polished forms, now cold and dead, would wake to life when the water was turned on upon the morrow! Windows! Ah, the whole front was studded with them! Light is as important to the work done in this mill, which is the pride of Harrison Kortright's heart—the crown and climax of his success—as the great wheel which gives power to the polished shaft and life to the flying belts! Ah, what an array of windows! How they glow in the reflected light. How clear the sashes show between the panes!

Harrison Kortright, looking past the speaker, sees them through the windows of the hall. His bosom swells with self-reproach as he thinks of the wealth those gleaming windows represent, and remembers how little he has done for the cause the orator is presenting. He turns his eyes again with admiration and resolve toward the speaker. He will give liberally to aid the Kansas pioneers. As God has dealt generously with him so will he deal with his oppressed and needy fellows. Then he remembered how plainly the sashes showed in the windows a hundred yards away. It was queer. He had never thought the whole front of the factory would be so lighted up with the glare from the hall. It was so red, too. It must be on account of the darkness of the night. He looked again. The windows were still brighter than before! and—what a silly dreamer he was—he could almost swear that he saw the polished shafts and idle belts! No, the machinery was in motion! He almost laughed outright as he thought what a silly fool he was. He had studied it so much that he saw it, as it was by day, even through the night and the distance. It was queer. It must be one of those optical delusions which we are all subject to at times. It was strange that he could see only the windows of the second story, too. He remembered that they were just on a level with those of the hall. He had sighted across the sills one day while they were putting them in and ascertained that fact. So the angle was just right for him to catch the reflection. Yet it was strange the first and third stories were so dark. And the second was growing lighter! It was—could it be? He shaded his eyes with his left hand to look the closer. The right, which grasped his cane, grew rigid as he gazed. His face could not be more colorless or inscrutable, but the light went out of his eyes—the lines about his mouth grew deeper.

There was a cry without.

The orator paused.

Harrison Kortright was at his side in a moment and whispering in his ear, "There must be no alarm. If there is a rush a hundred will be trampled to death."

The speaker understood, and pressed his hand in silence.

"Fire!"

One shrill, wild cry, that the winds took up and whirled away into the night. The audience looked from one to another in questioning surprise. Thank God, the windows were too high for them to see what was visible from the platform. The door was upon the opposite side of the building, too.

"Fire! Fire!"

There were two voices now, but the wind whistled and mocked at them. Some of the audience started from their seats. The speaker held up his right hand, the palm toward them. The buzz of alarm subsided instantly.

"This," said the orator, "is no doubt a trick of the enemy."

"Fire! Fire! Fire!"

There were three voices now, and the wind could not drown them. Kortright whispered in the speaker's ear. Shields looked from the speaker to the audience in surprise.

"It is not," said the speaker, "the first time that an alarm of fire has been raised to break up an Abolition meeting!"

The windows of the mill were light enough now. The wheels were turning, the belts flying, the empty arms of the machines clashing and flashing against the red flames that lighted up the panes.

"Fire! Clang! Boom! Fire!"

The alarm-bell joined its terrors to the voices of shouting men without.

"Keep quiet!" said Kortright sternly. "They've probably made a bonfire on the public square."

"It is just time to close our meeting, anyhow," said the orator, consulting his watch.

A few started toward the door.

"Don't be in a hurry," said the speaker pleasantly.

"The band will now play 'The Star-spangled Banner.'"

The band played. The audience was uneasy. Very many started to go out.

"We will meet here to-morrow at twelve to see our boys off for Kansas!" shouted Kortright in a pause of the music. "Don't forget it."

The blare of the trumpets filled the hall. The people, reassured by his words and manner, moved quietly toward the stairs; Harrison Kortright watched anxiously, clasping his friend's hand as if in congratulation and speaking to him with careless animation. They stepped toward Shields and turned his attention another way. The hall was half emptied of the unsuspecting hearers, when up the stairway came the roar of many voices:

"Fire! Fire! Kortright's mill is on fire!"

Outside the rush of many feet, the clamor of unnumbered voices and the clang of the alarm-bell mingled on the breeze. The three men on the platform turned toward the window and saw the red flame and dense clouds of prisoned smoke burst through the flashing, crashing panes and roll upward around the doomed building.

"Thank God," said Kortright, "no life has been lost."

Then he rushed off the platform, spoke a word of cheer to his white-faced wife, who, standing upon a chair, was gazing at the scene of desolation, and in a moment more was out of doors directing and stimulating the efforts of the people to control the fire.

From end to end the great factory was now wrapped in a sheet of red, leaping, smoke-tipped flame. The whole second story was ablaze. The fire leaped out of the windows on either side; ran up the wooden walls; climbed upon the roof; burst through the floor into the third story and ate its way downward into the first. The wind tossed the flames about in wild mockery. It caught up burning fragments and bore them here and there. It swept the flames down upon the pallid multitude, who gazed helplessly on the havoc that was being wrought, and scattered them with its fierce breath. The light flashed up against the clouds and painted their darkness with lurid colors. A hungry roar went up from the devouring flames as if an insensate demon asked for more.

The firemen tried in vain to save the nearest building. The factories stood thick along the banks of the narrow rivulet. The hill rose sharply just behind them and across the narrow street stood thick and close the houses of the workingmen. The wind blew from the southwestward. In front of this factory was the public square and the hall beyond. Mrs. Kortright, with her face pressed against the window, saw her husband, his gray hair and white upturned face lighted by the flames, stop the firemen who were trying to save the mill above, which was his own, and lead them down to that which stood below, in which he had no interest. But this lay in the path of the flames, between the blazing factory and the people's houses—between it and a score of other mills and factories below. Side by side with him was Dawson Fox—the self-constituted leader of the men he was addressing but a moment before. She saw the fire-light shine on his flushed face. His long, light beard floated on the wind that was now a gale. His eye flashed as he half turned his face toward her and waved his hand in the direction of the houses on the exposed hillside below. She knew all in a moment. They were going to abandon the factory in the attempt to save the dwellings.

Already the people had divined their danger, and the panic-stricken crowd rushed each to his own threshold. Men, women and children were stripping the houses in hot haste. Whatever was deemed most precious was seized first and carried to a place of safety or abandoned for something more valuable. It was a mad, raging crowd, that in its terror despoiled themselves almost as much as the fiend that followed hard upon their footsteps would have done.

She started to go. Her husband had bidden her to wait there in safety. She paused; then laid aside her wrappings; tied a red scarf about her head; flung her India shawl about her chest scarf-wise, and went out to aid in bringing order out of confusion—to cheer the men who stood in the pathway of the flame and bade defiance to its lurid wrath.

Dawson Fox, with a gallant band who followed his lead without question, was at the apex of the flame that crept swiftly and fiercely toward the factory below and was already scorching with its hot breath the first of the tenement-houses across the street.

"Only hold it back a little," Kortright had said to him hoarsely, "until I can get this wild mob organized so that we can fight it inch by inch. Of course, Smith's factory must go; but we may be able to save the houses—some of them at least. Those who own them cannot afford to lose them."

Fortunately the flumes were full. The little hand-engine—the pride of the village on its holiday parades—sucked the water from the race that ran in front of the mill and threw it on the flame through only a single length of hose. Strong arms manned the brakes, and as one dropped off wearied with the terrific exertion, another took his place. The men's faces glowed with excitement and perspiration. They dipped water from the race to slake their thirst. The water cracked and spluttered as it left the nozzle; hissed weakly as it struck the flame-wrapped building, or was transformed into clouds of vapor that showed soft and fleecy against the red light and dense up-rolling billows of smoke. Then the wind swept the flame down into their faces. The smoke and soot choked them. The heat singed their eyebrows and blistered their arms and faces. They fell back along the canal a few steps, and renewed the conflict. Nearer and nearer crept the flame to the doomed factory below—nearer and nearer to the doomed dwellings across the narrow street. Fainter and more hopeless grew the struggle of the puny engine with the mighty conflagration.

But every moment Kortright was educing order out of confusion. Already the corner house, which was most threatened, was swathed in dripping blankets from sill to ridge-pole. Ladders were placed at the farther side, up which buckets were passed to men upon the roof. They knew that it must go eventually, but while they held it the movable belongings of other homes were being rapidly and systematically removed to a place of safety.

All at once the race began to overflow. The engine was with difficulty dragged across a narrow bridge, whose planks were already floating away. The mill below was abandoned to its fate. Its upper gable was hardly ten yards away from the blazing pile. Already the flames seemed about to leap across the intervening space.

The owner of the imperiled mill had wrought like a Hercules for its preservation.

"It's no use!" he said, when it was proposed to carry the hose across the race and keep up the struggle. "It's no use. Forty such engines couldn't save it."

"I'm afraid that's so," said Kortright. "If there was a chance we'd take it. The only thing now is to save the houses if we can."

"Yes," said the owner dejectedly. Then suddenly, as if a new thought had occurred to him, "How came the water to be turned on to-night, 'Squire?"

"How came the water to be turned on?" echoed Kortright angrily. "How came that mill on fire?" he asked, pointing to the flaming pile.

"Really, I don't know. Some accident, I suppose," said the other, somewhat abashed by his impetuosity.

"Accident?" said Kortright scornfully; "the gate was raised and the machinery was running when the fire broke out?"

"So? I remember now," said the other; "though I had not thought of it before."

"You can hear the wheel now?"

The other listened.

"That's a fact," with a look of horror. "It must have been set on fire."

"Unquestionably."

"By whom?"

"God only knows!"

"You have not an enemy in Skendoah."

"Not that I know of."

"Then why—?"

"See here, Smith," said Kortright, turning on him fiercely, "if I have not an enemy in Skendoah, liberty has!"

"You don't mean—?"

"Aren't you hurt as well as I?" pointing to the exposed gable that was already beginning to smoke.

"Ruined, ruined, sir," shaking his head hopelessly.

"Every cent lost, and a load of debt beside."

"Where were you an hour ago?"

"In the hall."

"And those people?" jerking his thumb over his shoulder toward the dwellings in the rear.

"At the hall, too."

"Don't you see who the man meant to strike at that lighted that fire, started my machinery and lifted that gate?"

"My God! you don't mean—?"

"Of course I do!" hissed Kortright through his set teeth, "but, God helping me, he shall fail."

"You don't expect to save anything below here," with a wave of the hand taking in half the town.

"I will," fiercely.

"How?"

"I don't know."

"I guess not. It can't be done."

"Hark! What is that?"

A dull, heavy sound was heard as he spoke. It was not the rumble of the wheel beneath the fated mill nor the rush of the devouring flames, but a muffled roar that shook the earth beneath them. Every one stopped and listened in amazement. Then a man who stood upon the bridge that spanned the stream a hundred yards below, looked up toward the great dam, and saw a strange white something leap out of the darkness, out of the very base of the great wall which had so long imprisoned the waters of Memnona, and rush down the old bed of the torrent. He saw it swell and rise until it filled and overflowed the narrow channel which had been almost closed up and built over since the waters had been shut up behind the great wall of earth and stone. He beheld its white crest flash beneath the red rays of the burning mill before he half comprehended what it meant. Then he rushed across the bridge toward the breathless, waiting crowd and cried:

"The dam's broke! The lake's coming!"

"Impossible!" said Smith, incredulously.

"Impossible!" said Kortright, decidedly, remembering the foundations on which it rested.

"Impossible!" echoed every one who heard.

All waited breathlessly.

The roar grew louder. The earth trembled beneath their feet. The flames burned unheeded. Dawson Fox stepped to the side of Mrs. Kortright, as if apprehensive for her safety. She had been one of the most active. Her example had done much to quiet the panic which had at first seized men as well as women. Her eyes were fixed on the white-haired man in the middle of the street. He stood listening, wondering. All at once he raised his head, and, with uplifted hands, shouted:

"Thank God! Thank God!"

Those who heard him thought Harrison Kortright had suddenly become crazed.

"Mr. Smith!" he cried. "Sejanus Smith!"

"Here!" answered the proprietor, who had stepped back a few paces in apprehension.

"What will you take for that mill?"

The fire was already curling up the smoking clapboards.

"In addition to the insurance?" cautiously.

"Yes, in addition to that."

"Ten cents," contemptuously.

"I will give you ten thousand dollars!"

"What?"

"I will give you ten thousand dollars."

"It is sure to burn."

"Of course. Will you take it?"

"Certainly, if you mean it."

"All right! Shake hands!"

The two men clasped each other's hands in the street. The bargain was confirmed. The hot breath of the flame swept over them. They were almost alone on the bank of the race. The crowd wondered what it meant.

The flame leaped across the narrow space, and, with a roar like that of artillery, the gable of the mill Kortright had just purchased burst into a blaze from sill to cornice.

THE DEAD LIMB.

Cut off that dead limb!

Is that what you said?

O woodman! I'd rather You'd cut off my head.

My little brown bird—

It was made just for him—

He comes every day

And swings on that limb.

There are green boughs above

And green boughs below;

Why he takes the bare branch

For his seat, I don't know.

What his reason may be

I really don't care,

If, when I look out,

I see that he's there.

He loves me I know,

For his song he begins;

And I show him by signs

That my favor he wins.

He has many homes

Far up in the air;

But my lonely lot

It has pleased him to share.

He swings and he sings

On the branch all the day;

Woe be to the man

Who drives him away!

Woe be to the man

Who cuts off the limb;

If he'd never been born,

'Twould be better for him!

My bonnie brown bird,

Swing and sing at your ease;

No one shall disturb

Your home in the trees.

Through all the Spring and Summer weather,
Your heart and mine have grown together.

ROSALIE VANDERWATER.

MISS RHODA BROUGHTON has won for herself a peculiar place among modern novelists. She has her admirers by the hundred thousand, and her critics in equal numbers, but of imitators she thus far has none that are worth considering. Her originality of style, indeed, renders imitation well nigh impossible; and her daring portrayal of social and family scenes is so contrary to the treatment which such scenes ordinarily receive that cynics read with wicked delight, and other people wonder if this is the way English people treat one another in their own homes. What should we say if Mr. James were to represent two American sisters in the light wherein Belinda and Sarah appear in the first installment of Miss Broughton's new story begun in this number of THE CONTINENT?

THERE is some danger lest in the perfectly justifiable indignation concerning recent sacrilegious violations of burial grounds, the public may forget what it owes to the great medical schools of Philadelphia. What these schools have been in the past, and what they now are, is forcibly shown in the article on "Medical Education" in the present number of THE CONTINENT. The fine engraving on page 78 is the first that has been made from Mr. Eakin's great painting, which attracted so much attention when exhibited in New York a year or two ago, and which is now one of the notable treasures of the Philadelphia Academy of Fine Arts. This engraving was specially executed for the place which it occupies in our pages, and is probably the best attainable reproduction of the painting.

THE President's recommendations in regard to Civil Service Reform have been received by the advocates of the life-tenure and written-examination theory with most unbecoming levity. The President is known to be in favor of a definite limited term for all placemen under government. There is no reason to believe that he is any less sincere in this belief than they in their devotion to life-tenure. There are not a few who have the right to claim sincerity and have their claim admitted, who believe that a system of life-tenure of office in the Republic would be a most dangerous backward step. But whichever of these is believed by them, let the Republicans in Congress take the matter up and put it in train for solution. Let them begin at the root and bring forward a proposition to amend the Constitution so as to make this method of regulating the civil service compulsory, and not resting on the will of each successive administration. That will make a sharp issue. The Democratic party would be compelled to stop coquetting with the Reformers, or stand squarely with them—neither of which it desires to do. Whatever may be the merits of the question, there is not a particle of doubt that the President's plan of Civil Service Reform would be approved by the people in any conflict between it and the life-tenure idea.

Nor long ago a life-long invalid, whose chief solace is books, was discovered beginning "Monte Cristo" for the third time. "What do you see in the book?" said a surprised and critical friend; and, after a half-deprecating pause for reflection, the answer came: "It is so deliciously and consistently impossible."

Such is the verdict to be pronounced on a collection of short stories¹ now before the public, but meeting far less recognition than their merit deserves; for the art of really telling a story is almost a lost one, analysis having taken its place. The present form of novel is a problem to be studied, and rest and recuperation for the reader no part of its intention. It is thus doubly refreshing to take up a book which immediately absorbs and holds one to the very end. The premises are all absurd; but admitting such premises, the whole preposterous course of events is consistent and to be expected. The Caliph naturally in this nineteenth century is succeeded by Prince Florizel of Bohemia, and the famous cream-tarts appear in the opening story. There is no other resemblance, though the incidents supposed to take place in London and Paris are as wild as anything in the remotest East. Mr. Stevenson's style is admirable. It is finished, though never in the Henry James sense, having a very distinct and strong individuality, with yet no touch of mannerism. It is merely delightful English, every word in the right place, and the whole effect simple yet powerful. Properly speaking, the book constitutes two volumes, the "Nights" ending with the first one, the second being made up of less distinctive but quite as brilliant work. The "Suicide Club" opens the book. The Caliph and Grand Vizier are represented by Prince Florizel and his attendant, Colonel Geraldine, and both are introduced by a young man who is selling cream-tarts in Leicester Square, into the secrets of a society organized for bringing about suicide by mutual murder. The neophyte must be tired of life and willing to pay forty pounds in money; and the Prince and the Colonel, professing the first and producing the second, are led into a room with one high window, where is assembled a "little band of members pledged to decide by the fall of the cards which shall kill and be killed."

The club and its members are graphically drawn, and the intense excitement of the final scene is shared by the reader. Each chapter is complete, yet linked to the preceding one, and the double series of adventures sustain their interest to the last.

In the second part, "The Pavilion on the Links," is a story of extraordinary intensity, here and there suggesting Blackmore in "Lorna Doone," or some pages of "Wuthering Heights," but with a power quite its own. "A Lodging for the Night; a Story of Francis Villon," is a drama in itself. The whole spirit of the evil time is there, each player "absorbed by his own mean interest, but all united in a confraternity of evil." The gambling quarrel, the murder; Villon's terrified escape and search for shelter; the stormy night; the wretched woman frozen to death in the pitiless sleet and snow; the old French knight of the Fifteenth century, who at last gives him shelter and exhorts him to repentance, are so real that the ending is a personal pain. Through the whole is a subtle and pervading humor, which one is sure must have been enjoyed as much by author as it is by the reader. It is a new departure in romance writing, and perhaps the keynote of a new era.

(1) NEW ARABIAN NIGHTS. By Robert Louis Stevenson. Leisure Hour Series. (16mo, pp. 329, $1.00; Henry Holt & Co., New York).

MR. WALTER BESANT is a busy man, and has added to his other labors that of writing a biography of the late Professor E. H. Palmer.

ANOTHER collection of sonnets, edited by Mr. H. J. Nicoll, is to appear in Edinburgh, under the somewhat affected title of "C. Sonnets, by C. Authors."

"EUROPEAN BREEZES," Margery Dean's (Mrs. Pitman's) gossip little book of travels has proved so popular that Lee & Shepard, her publishers, have issued a special holiday edition, for which there is said to be a large demand.

IT is a curious fact that "The Tale of Two Cities," the most dramatic and artistic of all Dickens' books, has had less sale than any other. "Pickwick" leads, and during the twelve years since the novelist's death, some 4,239,000 of his books have been sold in England alone.

PRANG'S CHRISTMAS CARDS have already had such full description in every quarter that it is hardly necessary to do more than confirm the popular verdict. Their artistic qualities improve each year, and whether plain or in their dress of fringe and cord, they are one of the most attractive forms of holiday remembrance.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER's views of American life, and the proceedings at the farewell banquet given to him November 11, 1882, have been published in a neat pamphlet, by D. Appleton & Co., and will interest all who failed to read the press reports, or who care to preserve a record of both interview and comments upon it.

"THE BOOK OF FORTY PUDDINGS," by Susan Anna Brown—the puddings being forty cents and the sauces ten—is a pretty oblong volume, in which all has been done that paper, print and binding can do toward making a topic attractive. The receipts are excellent, and only one thing is wanting—an index. (Charles Scribner's Sons, New York).

"THE YOUTH'S COMPANION" remains as much a favorite as fifty years ago, its illustrations being the most objectionable work about it. Its corps of brilliant contributors make up deficiencies in this respect, and 1883 promises even more profuse entertainment than previous years have held. Mr. Butterworth does some of the most painstaking and attractive work for young people, and the paper owes much to his services.

AMONG the many attractive calendars for 1883, three take the lead. Miss Sanborn's "Sunshine Calendar" issued by J. R. Osgood & Co., which is on so liberal a scale that each leaf holds two or more selections, and the Longfellow and Emerson calendars, from Houghton, Mifflin & Co., each made up of carefully selected quotations, and each a store-house of pleasure for whoever becomes the owner. Each $1.00.

MR. A. J. H. DUGANNE's book, "Governments of the World: Their History and Structure," is really a dictionary of governments, and one of the most valuable books that has appeared during the year. It has involved an enormous amount of labor, and really gives, in brief, the political history of mankind. Questions have been added, which fit it for use as a text-book, and it may well be used as a reference book by all who want fuller knowledge of the subject, as it certainly will be by all who have desired precisely such a condensed and accurate arrangement of facts. (8vo., pp. 881, $2.00; James S. Burton, New York).

MRS. EMMA P. EWING, whose "Cooking and Castle-Building," is one of the most charming contributions to the esthetic side of cookery, is preparing a set of little manuals for use in cooking schools. The first one treats of "Soup and Soup Making," and ends with a set of questions on the topics treated. The work is very simply and comprehensively done, and its low price, twenty-five cents, makes it accessible to all. Fairbanks, Palmer & Co., Chicago.

THE title of Mrs. Jane G. Austin's pleasant little volume disarms criticism at once, for who could look coldly upon anything so eminently unpretending as "Nantucket Scraps. Being the Experience of an Off-Islander, In Season and Out of Season, Among a Passing People." What an "Off-Islander" is, is fully explained, together with many other scraps of information, and, though treading on dangerous ground, there is nothing that can wound the feelings of the most susceptible Nantucketer. (pp. 354, $1.25; J. R. Osgood & Co., Boston).

AN unusually well-written though slightly improbable story for children is found in "Paul and Persis; or, The Revolutionary Struggle in the Mohawk Valley," by Mary E. Brush. Persis is a waif, left at the door of Paul's grandmother, and brought up by her, her parentage being finally discovered in very melodramatic fashion. The German element of the valley and the daily life of the period are well described, and the whole will give small readers a vivid idea of the war and its effects in this then remote and almost unknown region. (pp. 228, $1.00; Lee and Shepard, Boston).

LONG before "The Boys of '61" and other equally fascinating books had made Charles Carleton Coffin's name familiar to boy readers, "Our Young Folks," that dearly-loved and long-mourned magazine, contained in its early years a serial story, called "Winning His Way." No story for boys ever better deserved the place it took and has kept, and the publishers do well in giving a new edition, fully illustrated, in which the boy of to-day may follow the fortunes of Paul Parker, and dance for joy, as at least one boy was known to do, when he comes home from the war at last, weak, wounded and half-dead, to the faithful friends who believed in him through evil as well as good report, and to the girl who proved more than friend. (Square 12mo, pp. 208, $1.25; Estes & Lauriat, Boston).

THE literary life, arduous as it in some ways is, has preservative qualities. Mr. Alcott is recovering from his paralytic shock, and Dr. Holmes, though long past seventy, carries his years lightly, and speaks in the January Atlantic with no lack of his old force, and with a promise of future work delightful to every one of his readers. "Having laid down the burden which for more than thirty-five years I have carried cheerfully," he says, "I might naturally seek the quiet of my chimney corner, and purr away the twilight of my life unheard beyond the circle about my own fireplace. But when I see what my living contemporaries are doing, I am shamed out of absolute inertness and silence. The men of my birth-year are so painfully industrious at this very time that one of the same date hardly dares to be idle."

IN selecting Lieutenant F. V. Greene as the chronicler of the latest issue in the "Campaigns of the Civil War" series, "The Mississippi," the publishers have deviated from their usual custom of choosing a participant in the scenes and events described. Lieutenant Greene has no personal knowledge of this campaign, and may be, for this reason, a more disinterested historian. There are small traces of the vivacity which distinguished his "Army Life in Russia." The subject seems to have weighed upon him, and in his anxiety to be accurate he becomes tedious, his narrative being constantly interrupted by verifications. His estimate of many of the chief officers of this campaign is quite at variance with popular opinions regarding them. He gives the fact, not before made known, and to be found in unpublished papers of General Pemberton's, that the army in Vicksburg "were mutinous, and refused to undertake a march and battle with the design of cutting their way through the Union lines and abandoning the city," and the uncertainty of temper of the final days is described minutely. As a whole, the book, though the least interesting of the series, presents some new points, and is a good summary of this special phase of the Rebellion. (12mo, pp. 276, $1.25; Charles Scribner's Sons, New York).

In the current number of the Popular Science Monthly Mr. Herbert Spencer writes of the "Gospel of Recreation," with especial reference to his American observations. "Everywhere," he says, "I have been struck with the number of faces which told in strong lines of the burdens that had to be borne. I have been struck, too, with the large proportion of gray-haired men; and inquiries have brought out the fact that with you the hair commonly begins to turn some ten years earlier than with us. Moreover, in every circle I have met men who had themselves suffered from nervous collapse due to stress of business, or named friends who had either killed themselves by overwork, or had been permanently incapacitated, or had wasted long periods in endeavors to recover health. I do but echo the opinion of all the observant persons I have spoken to, that immense injury is being done by this high-pressure life—the physique is being undermined. We hear a great deal about 'the vile body,' and many are encouraged by the phrase to transgress the laws of health; but Nature quietly suppresses those who treat thus disrespectfully one of her highest products, and leaves the world to be peopled by the descendants of those who are not so foolish."

Gossip about art and artists has an unflinching charm, and thus "Parisian Art and Artists," by Henry Bacon, will find an audience through curiosity alone. The title, "Parisian Art," the author hastens to say, is by no means limited to French art. "Sweden, Russia, Hungary, Spain, Italy, England and America contribute to this common fund of esthetic talent, aspiration and endeavor." Mr. Bacon is a careful and discriminating critic, and has caught the spirit of this curious mixture, with its tendencies and effects, wonderfully well. Each artist is represented by one or more sketches, often of extreme interest, as showing their methods of work, though there are cases where such selection by no means does them justice, as on page 18, where Alfred Stevens' "Autumn" shows a right arm and hand that are of inconceivable stiffness and disproportion. As a whole, however, the illustrations are of great value, the book affording many details inaccessible elsewhere, and being of permanent and solid value, though of most interest to those who already have some knowledge of the subjects treated, the want of fullness being at times exceedingly provoking. (Illustrated, square 12mo, pp. 239, $3.00; James R. Osgood & Co., Boston).

For those who are not content till a knowledge of personal details concerning an author has been reached, there will undoubtedly be a certain interest in Mr. W. Sloane Kennedy's volume entitled "John Greenleaf Whittier: His Life, Genius and Writings." The book is written in a chatty, familiar style; Mr. Kennedy is a fair and reasonable critic, and many glimpses of the poet are not only new but interesting, as when he writes: "Whittier is now an old man, somewhat hard of hearing, and with the fixed sadness of time upon his pleasant face. But ever and anon, as you converse with him, his countenance is irradiated by a sudden smile, sweet and strange and full of benignity—like a perfume from a bed of white violets, or a glint of rich sunlight on an April day. His is one of those Emersonian natures that everybody loves at first sight. The very mole under the right eye seems somehow the birthmark or sign-manual of kindliness. The quaint grammatical solecisms of the Quaker and the New England farmer—the 'thee's' and the omission of the g's from present participles and other words ending 'ing'—give to the poet's conversation a certain slight piquancy and picturesqueness." In spite of as much inoffensiveness as such writing can hold, it must be said that the book is an offense to good taste, the very fact of undertaking a memoir while its subject still lives giving the feeling that speedy death is anticipated, and the biographer wants to be first in the market. BRADFORD, in England, represents the seat of English woollen manufacture from time immemorial. There is manufactured here, perhaps, every variety of wool grown in the world; hence an account of the wools used at Bradford is tantamount to a description of the principal varieties of the article from all countries. Of countries abroad, the largest supply is derived from the Australian colonies, and there the assortment of qualities and lengths is even greater than in England. They vary from the long, bright New Zealand cross-bred wools, resembling in character the finest Port Philip merinos. These wools arrive, some "in the grease," without washing either on the sheeps' backs or after having been clipped; some washed on the sheeps' backs, and some scoured by machinery after clipping. The tendency is to encourage importation "in the grease," as in that condition the wool best retains its desirable properties, and, besides, no danger exists of its being damaged by any bad process of scouring or washing. Wools from the Cape of Good Hope are not largely used in Bradford, but are better adapted for the Scotch and West of England manufacturers of men's cloth. French, Spanish and Italian wools are mostly used in the countries producing them, but still find their way thither in small quantities. Dutch wool, which is long, coarse and of a certain brightness, is also used. It is received generally unwashed, and is of a lower character than the English production of a similar general quality. Russian wool is largely imported, and varies, as may be expected in so vast a country, from fine merino to the lowest classes. It is chiefly used for moreens. Camel's hair is also imported, both from Russia and China. Besides all these, mohair from Turkey and the Cape and alpaca from Chili and Peru are largely used. The descriptions of goods into which the wools of each country are worked can only be described approximately. They are mixed with each other in infinite variety, and the lower qualities of many ranges of goods are made from different kinds of wools to those used in the better qualities of the same range; that is to say, a low Coburg is frequently made from non-lustre English or Irish wool, while the better Coburgs are made from English down wools or from Australia. The warp for all wool fabrics requiring length and strength is generally made from longer and stronger wool than the weft, which is most frequently spun from linen and softer wool. As will be seen, therefore, the warp of all wool goods is often made of quite different wool from the weft. Speaking generally, it may be said that from the strongest sorts of English wools, such as those grown in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, there are made Orleans mixed dress goods of lustrous character, such as low princettas, dress cords, Russell cords, used for both women's and men's wear; Sicilians and glacés, which latter are very light dress-goods, and, like all the descriptions now named, are made with cotton warp. The next grade in wools, such as those from Northumberland, the south of Scotland and Kent, are made into lastings for linings and for the tops of women's boots, damask and reps for furniture, yarns used in the making of braids and stockings, Coburgs, and all medium, non-lustrous dress goods. The finer kinds of goods, such as the downs from Sussex and Hampshire and the finest from other countries, are made into "finger-yarns," for knitting, and the better stocking-yarns, non-lustrous dress goods (of a better quality than the last named), common serges and paramattas. The stronger kinds of Australian wools, called cross-breds, are often used for the same purposes as similar qualities in English wools, such as the weft for the lower and middle qualities of Coburgs, Thibets, Sicilians and Italians. All these, especially the last, are largely used for linings. All-wool and mixed serges are also made from these wools. The finer sorts of colonial wools are woven into the best Thibets, Persians, cords, Italians and all-wool cashmeres; also into any other goods where fineness and softness are desired. Common Mediterranean wools are largely used for carpets, moreens and strong, heavy goods. Mohair, the fleece of the goat, is the brightest fibre used. It is made into excellent dress goods, mixed with cotton, wool or silk, and the yarn from it is used in heavy quantities for making braids, and also in manufacturing imitation sealskins, mantles and rugs. Alpaca is also of a bright nature, and is used almost entirely for dress goods; but as fashion for a long time past has been for materials of a soft, dull finish, rather than those having a bright appearance, mohair and alpaca have become much lower in price as compared with wool than formerly.

CHEMISTS have found much of interest in the critical examination of sea-water. The facts discovered in the progress of these investigations have been fruitful of suggestions as to the geological history of inland seas. The analysis of numerous specimens of waters from the Mediterranean, Red Sea, Suez Canal, Chinese Sea and the Indian and Atlantic Oceans, shows the wide-spread existence of lithium and boric acid in all these seas. This fact leads to the following hypothesis as to the origin of saline deposits in different soils: If a mineral water contains magnesium chloride and at the same time lithium and boric acid in such quantities as to be readily detected in a few drops of the water, the water in all probability consists of a sea-water concentrated by evaporation; and, in like manner, when lithium and boric acid do not exist simultaneously in the water in appreciable quantities, it is absolutely certain that it is not the result, at least directly, of the evaporation of sea-water. The water of the Dead Sea contains lithium in such quantities that its presence may be detected by means of the spectroscope in a minute fraction of a drop, while a few drops afford sufficient boric acid to show its presence when examined spectroscopically. According to this hypothesis, it would appear that the waters of the Dead Sea are the residue of an inland sea, analogous to that of the Caspian Sea, or more particularly to that of the Karabaghaz, and has been separated from the ocean at some former time.

A CURIOUS project in the way of recreation, by M. Joyen, is published. Suppose a large circular wooden chamber, lit from above, but giving no view of outer objects from within, and rotated smoothly and rapidly on a vertical axis. A person standing in it would have to bend his body toward the centre, by reason of centrifugal force, and the more so the further he might be from the centre and the higher speed. M. Joyen supposes he would be subject to the illusion that the floor was inclined upward from his position to the centre; if he had to place himself at an angle of forty-five degrees, the floor would seem inclined at this angle, and a person standing in the corresponding place on the opposite side would seem horizontal, for he too would have to make an angle of forty-five degrees. Only at the centre would the floor seem horizontal, and if a number of persons were in the chamber it is only there one would see them in their real positions. A person walking round the circumference would seem to be at the outside of the base of a cone, which turned under him. To facilitate the position of persons,

M. Joyen would make the floor not horizontal, but inclining upwards at a certain distance from the centre. M. Tissandier does not feel certain that the illusions described would actually occur, but regards the scheme as an attractive curiosity. The apparatus is named "Plagioscope."

AN interesting experiment has recently been made in Paris. A small balloon, measuring about one hundred cubic feet, and filled with pure hydrogen, was sent up, being held captive by a rope containing two copper wires. A Swan incandescent light having been placed in the gas and attached to the top of the balloon was lighted and the whole aerial machine, which was quite translucent, was splendidly illuminated. It was shown by systematic interruptions that the dots and dashes of the Morse system could be imitated for giving military signals at a great distance.

MOUNTAIN CORK has been recently used in Germany as a substitute for animal charcoal for the removal of color from molasses. The mountain cork, a variety of amphibole, is dried, ignited and soaked in molasses, then again dried and ignited. This process is repeated several times, until some 3.5 per cent of carbon has become fixed in the mineral, which is then ready for use. It is more efficient than charcoal in removing the alkalies from molasses.

THE DRAMA.

"PEROLA; OR, THE REJECTED TITLE" is the name of a travesty on "Iolanthe" to be produced in London.

MME. JANAUSCHEK, it is said, will produce a new play, entitled "Boadicea," written for her by a Providence gentleman, for the first time during her forthcoming engagement at Haverly's Theatre, Philadelphia.

"IOLANTHE" has packed the Standard Theatre, New York, at every performance since its opening night. It has been equally successful at the Lyceum, Philadelphia, under the management of Messrs. Murphy and Donnelly, who have presented it with the strictest attention to every detail.

MR. LYTTON SOTHERN, a son of the famous comedian, will play an extended engagement in this country next season, producing the plays in which his father achieved his great fame and fortune. He will be accompanied by his sister, Miss Eva Sothern, a lady whose personal attractions are highly praised.

THE same enthusiastic receptions greeted Mme. Nilsson in Chicago and San Francisco as were extended to her in Eastern cities. It is thought possible that she may be seen in grand opera in New York ere her departure for Europe, and that she may inaugurate the Broadway Opera House, now in course of erection.

"THE SORCERER" has had a very prosperous run at the Bijou Opera House, New York. It will be succeeded by a new opera by Messrs. Solomon and Stephens, called "Virginia." These co-workers are now engaged on a spectacular opera, entitled "The Snow Queen," which is to be produced at Booth's Theatre in the spring.

DURING the week commencing December 11, Mr. Jefferson fulfilled an engagement at the National Theatre, Washington. It proved quite a strange coincidence, as in the corresponding week of December, 1835, his father was playing in that city at a theatre also called the National, supporting Mr. James Wallack and Miss Wheatley.

ANOTHER theatre is to be built in New York in Third Avenue, corner of Thirty-first Street. It is to be managed by Mr. and Mrs. McKee Rankin, and is advertised to be ready in September next. Popular prices will prevail, and it is intended to supply the wants of the up-town east-side population, as the Grand Opera House on Eighth Avenue does for the western side of the city.

MR. RICHARD MANSFIELD, who was very favorably received earlier in the season in the operas of "Rip Van Winkle" and "Les Manteaux Noirs" at the Standard Theatre, New York, has joined the Union Square Theatre, and makes his first appearance there in M. Octave Feuillet's "A Parisian Romance." Difference of opinion with the management of the Standard Theatre as to the rendering of one of the principal parts in "Iolanthe" caused his withdrawal.

MR. A. C. GUNTER, the author of "Two Nights in Rome," one of the best dramas of any modern American playwright; "Fresh, the American," one of Mr. John T. Raymond's successes, and others of lesser note, will shortly produce a new play, called "Courage," at the Park Theatre, Boston. Mr. Gunter assumes all the risk of production, so that if the play meets the success he anticipates the reward will be all his own. Messrs. Merry and Goatcher have painted the scenery, and the incidental music has been composed by Mr. Jesse Williams, the conductor of the Bijou Opera House, New York.

"SIBERIA," Mr. Bartley Campbell's latest contribution to dramatic literature, achieved immediate success upon its initial production on any stage at the California Theatre, San Francisco, some weeks since. The story treats of the persecution of the Jews in Russia, also of Nihilism, and is strong and full of interest. The play is seven acts, several of which are spectacular, ballet being introduced. The central character, "Sara," daughter of a Jew who has turned Christian, was played by Miss Georgia Cayvan. Mr. Augustus Levick and Mr. George Wessels interpreted the leading male characters. "Siberia" will be produced next in New York, to receive the Eastern verdict.

Answers to Correspondents.

Allida.—According to some of the best Shakspearean commentators the refrain in the witches' song in "Macbeth," "Double, double, toil and trouble," refers to the alleged twins of which Mrs. Macbeth was the mother.

Bridget.—Yes, you are quite correct. If you pour kerosene on a dull fire it will quicken it effectually. If you are lucky, you may survive the quickening of that fire and live to try it again; but the chances are agin it, Bridget—the chances are agin it!

Lawyer.—Your scruples of conscience do you great credit. Feeling as you do, it would no doubt injure your professional standing should you undertake the defense of a criminal belonging to a low-down family. Don't you defend any criminal whose social standing is not first-rate.

Eliza Jane.—Trim your light-blue silk dress with old-gold satin ribbon (green-lined, if possible), and have a good many oxidized silver buttons in front. Your long yellow gloves will go admirably with this costume, and with your maroon velvet hat you will look quite too altogether bewitching for anything.

Thomas W.—Well, let us suppose that the burglar is in one of the upper rooms and you want to catch him. You just get the rolling-pin, or two or three of them if you can, and lay them on the stairs. Then make a row and the burglar will run down, but he won't run far before stepping on a rolling-pin, and then you can descend at your leisure and capture the remains of him at the foot of the stairs. It isn't a good plan, however, to keep rolling-pins on the stairs habitually. The wrong person is sure to forget them, and then there is trouble and a doctor's bill.

Angelina.—No, my dear. If you are young and good looking, and possessed of a private fortune of $100,000 in your own right, don't you go and get married if you want to succeed as an author. If you can only persuade the editorial fraternity that you have the above-mentioned points in your favor you've no idea what a high opinion they will form of your manuscripts. They will accept everything you can write, and will correspond with you in the most friendly way. But just as sure as you get married they will lose all interest in you, and will even decline with thanks the pretty little sonnets which you will indite to "Our Home" and "My Baby" and the rest. No, Angelina, don't you do it. That's our advice; but if you are really bent upon marriage, and your intentions are strictly honorable, why we might put you in the way of hearing something to your advantage. Anyhow, suppose you send us your real name and address. We might hear of something that would suit you, you know.

James.—We are always glad to give advice to young men who, like you, have $5000 with which they wish to speculate in Wall street. You want to get introduced to some broker, in the first place, and tell him your plans. He will tell you not to put your money up unless you can afford to lose it; and then he will show you how, if you had called the day before, you might have doubled your investment. He won't give you any advice—not he—but he will take your $5000, and, by a neat and mysterious process which he calls buying on a margin, he will lay in about a million dollars' worth of some mining stock, which is bound to rise to par next week, and make you a millionaire. Every day you watch the reports, and pretty soon your broker will sell you out at a small loss, and re-invest in something else, and at the end of three or four weeks your money will be all gone. That is all there is. Nothing difficult about it! Oh, by all means go and put money that you can afford to lose in Wall street! It will be safe there! So safe that you will never get it again. But then you will know where it is, and you will enjoy seeing your broker driving his span of bays in the park.

His Devotions.

THE organ peals, the choir is singing;
I wonder if she knows I'm here!
Her thoughts, no doubt, are upward winging,
While mine sink, clogged with doubt and fear.

'Tis she, of course; there's no mistaking
Her crowded, glossy braids of brown,
And that's the bonnet she was making—
I sat and watched her bead the crown.

How deft her fingers are—how busy!
Ah! happy man within whose home—
But, stay! such thoughts, they make me dizzy,
And have no place beneath this dome.

Far better should I ponder grimly
My faults committed, duties missed.
How neat her glove is, and how trimly
It buttons round her slender wrist!

Ah! vain and poor is earthly pleasure;
No wonder that our sad hearts yearn
To some more high and lasting treasure—
They're sitting down. Perhaps she'll turn.

Thank Heaven, she sees me! She is flinging
A sweet reproachful glance my way—
Yes, dear, indeed I've been singing,
And now, my saint, I mean to pray! M. BRIDGES.

THE BEGGARS—REMBRANDT.

AN ART FOR ENTHUSIASTS.

THE increase of interest in everything relating to art which very recent years have witnessed among us, appears to many only as a passing freak of fashion, which will soon give place to some other whim as all-absorbing for the moment and as short-lived in the end. Perhaps the best evidence that it is more than this is found in the directions it has taken, and in the forms it has assumed, rather than in the ardor which, in certain quarters at least, distinguishes its devotees.

The movement is popular in the fullest sense. There might have been a good deal more founding of art schools than we have seen, more rearing of public monuments, more giving of state commissions for works of imposing size, with subjects of national importance. There might have been, in many ways, more ambitious and conspicuous movements in the patronage and encouragement of art by the few who occupy places from which such patronage and encouragement can be dispensed, without, at the same time, anything like the evidence of substantial improvement in popular standards of taste which one sees everywhere to-day. For the impulse is felt, in one form or another, in every household, and a touch of refinement is given to the humblest, which, however slight, is everywhere regarded as genuine and sincere.

I am not speaking of "household art" in any restricted sense, but only of that which is distinctively domestic and familiar, as opposed to that which is meant for the public place; and the changes one notices in the relation of almost everything pertaining to these private needs, though following prevalent fashions, of course—we always do that—are yet, it must be allowed, with hardly an exception, changes in the direction of those preferences that are recognized as "artistic," because associated in our minds with an influence which lives through the changes of fashion, and which gives enduring value to whatever is felt to be in harmony with its spirit.

The increased interest which is felt in etching, and the changed feeling with which it has come to be regarded, is significant of this improvement in the public taste. Not that the densest ignorance of its methods and completest misapprehension of its spirit are not prevalent enough, as they are prevalent concerning other arts; not that much of the enthusiasm one hears expressed about it is anything more than harmless "gush," which would expend itself as lavishly and as aimlessly on some other subject if this were wanting; not that young ladies, in many respects well brought up, and who might at least be reasonably expected to understand the meaning of common English words, are not still to be found in great numbers who confound etching with work in pen and ink and misapply the name to the more or less artistic devices which they execute, by this means, on holly-wood or linen; not that, to large numbers of very respectable citizens who turn with pleasure the leaves of illustrated books, or regularly expend a portion of their income on prints for their walls, an etching is not still a kind of slipshod and out-at-elbows engraving, to which they much prefer the tidy trimness of the steel plate, with its formal and perhaps machine-made lines; but among those who have learned to recognize what is genuine and original, under whatever form it is presented, etching has long ago come to be regarded as among the most satisfactory of the arts which the printing press disseminates. Most of all, perhaps, this is the case with artists who find in the directness of its methods enlarged opportunities for artistic expression, as well as a healthful change in their habits of work and exercise for faculties which the painter is apt to neglect; and if the renewed activity in the arts and the apparent love for them which we notice on every hand is indeed a genuine awakening of the artistic spirit among a people who have systematically neglected it hitherto, it need hardly be wondered at that among the first branches of art to feel the new impulse should be one which lends itself so readily to the expression of this spirit.

A very large and successful exhibition by the Society of Etchers has been open in Philadelphia since Christmas, and an equally important one by the New York society will be opened in that city next month. The most original and distinguished etcher of modern times, Mr. Seymour Haden, of London, is spending the winter with us, and has given his views about his beloved art before large and enthusiastic audiences in the principal cities. It is worth while—and the time is a favorable one—to consider some of the claims for preference which etching makes, and some of the causes which have hitherto hindered their recognition.

"The comparison," says Mr. Haden, "of the etching needle with the burin is the comparison of the pen with the plow." The lecturer, in his zeal, has sometimes gone out of his way to belittle and degrade a very noble art, and as far as he means in the simile to make the plow a symbol of clumsiness and the engraver only a plodding toiler, I am sure he is unjust. Within certain limits, however, the comparison is not unfair, and expresses with considerable truth the relation between the untrammelled expression of mental activity which is possible on the one hand, and the patient and persevering industry, which is certainly a conspicuous element of success, on the other.

It is the least satisfactory way of advocating the merits of one art to assail another. This is the mistake which has been made by Mr. Haden, and I should not, in anything I have to say about etching, continue the comparison with engraving at all, if the common objections to etching did not seem to be chiefly associated with and perhaps owing to such a comparison. If then, I ask the reader to consider for a moment the purpose of both the etcher's and the engraver's work, and the sources of such interest as we feel in both their performances, he will please understand that the comparison between them, which is inevitable, is rather an attempt to vindicate the one than an effort to disparage the other.

Such a consideration involves, at the outset, nothing less than an inquiry into the spirit and purpose of art itself. Is it an affair of mental capacity and emotion, or is it a struggle with material obstacles to the utterance of these? In a sense it is both. But I think we shall all agree that the noblest form of expression is that which voices the emotion with most directness, and in which the physical effort is least apparent.

This, of course, is all that is meant by the saws about its being the "end of art to conceal art," on the one hand, and on the other, that those arts are "fine" in the truest sense, in which the material employed offers least difficulty in its manipulation, an attempt at classification which has before now been applied to the several arts. It is unsatisfactory, certainly, if for no other reason than that it is difficult if not impossible to tell which art is "easier" than another, but it contains an element of truth as indicating that the mind does its best work when it is hindered the least.

Not that the spectacle of the mind triumphing over material difficulties is not in itself a very noble one; but this is, for the most part, a question of ingenuity and persistence in other fields than those we are contemplating, chiefly in that of mechanics, and it only confuses our whole conception of the nature of things to mix up our feelings regarding these with our ideas concerning art.

Now, great as the artistic capacity of the really eminent engravers has often been, the evidence of ingenuity and persistence which their work necessarily bears is so great that it is not strange if it sometimes blinds us to the former quality, especially since so large a part of the engraver's effort has always been directed to the reproduction and dissemination of the creations of others. So large a part, I say, because it is by no means true, as some have asserted, that engraving is, in its nature, exclusively imitative, and that it is essentially an art at second-hand.

It is probably not so much because its capability of original expression is so limited that artists do not oftener practice engraving, but because the mechanical difficulties are so great and the amount of time required to overcome them so out of proportion to what it is in other arts. I do indeed think that the opportunities for the expression of individual peculiarities of thought and feeling are greater in etching than in engraving, and that if a comparison must be made, the former is zine, there have appeared from time to time engravings which have been cut on wood in fac-simile of etchers' work. As examples at the same time of patient skill and of exquisite refinement of the perceptive faculties they are marvelous; but I wonder how many of the readers who admired them for a moment as they turned the leaves were aware that into each of those little "cuts," as they are called, went the labor of perhaps a month. A month's hard work to copy on wood the lines which the artist-etcher had dashed off in a morning! If I admired the skill of the engraver less, I should feel less regret that it had not been more worthily employed.

With the steel engraver the case is still worse, for the finer art of the two, for this reason as well as for the simple fact that less severe and less prolonged effort is apparent in the one than in the other; for it seems to me that evidence of labor, so far from giving pleasure—which, under the names of "conscience," etc., it seems to some people to do—is always a terrible drawback to the enjoyment of a work of art.

I hope such considerations as these do not prevent my appreciation of the work of the engraver, and I believe I am not wanting in admiration either for the exquisite skill or the devoted enthusiasm which the best of his class constantly show. I have no doubt that he very often possesses noble powers, both mental and moral, in which many a successful etcher is sadly deficient, or for which he finds little employment; but this does not alter, for a moment, the question concerning the artistic qualities of the two arts.

Among the superb illustrations in The Century magait is no uncommon thing for him to spend years on a single plate. Think of an artist of spirit, and with such splendid powers as many an engraver possesses, being chained to his stool like that, to copy, after all, the work of somebody else! Talk about devotion to art and the beauty of the self-sacrificing spirit! The engraver is your true martyr when he possesses any spirit, or any enthusiasm at all.

Now the peculiar and, indeed, the only distinctive merit of etching is that, while much richer in resources than the crayon or pen and ink, the hand is as free as it is when either of these is employed. Free in the sense of allowing extreme rapidity of execution, as well as in admitting methods of treatment the most varied and original.

"Wherever the Anglo-Saxon race obtains a foothold, there will be horse-racing and portrait-painting," said an acute observer of another day; and wherever the artistic spirit is understood and appreciated, the claims of etching cannot fail to be recognized. By precisely the same rule, the causes of its unpopularity, when it is unpopular, may be understood, too, and prevalent misconceptions concerning it may be shown to be only a part of the prevalent misconceptions concerning art itself. What artist has not been mortified to find what different qualities than those he has striven after, his patron values in his work? What court-painter has not at some time earned his bread rather through the painting of buttons and ribbons than of men and women? Now, steel engraving has one distinguishing merit. No other method is comparable to it for the rendering of subtle gradations of light. Nothing can excel the delicacy of its tones in the hands of a master—a delicacy which makes it possible to imitate with surprising accuracy the daintiest textures. Not even the painter can render with more truthfulness the sheen of satin or the softness of down, the glitter of metal or the tender light of an evening sky. All this is obtained at a considerable sacrifice, it is true—the sacrifice of almost everything that the artist commonly values in the way of individual expression and natural suggestion, but it is obtained all the same, and let due credit be always given for it. The substitution, by the engraver, of mechanical precision and formal arrangement in the lines employed for the freedom and versatility of the etcher's needle, is closely associated with, if it is not in great measure responsible for, two influences which cannot sufficiently be deplored. In the first place—for I think this is the most serious of the two—the neatness and prettiness which the most commonplace steel engraving almost always shows has come to take the place in popular estimation of far more important qualities. So true is this that a work of art, executed in any medium, if it is to become in any sense "popular," must exhibit this flimsy quality, which generally goes by the name of "finish."

It is this childish taste that makes possible the sale of those ridiculous travesties of sculpture with which Italian marble-cutters periodically flood the auction-shops. It is what prevents us from according to water-color, as practiced by the best modern painters, anything like the place to which it is entitled. It is what forces every young painter, who really has to live by his art, to tinker over his work for weeks after he has already done all that he feels is really worth doing, to make it "sell." Many a good picture has been ruined in the process. "I painted it in two days," said one of these men to me of a large landscape, the exhibition of which was regarded as something of an event a few years ago; "but it would never have done to let it go so, and I worked at it two months after that, though I certainly did not improve it at all." I am afraid that to the average patron this two months' work was what commended the picture, however, and that the necessity for it which the painter felt is a pretty constant quantity in the calculations of artists who expect to find purchasers.

Now if this so-called finish meant, as Mr. Ruskin says it ought to mean, "added truth," there would, of course, be nothing but what was eminently desirable in it. I am afraid that it very rarely means anything of the kind; but that, almost without exception, it means only smoothness and neatness, the careful covering of the canvas with pretty color and in such a way that the brush-marks shall not show. What painter does not feel that so far from meaning added truth it usually means the suppression of truth—a toning down of the real facts in consideration of the tastes to which it is addressed, to the end that there may be, as in the court play, "no offense in it?"

Now I believe the reasons that the merits of etching are not more generally appreciated is chiefly owing to this shortcoming of popular standards of judgment in art; and that the reason why good works of this class are not more universally admired is not because they are wanting in the subtle tones of the steel engraving, but because they have not its pretty surface and its air of perfect tidiness. Now it is easy enough for the etcher to obtain a good deal of this neatness if he chooses, as any one knows who has taken the trouble to inform himself how large a part of the steel engraver's work is really etching, or who has ever seen such etchings as, for instance, Mr. Chapman's pictures of the Roman Campagna, which were bitten by the acid in steel; but all is done as cleanly as an engraver would do it, the straight lines being ruled with as much precision as distinguishes the drawings of any architect's apprentice.

I need not remind the reader that it is not for this kind of thing that the etcher cares, and that he would

At the same time it will not be out of place here to remind the stickler for correctness of drawing that he is in some danger of confounding correctness of statement with correctness of impression and ex-pression, even if he does not, as many certainly do, confound beauty of outline with beautiful treatment by lines, and I have no apology to offer for the artist who has never learned how to draw. It is in him the unpardonable sin, for which he should be held to the strictest account, in these days, at least, when good drawing schools are established in almost every city. But really truthful drawing does not consist so much in imitation or definition of actual form as in the power to produce in a work of art the effect which the forms themselves produce in nature; a very different affair, as every artist and every rather not etch at all if his work is not to possess very different qualities from these. But it is not these popular standards of judgment only to which the spirit of the best etching is opposed. It cannot be reconciled to that form of culture which crystallizes into academic formulas. Hence it has been called the "art of the bad draughtsman," and, as Mr. Ruskin himself has styled it, "a bungling art."

To discuss, at anything like the length which its importance demands, the question as to what constitutes good drawing and what does not, is not the purpose, and would far exceed the limits, of this paper. It is, moreover, as I believe, quite unnecessary, at this time, to insist much upon the shortcomings of academical standards of correctness by which the draughtsman's work is apt to be judged, partly because academical training is about the last thing from which art in America seems likely to suffer for many years to come, and partly because I think the academies and even the academicians have received rather more than their share of abuse already.

true connoisseur knows well enough. Now, necessary as it is that the artist should be able, on occasion, to define forms with a precise outline, it must be allowed that he needs to gain this power chiefly that he can afford to do without its exercise, for a hard outline is certainly the rarest thing to appear in nature; and I cannot help thinking that the peculiar charm of the etched line, its melting, tremulous quality, is largely owing to its truthfulness to the appearance of natural forms, the sharpest and most immovable of which have always an element of uncertainty about them, even when seen very near and in the clearest light. Now it is this truth of appearance that the draughtsman is after. No diagrams will answer, however accurate their measurements may be. His art is conventional, of course; all art is conventional, from one end to the other, only his work will be strong if with original power he is not hampered by traditions, but makes the conventionalisms his own.

Mr. Haden certainly goes too far when he says that the engraved line is "without identity," for men of the most original power have often managed to express themselves by means of the burin. Still, whatever the other difficulties which the etcher has to encounter, he is considerably less hampered by traditions than the engraver, and has much more opportunity to invent his own; and if his work is judged in a really catholic spirit—if full allowance is made for personal peculiarities and aims, well as an engraver—the art of etching was brought to a high degree of perfection by Rembrandt and his contemporaries in the first half of the sixteenth century.

Zealous advocates of its merits repel indignantly the suggestion that it is in any sense an "easy" art, but it is evident enough that it is a difficult one only in the sense that all art is difficult and all high accomplishment rare. As far as actual technique is concerned, which the capabilities of his art allow, and even invite him to exercise so freely—I believe the etchers who have made any record at all will be found to hold their own, even if accuracy of draughtsmanship alone is considered, with their brethren of the burin or the brush.

That it is easy enough to fall into slovenly habits is true, of course, but it is the business of the connoisseur to recognize slovenly work wherever he sees it, and there is certainly no need of charging the faults of the artist to the art which he practices.

Invented, for aught we know to the contrary, almost as long ago as engraving—for Dürer was an etcher as there can be little doubt that it was its facility that first recommended it to the painter as a means of disseminating his designs and of enabling him to reach a larger public than was possible with his painted work. The same facility and the fact that everything, even to the printing, could be conveniently done by the artist himself—Rembrandt's printing-press was in a handsome room, which opened out of his parlor—have continued to recommend it ever since to a certain class of genuinely artistic minds; splendidly gifted men who, desiring to have their published works issue fresh from their own hands, have yet been too busy or too impatient to make use of the long and laborious process of engraving.

Such a man was Vandyke, for example, who is believed to have painted a portrait at a single sitting, and who, in etching a hundred of his heads for publication, produced one of the most superb set of works that ever came from the hand of an artist; or Rembrandt, who, besides his many paintings, is credited with having etched three hundred and fifty odd plates, a work in which he not only developed to the fullest the technical resources of the art, but in which he exhibited a conception of art itself and its mission in the world, at once so original and so comprehensive, a humanity so broad and a sentiment so profound, that if a parallel achievement is sought it is only to be found in the thirty-seven plays which Shakspeare produced in the twenty years of his busy life as actor and manager.

Not to mention the contemporaries and immediate successors of these, whose work is only less famous than their own, but whose names it would be out of place to catalogue here, there have been in our own day such men as Meryon—the peer of any in the old or the new times—to whom nature denied, it is true, the gift of color, but whom she fairly overloaded with other gifts until his marvelous drawings were published like Tasso's song, from a mad-house; and Millet, who combined with the finest executive powers, so profound a dislike for the glamor of technique and the conventions of the schools that the simplicity and directness of his work are a constant protest against their misleading graces and hollow charms. It is men like these who have found in etching a means of expression suited to their genius, and whose brilliant performances have added, for all succeeding time, a kind of lustre to the art itself.

This art shares, of course, the limitations of the temperaments to which it commends itself so readily. Its freedom is sometimes caprice, and its simplicity sometimes inclines to meagreness and poverty, while it is not, it must be confessed, itself exempt from certain more or less misleading charms, such as the soft lights and velvety depths of shadow which it owes, perhaps, for the most part to the printer, and which occasionally blind us to the absence of more enduring qualities.

PILOT TOWN, MISSISSIPPI DELTA—PENNELL.

This matter of the printing is indeed one of which a great deal has been made, and to which I cannot help thinking too much importance is apt to attach in the minds of both artists and connoisseurs. Not that I underrate the beauty of effect which the artist often produces on his plate independently of that which the etched lines give. In the monotypes of Mr. Walker, Mr. Bicknell and others, the effects are produced without any etched or engraved lines at all, and the effects so produced are often—those of Mr. Walker especially—simply magnificent. If the etcher will only print his own work, there is no limit to be assigned to the added and varied charm which may be given to his impressions.* Only it seems hardly fair for him to expect the professional printer to do this for his plates, nor to confound the effect which he himself manages to produce on the surface of his copper with the merits of his etching. Of course the etcher has a right to expect something the printer can give it. He is rarely suited, of course, and is fond of asserting that only two or three people in the world are competent to print an etching; this is very sad of course, but as far as I am able to judge, it is something that gives least trouble to those whose work is best worth preserving. There is very little evidence in Rembrandt's work of anything but the simplest kind of printing, and what was good enough for him ought to be good enough for those who are only too glad to sit at his feet and be reckoned his disciples, unless, as I have said, they are willing to do their own printing.

The truth is that Rembrandt managed to leave his plate in such a condition that the ink had to stay where it was wanted. His works are certainly not deficient either in local color or in light and shade, when he is minded to express these qualities. It was not the beauty of his line that first charmed the distinguished when an edition of impressions is taken from his plate that it shall be done by a skillful and intelligent person—and skillful and intelligent persons are none too common in any profession; but there is evidence that he often expects his plate to be artistically printed, that is, he expects the effect to be helped out and added to by critic, Charles Blanc, who has studied so closely and described so well the distinctive merits of the master's work, but "his strange and startling effects and his mysterious tones, the fantastic play of his lights and the silence of his shadows." But it is clear enough from a study of his plates that the effects were produced

* The reader who cares to inform himself concerning the technique of etching and the materials and processes employed, will find pretty much everything that is to be said about the subject in the admirable little "Treatise on Etching," by Monsieur Lalanne, one of the most delightful of modern etchers, as he is perhaps the most successful of teachers. The book has been translated by S. R. Koehler, who has added an introductory chapter and many notes that will be of great value to the American reader, and it is published with the original plates and at a moderate price by Estes & Lauriat, of Boston. As one of the most accomplished of American etchers said to me the other day: "You don't want any other book than Lalanne's to tell you all that can be told about the subject." For the benefit, however, of such of my readers as have not taken the trouble to inform themselves on the subject at all, I may be allowed to describe here so much of the technique of etching as will enable them to understand in what respects it differs from engraving, and in what a different spirit the artist who practices it may be allowed and even expected to work from that which distinguishes the professional engraver. In engraving, the lines are cut in the steel or the wood by a sharp tool, which is grasped firmly and made to cut only by the application of considerable force. The tools used and the methods employed in the engraving of a picture do not differ greatly from those which are employed in the chasing of jewelry or the "marking" of silver. An impression is taken by filling the lines which have been cut in the metal with ink. The surface of the plate is then wiped clean. The plate then presents the appearance of work in black enamel, and it was, indeed, from a piece of ornamental work in this black enamel—or niello, as it was called—that the first engraving was printed, by pure accident it is currently believed, as the freshly-painted inscription on the packing-box is transferred to the trousers of the unsuspecting loungers. The damp paper is laid upon the clean plate, whose lines have been filled with ink, and the whole is submitted to the pressure of the roller-press. The soft paper is pressed into the lines and receives the ink. An etching is printed in the same way, but the lines, instead of being engraved on the metal plate, are bitten (i. e., eaten or etched, vide the dictionary) into it with some strong acid in this way: The plate is covered with a thin coating of wax or soft varnish, that does not become brittle by drying, and which resists the action of the acid. The artist then draws on the plate, which is usually of copper, with a sharp point, like a needle—it is, in fact, very often nothing but a common darning-needle, passed, perhaps, through a bit of cork, and held in a crayon-holder. This point glides freely and easily over the plate in any direction, removing the varnish, or ground as it is called, and exposing the copper. The plate is then immersed in a bath of some strong mordant. Nitric or muriatic acid is commonly used, which eats into the exposed lines, precisely as rust, by a slower process, eats into the iron which is not carefully guarded from its attack. Of course the lines are drawn with one point or with several of different sizes, and are graduated in their depths by carefully-watched and well-timed "bitings," the thick, deep lines being allowed to remain quite a long time in the acid, while the more delicate parts require but a few moments. Sometimes, as I have already shown, they are not bitten in by the acid at all, but are merely scratched in the soft copper with a strong needle. This is "Dry Point."

simply enough by lines in the copper, and that with reasonable care in the press-work the pictures could hardly have printed otherwise than as they did.

I purposely avoid, as much as possible, dwelling upon the technical questions which are here involved. They would hardly interest the general reader, and those who are especially interested have either taken pains to inform themselves on these points already, or may readily do so by consulting works which treat of them in a much more satisfactory manner than is possible within the limits of a brief and general article like this, especially as it is out of the question to give illustrations which should convey any idea of the qualities we are considering. It is, however, impossible to discuss intelligently the merits of the art at all without some little reference to the means by which they are produced.

It is clear enough that Rembrandt allowed himself to be bothered about working with the "pure etched line" much less than a good many of his modern followers have done; he used any kind of line that would serve his purpose and that could be put in the most readily, so that, although there was often an admirable suggestion of shadow in his etched lines, he seems to have depended very much on the dry point when he wanted the shadow itself, as I have explained in the note. The "dry point" is nothing but a needle or some such sharp instrument, with which the bare copper is easily scratched deep enough for all the lines which are needed in drawing flesh, or such other parts as need to be very delicately treated. But it is not only at the light end of the scale that the dry point is available. If it is used in close lines, and the little "bur" which it raises is allowed to remain, it produces the most intense blacks which it is possible to obtain by printing; so that by the use of the dry point alone the depth and the delicacy of a charcoal drawing are obtained readily and at once. Now it was chiefly by this means, or by etched lines so thin and close as to answer the same purpose, in parts which were to be neither so delicately modeled on the one hand, nor so deeply dark on the other, that Rembrandt managed to put his shadows and his lights where they belonged, and where even an ordinary printer could not spoil them. The reader who wishes to see of what exquisite effects the dry point is capable, will find beautiful examples of it in the work of Mr. Hubert Herkomer, who is well represented in the exhibition which is open at present in Philadelphia.

Among modern etchers no one holds a higher place for originality and just appreciation of the distinctive merits of his art, as well as for the splendor of his own executive powers, than Mr. Seymour Haden, who may in some respects be regarded as a leader in the movement of which we are the witnesses, and if one wished to illustrate the versatility of the art he could not, perhaps, do better than to compare the work of this central figure among the etchers of to-day with that of the greatest of the old masters. Instead of the close, fine work in which Rembrandt delighted, Mr. Haden's—the best of it, at least—is frank and open, and into comparatively few lines is compressed the greatest possible amount of expression and animation. Nothing is elaborated or imitative. Everything is full of suggestion; the suggestion of light and of motion—of the everlasting freshness of nature. His landscapes have that delightful quality of impressive restfulness which one receives from nature, but which is rare enough in pictures, however cleverly worked out in parts. In a word, his etchings always have those qualities of largeness and breadth which the painter prizes above almost everything else. In fact, he is throughout an artist for artists; for, although he professes to esteem technical qualities as of less importance than mental grasp, it is evident that the admiration which is unreservedly accorded to him is excited, in great part, by his superb technique which only the artist deeply understands. His work is chiefly in landscape, though he can draw the figure with considerable power when he chooses. For vigor of conception and masterly execution in work demanding the utmost sureness of hand and the confidence that only perfect mastery of his methods can give, such etchings as his "Agamemnon" or his "Calais Pier," after Turner's magnificent picture, are worthy of any man, and are certainly among the most genuine triumphs of modern art.

THE CURSE OF CALGARTH.

BY MARY B. DODGE.

On the northernmost bound of Windermere,
That loveliest gem of the English lakes,
Whose silvery flow in the light wind shakes,
Or mirrors the sky when smooth and clear—
Its floating clouds and its blue wells deep—Here, where the shores fond memories keep
Of more than one Titan of minstrelsy,
Stood the humble home, to its owners dear,
Of Kraster Cook and his Dorothy.

Calgarth was the homely name it wore,
And slenderly noted wears to-day;
For the guide-books lead us another way
Than the road to Calgarth's unfettered door.
'Tis but little of picturesque it owns,
Yet a legend clings to the mossy stones,
As meet for a Southey's pen as much
Of the far-away life of mystic lore
That caught his fancy and warmed his touch.

Close to Calgarth, on Windermere,
Lay a broad estate of wealth begot—
So broad that heaven alone knows what Could have made the covetous master peer
With jealous eye on the farmer's mite;
Yet the riddle is old as our race is, quite,
And the rich Myles Phillipson, Magistrate,
Burdened with acres, sleek with cheer,
For the field of his neighbor lay in wait.

To his every bribe he was answered, "Nay;"
But Myles swore inly he'd have the place,
Be they "live or dead;" and he waxed apace
More kind to its owners day by day.
Thus the days made weeks, and the weeks flew past,
Till the snows of the Yuletide fell at last;
When the 'Squire spread feast for his neighbors all—
For rich and for poor, as was then the way—
And Kraster heeded the friendly call.

Dame Dorothy donned her wedding gown,
In lavender laid so long away;
And Kraster gave to his locks of gray
A brighter gloss as he brushed them down
Straight o'er his forehead, Vandyke style;
Both faces fairer through hope, the while
They rode on one saddle keen to see,
And share the riches of far renown
That smiled in the Phillipson treasury!

The hall was gay in its Christmas dress.
Time flew; yet the wassail-bowl still was sweet;
The smoking odors of wine and meat
Still savored of rollicking happiness;
Still, the tender grace of the mistletoe
Tempted new dancers to and fro,
When a cry was raised for a missing cup—
A cup of gold that was worth no less Than the all of some that were there to sup.

'Twas Kraster Cook who the last was seen
To drink therefrom of the steaming brew;
But that was at midnight; now 'twas two O' the clock, and the honest pair had been Home at Calgarth for an hour in bed—
Resting, as honest folk do, well fed,
Well housed from the cold, and nothing loth
To turn to their life of content again
From a scene of reveling keen to both.

Like the winter night that lies sleeping long,
The farmer, unburthened too, would sleep;
But soon from his slumbers soundly deep
He is roused by a knocking, loud and strong,
On his unlocked door; and by Dorothy Crying, "Gudeman, Kraster, wake and see What means this din in the morning gray—
'Tis strange, indeed, for such noisy throng
To come at all, in the night or day."

Scarce time had the old folks clothes to don Ere the drunken roisterers tumbled in:
Some good men, some of them steeped in sin,
All flushed from 'Squire Phillipson's, bent upon Righting their host if the fact turned up
That Kraster had stolen the golden cup.
Some thought so, some doubted, a search would tell—
To the kitchen, the cupboard—ah! there it shone—
And the shout that rose was a funeral knell.

For the 'Squire was magistrate—that you know;
And you've guessed how the cup in the cupboard came,
Since you cannot forget the 'Squire's one aim
To possess Calgarth—by any means, so
No land of another should bar the clear
Line of his vision to Windermere.
Two innocent victims—what were they?
(Theft was a death-crime long ago)
What, indeed, to his willful way?

Followed a trial—false of course;
Of justice there was not a ray of hope
For the fated pair; while a hempen rope
Swung in the sentence, and no remorse
Softened the magistrate's cruel face.
Sudden, uprose in the prisoner's place
Old Dorothy, bold in her rightful ire;
And the court-room shook with the ominous force
Of the curse she hurled at the 'Squire.

"Fool! vain shalt thou guard thyself! Vain
Shall thy hope be to prosper! thy breed
Shall henceforth be subjects of greed,
And perish of loss and of pain!
Their schemes shall all wither in hand!
Ere long not an inch of the land
Shall be his that a Phillipson owns!
And in wretched Calgarth you never again
Shall be rid of us haunting its stones!"

The 'Squire's beard whitened under the rain
Of Dorothy's withering speech;
Poor Kraster could only a hand outreach
With motions of protest in vain.
His wife, once so timid, was brave of mien,
As though she a vision of grace had seen,
And further cared nothing for breath;
The awe-stricken people to pity were fain,
But a voice muttered, "On to the death."

The curse to the end was fulfilled;
Came repentance, if ever, too late;
Every Phillipson bowed to the fate
That the pride of the Phillipsons willed.
On the shore of the lake yet is told
How the ghosts were ne'er laid till the gold
Of each Phillipson dwindled away;
Nor till all of the race had been stilled
In the silence that deadens decay.

BELINDA.

BY RHODA BROUGHTON.

Author of "Good-by, Sweetheart!" "Red as a Rose is She," etc., etc.

CHAPTER IV.

"In every well-conditioned stripling, as I conjecture, there already blooms a certain prospective Paradise, cheered by some fairest Eve."

PRESENTLY they move, and passing down the slabbed incline, and across the water into the King's garden, tread very slowly the fine gravel of the broad walk, as sentinels on either hand of which stand heaven-high firs, that yet have been clipped out of all fir semblance, and, like their brothers round the Schloss, wear the likeness of yews, cut into such tall, narrow sugar-loafs that their forest kin would disown them. Silently they step along. Perhaps the utter repose, the absence of progress and hurry, the sober stillness of all around, tells sleepily upon their young spirits. Perhaps to them speech is not so easy as it was a month ago. It is Belinda who resumes the conversation.

"I suppose that will devolve upon me after all?" she says with a sigh.

"That what will devolve upon you?" asks Rivers dreamily.

He has forgotten all about Professor Forth, and is lost in a sea of speculation as to whether ever woman in this world had such a short upper lip.

"To tell Professor Forth that I do not think he will be my brother-in-law," she answers, smiling.

"You think that Miss Churchill will shirk it?" absently.

The Professor is still a mist-figure to him. It is her chin now. Was there ever such a ravishing round chin?

"I think so; she generally does."

"Generally!" awaked for a moment from his trance by shocked surprise. "Does it often happen?"

"It was a slip of the tongue," she answers, laughing; "it has happened once or twice before."

"And you?"

The bold wind has loosened a very small strand of her hair, and is blowing it against her cheek. How many years of his life—ten? fifteen? twenty?—would he give to be allowed to replace it behind her ear?

"And I? Oh, I dry the victims' eyes, and tell them that there is as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it."

"And yours?" That little lock is still frolicking distractingly; ought he to tell her of it? "Who dries your victims' eyes?"

"They have not any eyes to dry," she answers precipitately. "I do not mean that they are blind, but that there are no such people—they do not exist."

"You mean, I suppose," he says, reddening, "that I had no business to ask about them?"

"I mean what I say, neither more nor less: they do not exist!"

Her tone is cold and trenchant, as of one who would check a displeasing topic. In point of fact it is intense shyness—the shyness of hearing herself talked about, and talked about by him—that makes it so; but to a listener it has all the effect of a freezing haughtiness, repressing impudent intrusion. She hears it herself with bitterness.

"Is it any wonder that no one has ever loved me?" she says internally.

It is clear that he hears too.

"You are offended," he cries miserably. "I wish to heaven that I had never come to-day! Everything has gone wrong! You let Professor Forth help you out of the carriage! you let him hand you the potatoes—"

She smiles involuntarily.

"On the contrary; he recommended me not to take any; he said they were rancid!"

"You let him pick up your pocket-handkerchief!"

Again she smiles more broadly.

"He certainly did not avail himself of the permission. I think that his knees are scarcely supple enough for him to be very anxious to pick up even Sarah's."

As she speaks she puts up her hand and carelessly pushes back her wandering love-lock; but one little tendril still escapes and frisks in the breeze.

He thrusts his hands hard down into his pockets to resist the intense though monstrous temptation to aid her in its recapture.

"If you knew," he says hurriedly, "what I felt when you drove up to the Gast-hoff to-day; in what an agony of dread lest you should think me presumptuous for having forced myself into your party—lest you should murder me with one of those terrible frozen looks of yours—"

"One of those terrible frozen looks of mine?" repeats she with a puzzled air. "It is very odd! I wonder how I do them?"

"You may think me as great an ass as you please," pursues he rapidly—"and, indeed, you would not be human if you did not—but I give you my word of honor, for the first moment I dared not look. I shut my eyes!"

At this she smiles subtly.

"How, in Heaven's name, have you managed to make me so much afraid of you?" continues the lad, with gathering agitation. "You are never rude; you are not sarcastic; nothing makes you angry; you speak most softly; and yet—"

"And yet," she says, finishing his sentence for him with a rather bitter smile, "and yet you shake in your shoes before me! I know you all do. Ever since I grew up—nay, before; I think that at fourteen I began to inspire dread—I have always been hearing how frightened people are of me. It is so pleasant! No doubt you had been told it before you came to know me, had not you?"

In the eagerness of that query she has stopped and faced him, the color hurrying up to her cheeks, and her eyes fastened in imperative asking on his.

He does not answer for a moment. He is dizzily marveling whether blood of so wondrous a tint had ever flooded lily cheek before. She repeats her question with emphasis:

"Had not you?"

"I—I—had heard that you snubbed people!"

"Have you found it true?" she says, in a low and rather anxious voice. "Have I—have I—" hesitating, "snubbed you?"

To this question she has honestly expected a reply in the negative, and is proportionately startled by the virile energy of the affirmative that instead follows.

"That you have—times out of mind!"

"Have I?" she says, in a key of genuine bewilderment. "How? When? Where? What is it that I do?"

He does not answer.

"Is it," she goes on diffidently, Sarah's dictum as to the one unforgivable sin committable by women against men flashing across her mind, sinister and appropriate, "is it that I make you feel small?"

"Small! Yes," exclaims he, with pungent emphasis; "I should think you did! invisibly, imperceptibly small. But that is not the worst. I was prepared for that. I had heard it was your way!"

She laughs grimly. "What a pleasant way!"

"There are days on which—I do not know how you do it—you made me feel as aloof from you as if—"

"As if what?"

"As if I were I down here, and you were—"

"And I were what?" with an accent of sincere and puzzled curiosity.

"And you were—and you were—one of the heavenly host up there!" ends the young man, baldly and stammering. But love is no brightener of the wits.

"One of the heavenly host?" repeats she, justly infuriated at this stale comparison. "An angel, in short! Must I always be an angel, or goddess? If any one knew how sick I am of being a goddess! I declare I should be thankful to be called a Fury, or even a Ghoul, for a change!"

So saying, she turns her shoulder peevishly to him; and leaving the garden, begins to walk quickly along the road by the water, as fit to make up for her late loitering. He keeps pace with her, dumb in snubbed contrition, stupefied by love, and, unhappily for himself, fully conscious of it: burningly aware of the hopeless flatness of his last simile, and rendered by his situation quite incapable of redeeming it by any brighter sally.

Presently they leave the water and all its rioting wavelets, and pace through the fir-wood toward the little Schloss—the big one's quaint baby-brother.

Beneath the fir-trees the blue hepaticas flower plentiful and late, and the young stitchworts open their fresh eyes to the spring. Regardless of ten-groschen penalties, Belinda leaves the road, and stoops to pick the little blossoms.

Docilely following her motions, he stoops and picks too. He picks to more purpose than she, indeed; for when, by-and-by, they straighten themselves again and compare results, his is by far the largest nosegay.

"Will you take them?" he says, timidly proffering them, for her tart speech has robbed him of his last barleycorn of courage; "or shall I—shall I—carry them for you?"

What would not he carry for her? A newspaper parcel down St. James' Street; a bulging carpet-bag through Rotten Row!

"Thank you, I will carry them myself," she answers, stretching out her pretty, bare hand for them. "They shall make up to me," smiling, "for the gardenias of which I was deprived by—an accident. Do you know that I was not allowed even to smell them? Did I not bear my loss like a Trojan?" Then, hesitating a little, she steps a pace or so nearer to him, and, half-shyly holding out her own little bunch, "Exchange is no robbery," she says with a soft look. "Will you," gently mocking his frightened tone, "will you take them? or shall I—shall I—carry them for you?"

He makes her no answer; he is quite unable. The tears have sprung to his eyes. He is very young, has never loved before; and it seems to him that at that fair hand holding out its little blue bunch, Heaven opens to him.

There are days on which Heaven opens to us all, but to most of us next day it shuts again.

Above them the pines lay their dark heads stilly together against the fair sky, that looks austere, yet not unkind. Here the loud wind is kept at bay, and whispers scarcely more noisily than they themselves are doing in their safe retreat.

With what halting words of lame ecstasy he would have thanked her will never now be known. Dumbly he has received her gift, refraining, by what iron constraint put upon himself, from any least detention of those cool, pale fingers that just unintentionally touch his, and then innocently withdraw. The laboring syllables that are struggling to his lips are forever driven thence by the sound of a high-pitched young voice calling clearly through the still wood:

"Where are you? What has become of you? We have been searching high and low for you! Have you been searching high and low for us? Ah! evidently you have!" laughing ironically. "Well, now you have had the good fortune to find us!"

Ere the end of this sentence, Sarah has frisked up to them, and, for the time, Heaven's door shuts in their faces, and Earth's dull portals reopen for them.

"Are you aware that there is a fine of ten groschen for leaving the road?" calls out the Professor from the distance, but nobody heeds him.

"Are you picking flowers?" asks Sarah demurely. "How nice! Pick me some." Then turning to Rivers, she adds maliciously: "I am not greedy; I shall be quite content with that miserable little bunch that you are clutching so tightly. Give it me!"

But at that he finds his tongue again.

"Not if you were to go down on your knees to me for it!" he cries tragically, lifting his right hand and holding his poor little prize high above her restless, small head.

"Not if I were to go down on my knees?" repeated she in accents of the deepest incredulity. "Come, that is trop fort! It is worth putting to the test!"

As she speaks, she sinks at once upon her knees on the crushed herbage, and joining her hands as in prayer, looks up at him, and says, in a small, childish voice, whose alluring properties she has tested on many a hard-fought field, "Please!"

She might as well have knelt to and allured one of the solemn straight pines. He does not even avert his eyes from her, as though, if he saw her, he must yield. He looks her full in the face and says doggedly:

"Not if you knelt there till the Day of Judgment!"

"What are you about, Sarah?" comes the Professor's voice again, from the road, where the ten-groschen penalty still keeps him. "Are not you aware that although the grass may appear dry on the surface, the ground still contains a great deal of latent moisture!"

But a second time he speaks to the wind.

"Not if I knelt here till the Day of Judgment?" repeats Sarah, still hardly believing her own ears; then wisely taking the only course left open to her, with as good a grace as may be: "If that is the case, of course I will get up again at once!"

So saying she rises, apparently not at all put out of countenance, and flicks the bits of grass from the knees that had bent in vain.

"Do not you wish to see the King's boars fed? I understood you to say that you wished to see the King's boars fed!" shouts the Professor, striking in snappishly the third time, the contumely with which his remarks have been treated beginning to tell very perceptibly upon his tone.

"The King's boars?" repeats Sarah sotto voce, descending to a degrading pun, and accompanying it with a wink that is worthy of it. "Do you think the King has room for one more in his menagerie? if so, I might be permitted to offer him mine! Yes," raising her voice and beginning to trip back toward her betrothed, "of course we are coming!"

She has not gone two steps, however, before she bethinks herself; and turning back, tucks her arm determinately under her sister's.

"Belinda," she says resolutely, "you have not seen the Little Schloss! you have not seen the lighthouse! you have not seen the pheasantries! you shall see the boars!"

So saying she sweeps her off hurriedly ahead; and Rivers, cursing fearfully, is compelled to follow with the Professor, with whom he has about as much in common as a non-reading, hard-rowing, foot-balling, crick-eting undergraduate mostly has with an exceptionally stiff-backed and donnish Don.

Nor is the Professor, whose contempt for undergraduates in general is not to be equaled save by his aversion, very much better pleased with the arrangement.

However, it does not last long. A few minutes of brisk walking brings them to the clear space in mid-wood—the sandy spot railed round with palings where his Majesty of Saxony's pigs have their daily rations dealt out to them.

There the girls sit down on the wooden bench provided for the accommodation of admiring spectators. Many dark forms have already arrived, and are rooting and grubbing hither and thither. They have immensely long noses, long dark hair, large dark ears, hind-quarters that run away like hyenas, and a general air of absurdity and unpiglike pigness. Amongst them are several fierce-looking old gentlemen with their ugly lips lifted over formidable tusks, shaggy as bears, and with their long gray hair wet and shiny, as if they had been rolling in some muddy place. Every moment there is an arrival; a fresh pig, two fresh pigs emerging from the wood and trotting hastily, with ears anxiously erect, to the rendezvous, afraid of having arrived too late.

About the whole family, when united, there is a general unamiability, a spiteful biting and nipping at each other; a squeaking and angrily grunting; a wrathful pursuit and hasty flight. The little piglets, tawny-colored and striped like tiny tigers, toddle sweetly about in their artless babyhood.

Irresistibly attracted by the childlike graces of one of these latter, yet smaller, more striped, weirder than its brethren, Sarah has run after it, and is now scampering in pursuit round the arena.

The Professor, relieved at having found a sandy spot, is standing, stork-like, at a little distance off, poised on one leg, and cautiously seeking for traces of moisture on the sole of the other boot.

Once more Rivers and Belinda are alone.

"I will be the death of her!" says the boy, with an angry smile, shaking his fist in the direction of the sportive Sarah.

But apparently the latter's ears are nearly as long as those of the objects of her chase.

"Whom will you be the death of?" she cries, desisting suddenly. "The mischief is in the pig! I cannot catch it; and I am sure I do not know what I should have done with it if I had! Well," having by this time come up to them again, "of whom will you be the death?"

"Of you," replies the young fellow stoutly, though in his heart he is a little scared at the unexpected distance to which his threat has carried. "Yes, of you," looking full at her with his straightforward, handsome, angry eyes; "at least, if I am not the death of you, as I should like to be, I will be even with you some fine day—see if I am not!"

She looks back at him, coolly pondering, but does not answer. A flash of almost compassionate astonishment is darting across her mind that any man in the possession of sight, health, and vigor—any man, more especially at the most inflammable of all ages, can look at her with the unsimulated indifference, slightly colored with dislike, that this Rivers is doing! At once he rises in her esteem. Turning away, she walks thoughtfully back to the pigs.

By-and-by, as through the long, light evenings the girls bowl smoothly homewards, before the shy white stars look out, Sarah suddenly breaks the silence that, for several quiet miles, has lain upon both.

"Belinda!" she says abruptly; "by all laws, human and divine, that bouquet was yours! The gardenias are now the color of old leather, and smell rather nastily than otherwise; but, such as they are, they are yours!"

And even on these terms, poor Belinda is glad and thankful to have her nose again!

CHAPTER V.

"HE knew whose gentle hand was at the latch
Before the door had given her to his eyes;
And from her chamber window he would catch
Her beauty farther than the falcon spies.
And constant as her vespers would he watch
Because her face was turned to the same skies;
And with sick longing all the night outwear
To hear her morning step upon the stair."

UPON the fair town of Dresden a new morning has opened—opened in sunshine, joy, and lusty growth. For one blossom-bunch that swung fragily on the pear-tree yesterday, there are twenty to-day. The slow small leaves are beginning to break less timorously from their outgrown sheaths.

I do not suppose that Belinda can have grown in the night; but about her, too, this morning there is a look of expansion and spring: as if she too were uncurling her leaves and disclosing her shy buds to her sun.

The two girls are sitting together in the pretty be-hyacinthed, be-china'd, Anglicised salon that looks to the street. The morning sun does not shine on that side of the house, and it makes the room dark; but so it is, that all the blinds are drawn to the bottom; nor does either, as would seem natural, make any attempt to pull them up again.

"So you never did it after all yesterday?" Belinda is saying in a tone of disapproving surprise.

Sarah shakes her head.

"No; Love's chain still binds us!" she answers, making a face.

"You will do it to-day?"

"No!"

"To-morrow?"

"I think not."

"The day after?"

"It is improbable."

"If you are waiting," says Belinda, stopping in mid-row of the stocking she is knitting to look severely at her sister, and speaking with an extremely clear and decided accent, "for me to do it for you, you will wait, as I told you yesterday, a very long time."

"I am aware of it," replies Sarah calmly. "Since I realized that you are engaged in a little pursuit of your own, I have abandoned the idea!"

"Pursuit!" cries Belinda, with a shocked start, and crimsoning. "You are the first person who ever dared to say that I pursued any one!"

"You would have been much pleasanter if you had," rejoins Sarah coolly. "Well, do not let us quarrel over a word! I did not say what part you took in the pursuit—whether you were the hunter, or the hare!"

But Belinda has stooped her angry, blonde head over her stocking, and is speechlessly knitting her resentment into it.

"After all," says Sarah, discourteously jerking the slumbering pug off the sofa, and throwing herself down on it, "it is very unselfish of me; nobody gives me the credit for any virtues, but in point of fact it is almost entirely in your interest that I am acting!" She pauses for a moment, expecting to be asked for an explanation, but Belinda deigns no syllable. "Supposing that I did give my Solomon the sack—by-the-by, what a neat alliteration! Swinburne might have made it," continues Sarah yawning—"what would become of me during all those rural excursions that I see stretching ahead of us in long perspective? We could not let you and young Rivers set off upon them tête-à-tête! we really could not! It would pass even Granny's and my latitude! I search the horizon in vain for a sail!—I mean for any one else to pair off with! My life would be spent in trying to look the other way, and in intercepting fond glances that were not meant for me!"

"And so," says Belinda, lifting a head whose cheeks still blaze, and speaking in a withering voice, "and so he is to wriggle on the hook a little longer? How much longer, pray?"

"How much longer?" repeats Sarah, with a malicious look; "why, you can answer that better than I! As long as young Rivers wriggles on yours?"

Belinda winces.

Who—high-strung and palpitating in young love's first ecstasy—would not wince at such a phrase?

"Come, now," says Sarah, sliding off the sofa again, assuming her cajoling voice, and sitting down on the parquet at her sister's feet, "tell me a little about him! I have confided to you so many touching traits about my beloved, and if you are good I will tell you plenty more; but confidence should be reciprocal: what is he doing here? Why has he come to Dresden?"

"He is learning German," replies Belinda reluctantly.

"H'm! I wonder how much he has learnt?" with a dry laugh.

"His only books were woman's looks,
And folly what they taught him!"

Belinda's sole response to this pleasantry is to push her chair back very decidedly, and isolate her sister on the floor.

"What does he do when he is at home?" continues Sarah, taking no notice of this evidence of displeasure, and obstinately pursuing her catechism.

"He has just left Oxbridge," rather sulkily.

"Where, no doubt, he took several Double Firsts!" with an ironical smile.

"He rowed stroke in the University Eight last year," very precipitately, and reddening under this floor.

"Is he his own father, or has he a father?"

"He has a father."

"And what is the father—what does the father do?"

"I believe—he is in business," grudgingly.

"In business?" with raised eyebrows, and an accent of surprise and dissatisfaction. "Well," more cheerfully, "there is business and business! Have you any idea what sort of business it is?"

"Not the slightest," very curtly.

"It is a liberal age," says Sarah, philosophically, "but one must draw the line somewhere. I draw the line at artificial manure! Come, now, have you any reason for supposing that it is artificial manure?"

Belinda laughs a little, but most unwillingly.

"I dare say it is. I never asked."

"Do you remember," says Sarah, "the little Frenchman, covered with orders—Legions of Honor and Saint Esprits by the gross—that we met at the ball at Cannes, who told me that he was 'dans le commerce,' and when I inquired what branch, and suggested that perhaps he was 'dans les vins?' answered grandiosely, 'Non, mademoiselle; je suis dans les bougies!'"

A pause.

The pug has arisen from the cold parquet, and, with her tail still half-mast high in the enervation of slumber, has stepped delicately on to Sarah, and cast herself, with a deep, slow sigh, upon her warm lap.

"Your friend does not look as if he were 'dans les bougies,'" says Sarah presently, with an air of thoughtful generosity; "still less dans le—I declare, I do not know what is French for artificial manure! How Granny has neglected our educations!"

But Belinda is not attending. Belinda's head is raised, and upon her face has come a look of blissful listening. Her fine ear has detected a footfall in the ante-room outside—a footfall that not even Slutty, the pug, has yet suspected; a step that she has discriminated from that of the flat foot of Gustel.

"It is you, is it?" says Sarah, in a not particularly exhilarated voice, scrambling to her feet as Rivers, ushered in by an infant English page, who divides the cares of the ménage with Gustel, enters.

She gives him two contemptuous fingers.

Of what use to give more to a man who holds them as if they were a bundle of sticks. She might have given him ten, or twenty, or none, for all he knows. His eyes have strayed away over her, to him, totally irrelevant head, and have fastened on his mistress, asking eagerly if this can indeed be she, alive and real, whom all night long he has pursued through his radiant dreams.

"Perhaps you can help us," says Sarah, with an innocent look. "We have just been wondering what the French for artificial manure is?"

He does not hear. Belinda's hand in his is making summer in his veins, and his happy eyes are drowned in hers as happy. But Belinda hears.

"Sarah is speaking to you!" she says low and hurriedly.

He turns round reluctantly with a start.

"I beg your pardon! I—I—did not quite catch what you were saying."

"I was only asking you if you knew the French for artificial manure?" she answers demurely.

"For artificial manure!" repeats he, astounded. "Of course I do not! Why should I? Why do you want to know what is the French for artificial manure? Is it a riddle?"

Even for his explanation he has turned again to Belinda, as inevitably as the sunflower to the sun.

"We were only talking of—of—agriculture; were not we, Belinda?" replies the other, smiling malevolently at her sister's obvious, and to Rivers' incomprehensible, discomfiture.

That his Egeria could look foolish, as she is indisputably doing, would never, indeed, occur to him; but nothing short of total blindness could prevent his seeing the sudden cascade of scarlet which has poured over her. For one instant, indeed, the blest idea has darted across his mind that this lovely flag may be hung out for him; but his humility—for real love is ever most humble—at once dismisses the scarcely-formed thought as too good to be true.

Perhaps it is his scrutiny, silent and intense, that embarrasses her. Of course he ought to say something. On a morning visit one must say something.

"Why are you sitting in the dark?" he asks, glancing at the carefully drawn-down blinds. "The sun is not on this side of the house, and there is no glare anywhere to-day!"

"It is very gloomy, is not it?" replies Belinda, who is slowly recovering her countenance; "and we are so fond of light and air, too. But it cannot be helped; we are obliged to have them down because of Miss Watson."

"Because of Miss Watson? I do not understand."

"She lives on the other side of the street, a little farther down, and she has lately set up a spy-glass or telescope of some kind in her window, with which she rakes us fore and aft. She told us triumphantly on Tuesday that she could see everything we did! I believe that she can tell by the movement of our lips what we are saying!"

"If I thought so," said Sarah viciously, "what things I would say about her!"

"It will end in our being forced to leave the apartment," says Belinda with a shrug. "A friend of ours was. She has now taken one that looks upon a blank wall as being her only real security."

"Miss Watson combines all the worst qualities of the gnat and the rhinoceros," says Sarah gravely; "but I think her most offensive trait—though, indeed, among so many it is invidious to give the preference to any one—is her continual persecution of us to go on expeditions with her."

"Then I am afraid that you will look upon me as a second Miss Watson," says Rivers bluntly, and coloring, as he delivers himself with untold difficulty of his simple errand; "for that is exactly what I came here this morning to do!"

"Another expedition?" cries Sarah, in a tone of anything but gratification. "Why, it seems as if we had not been back five minutes from the last!"

"It would evidently be an empty civility to ask whether you enjoyed it!" says Rivers with a rather mortified laugh. "And you?"—the sunflower turning again greedily to its sun.

"I was not bored," answers Belinda in a constrained voice. "I enjoy expeditions! I like Moritzburg."

This is all that she has to say about the hours that had made him sick with desire in anticipation, stammering with bliss in fruition, drunk with joy in retrospect!

He looks at her with an intense wistfulness that is almost incredulity; but she gives him back no glance. How can she, knowing, as she does by long experience, that Sarah has eyes in the back of her head? Sarah, who is ostensibly, and as he in the innocence of his heart believes really, entirely absorbed in making Sluttly miserable, by affecting to suppose that she looks faint and holding smelling-salts to her outraged nose.

"I thought," he says in a chapfallen voice, "that it would not be a bad day for Wesenstein; or, if you liked that better, Tharandt."

"You really must be related to Miss Watson!" cries Sarah, bursting out laughing. "Wesenstein! Tharandt! Those are her two chevaux de bataille. If we do not go to Wesenstein we must go to Tharandt; and if we do not go to Tharandt we must go to Wesenstein! Good heavens!" suddenly stopping in mid-laugh; "Unberufen! I hear her on the stairs! Hers is the only voice that one can hear through the double doors."

"She has come to make us go to Wesenstein with her!" says Belinda in a low key of consternation.

"It is the finger of Providence!" cries Sarah, resuming her merriment. "Mr. Rivers, you want to go to Wesenstein. She wants to go to Wesenstein! Why should not you go together? I will arrange it for you!"

"If you do," says the young man, stepping threateningly toward her, and speaking in a tone of the most genuine alarm and exasperation, "I'll—"

"You will be the death of me!" interrupts Sarah pertly, finishing his sentence for him. "I know. So you said yesterday. I wish you would invent a new threat."

For a moment they all listen silently.

"I believe it was a false alarm," says Belinda, drawing a long breath.

"No, it was not!" rejoins Sarah, shaking her head. "There is no mistaking that bison's voice. She is only stopping on the stairs to ask Tommy what wages he has, and whether Granny gives him enough to eat!"

THE ROBBER.

My life had been broken and entered, and theft
Committed 'gainst me;
Peace and rest had been stolen. The single clew left
Was a memory.

That life was so bare; rest gone; nought but grief
By the hearth,
That I took the sweet memory, and searched for the thief
Through the earth.

I knew her again by the peace and the rest
That returned unto me;
But when the lost gems were restored to my breast,
She did not go free;

For, by strongest of fetters, the thief I have bound
And imprisoned for life:
I guard in my heart with the treasures I found—
My robber, my wife.

CHAPTER XXX.

A GOOD INVESTMENT.

A GROAN that was heard above the roar of the flames burst from the crowd who were watching the conflagration. The last faint ray of hope had disappeared. Up to that moment it had seemed possible to prevent the spread of the flames. The factory that was already half-consumed was farther removed from the other buildings of the town than any of the others, because of the open square in front of it. It is true that the wind drove the fire directly toward the corner of a block, but the street with the overflowing race was between them, and it was believed that with the most strenuous exertions it might be saved. For this Harrison Kortright had abundantly provided, and for a quarter of an hour—an interval that seems nothing less than an age at such a time—the efforts of all had been directed to that end. Smith's factory, however, which was now on fire, owing to a bend in the stream which was followed by the street, was thrust like a wedge into the most thickly-built portion of the town. Its lower end, with hardly the interval of a yard, overlapped for half its width another monster mill, whose destruction was inevitable if the flames consumed the one they had now attacked. Along the whole front of these, dwellings and business houses were thickly built just beyond the narrow street. These the demoralized crowd were about to attack in the hope of saving whatever could be borne away. Already they had begun to break open the doors and windows, when the voice of Harrison Kortright was heard exclaiming:

"I want fifty good men to help me save Skendoah. Every man who is willing to obey me, step forward!"

More than a hundred were about him in an instant. He sprang upon a box, which had been carried half across the street and abandoned, so that he might be the better heard.

"Gentlemen, if you will follow my directions, I will save the town."

There was an incredulous silence.

"I see you do not believe me. You did not believe me when I set out to build the town, either."

There were cries of "That's so!" "Go on!" "Hurrah for 'Squire Kortright!" It was a vote of confidence—elliptical but sincere. The man who had created the town out of nothing might surely be trusted to save it if possible. The crowd gathered closer and listened attentively.

"I am not surprised that you hardly believe it, but I mean what I say. You all know me, and you know I am not accustomed to give fancy prices for anything. Isn't that so?"

"That's truth. No doubt of that!"

"Well, I've just invested a little more in Skendoah property. You know I sold Smith his water-right and land a few years ago for three thousand dollars. Well, I've just bought it back for ten."

"Ah, the devil! It'll be many a long day afore ye'll see the money back, I'm thinkin'," said a quick-witted Irishman.

"I never shall see it back unless we save the town, and we can do that if every man will act as I direct. Will you do it?"

"Aye! Aye!"

"Then we must organize. I will name a few whom all must obey. As I call their names, let them come forward and receive orders."

He glanced sharply over the crowd, and by the light of the fire quickly selected his lieutenants. As they came up he gave one after another his instructions, and the crowd was soon dispersed to their execution, except half a dozen who remained grouped around their gray-haired leader. It was evident at once that the confidence which had been expressed by those about him was shared by all to whom Kortright's determination was conveyed. The panic was quickly suppressed, and the crowd quietly urged back by those whom he had detailed for that purpose. Then he spoke a few words to the men who remained, laying his hand impressively upon the shoulder of the man he had chosen to be their leader.

"I know," said he, "that it is a dangerous duty, and I have selected you men because I know you will not flinch. If you succeed, the town is safe. If not, Harrison Kortright will be with you. I never ask a man to do what I would shrink from myself."

"We'll 'tend to it, boss; you never mind," said one.

"No," said Kortright, decidedly. "You bring it here and I will do the rest. Remember, you have promised to obey."

"Yes, but—"

"Make haste! There is not a minute to lose!"

He waved his hand imperiously and the men started off at a run.

Dawson Fox stepped forward and took Kortright's hand. He had heard every word.

"Let me do this," he said, looking up into the other's face.

"You cannot," decidedly.

"But I—"

"You know nothing of the premises. The man who is to do that must have every foot of that mill as clear in his mind as that fire is in your eye."

"Then I think I ought to be the man," said the recent owner hesitatingly.

He had stood by and heard the plan which Kortright had devised. The firelight shone on his face. It was pale, but his lips were shut tightly and his voice was steady.

Kortright gave him his hand.

"You are a young man, Smith, with a young family. Besides," with a smile, "it is my mill, you know. By the way, Fox, you will remember if anything happens to me that I owe Sejanus Smith ten thousand dollars."

"And what shall I do?" asked Smith, huskily. There must be something—

"Yes, certainly. Get your men ready and some of Tanner's, and, as soon as it is over, cover the gable of Tanner's mill with wet blankets and throw up an embankment at the lower end of your mill. It would be a good thing if you could dam the race, too."

"All right," said Smith, as he started off. "It shall be done!"

"And I," said Dawson Fox, looking reverently upon the white-faced man who stepped down from the box and glanced sharply round at the flames, "What shall I do?"

Harrison Kortright looked swiftly up and down the flame-lit street before he answered. The engine had been driven from the race by the heat and was now plying from some well or cistern on the exposed corner. Men were on the roofs along the whole row of buildings, supplied with buckets, to put out the coals and cinders that might fall upon the shingle roofs. Others patrolled the street similarly equipped and watched the fronts of the buildings. The crowd had disappeared. Kortright's eyes beamed with satisfaction as he saw how readily his instructions had been carried out. At the entrance to an alley almost opposite he saw his wife watching him with a countenance full of anxiety.

"What can I do?" repeated Dawson Fox.

"You," said Kortright, solemnly, "You will look after Mattie!" His lip quivered and the clasp of his hand was like a vise, but his voice was firm.

"But I would rather—"

"You cannot do what is to be done. If you stay with me she will be alone. If you are with her I know she will be safe."

Dawson Fox bowed, wrung his hand and turned away just as the men who had been sent away returned bearing between them through the heated street a number of casks, each of which was marked:

"Powder."

Placing himself at the head of these men Kortright crossed the race and entered the building he had so recently purchased, the upper end of which was already aflame, while the heated currents of smoke rolled through the upper stories, scorching and searing like the blast of a furnace. Dawson Fox re-crossed the street and took his place by the side of Mrs. Kortright in the shadow of a brick building where she stood. An instant afterward all but one of the men returned, and, running up and down the street, cautioned every one to retire to a place of safety. After a moment Harrison Kortright and the foreman of the mill, who had remained with him, came out, and seeing that all were out of danger, the former, after some protestation on the part of his companion, went again into the mill. The foreman stepped nervously toward the narrow foot-bridge that crossed the race. The shouting was hushed. Only the sound of the flames was heard, and the roar of rushing waters. Around every corner peered an anxious face. Presently Harrison Kortright rushed out through smoke that was now pouring from every door and window. He staggered, half-blinded, toward the foot-bridge. Seeing the foreman waiting there he cried out:

"Run! Run! It is all right."

The man turned and fled. Harrison Kortright rushed upon the bridge as fast as his lameness would permit. Half-way across he turned as if to see that the train he had lighted was burning properly. As he did so his foot fell upon the end of a loose board; the other end flew up, and in an instant he was struggling in the water. As he fell a shadow darted out of the shaded alley opposite, and the lookers-on saw Dawson Fox fly across the street toward him. Just as he reached the bank of the race there was a dull roar that was heard above the tumult of the waters and the rush of the flame that towered above the doomed building. Then the walls of the lower factory trembled. The whole structure seemed to be lifted up. The blazing gable was thrown back upon the pile from which it had caught the flame. The windows bulged outward. The roof parted at the ridge-pole, and then fell inwards. A vast cloud of black smoke and dust shut out the whole from sight, and shot upward against the white, fleecy clouds that just then had opened around the cold, full moon. Then there was another and a sharper explosion. The earth shook with the force of the concussion. A thousand pounds of powder had been exploded beneath the mill. The vast pile rose and crumbled. A bright flash shot upward from the centre. Then the whole sank down into a shapeless mass. The air seemed full of broken fragments. Pieces of the shattered building rattled like hail upon the roofs of the houses opposite. Mrs. Kortright started to rush to her husband through the shower of fragments. A strong arm held her back.

"It's no use, Mrs. Kortright," said Smith, as he refused to release her. "You cannot help them. The water is not deep. If your husband is not hit with the falling pieces he is safe."

A moment after a hundred feet were hurrying to the place where Kortright had disappeared. Dawson Fox had halted for an instant when the explosion had occurred, and then had leaped into the race. Those who came to the rescue saw a man struggling in the water. A dozen hands seized him and drew him forth. Strangled, gasping, dripping, they bore him to the middle of the street. The light of the burning mill fell on the white, drawn face of Harrison Kortright. For a moment all else was forgotten. Mrs. Kortright sat in the dusty roadway with his head upon her lap. The crowd rushed forth from their hiding places and pressed around with anxious faces. Some one brought a torch of blazing fragments and held it near him. All else was forgotten in the danger of the founder and benefactor of the town. The village doctor made a hasty examination. The patient lay pallid and gasping. A thousand suggestions were made. His breathing grew stronger and more regular. The richly-dressed woman wiped his face with her white handkerchief, and held him tightly to her breast. Presently he opened his eyes and tried to speak. The physician rose and said cheerfully:

"He is not hurt; only strangled and confused."

Then there was a shout. They took him in their arms to bear him to a place of comfort and shelter. He shook himself loose; sat up; gazed wildly about, and chokingly exclaimed:

"Fox! Fox! where is he!"

Where, indeed! In their anxiety for their friend and neighbor they had forgotten the stranger.

Instant search was made, and from the swollen race was soon dragged forth another form. This one was silent and limp. No stertorous gasp gave promise of life. When his face was turned toward the fire-light a deep red gash showed upon the temple, and the hands of those who held his head were deeply stained with blood. The physician placed his thumb upon the wound and felt a harsh, dull grating answer to his pressure. He shook his head hopelessly, and wiped the blood from his hand. Dawson Fox was dead. A fragment of the building had struck him as he stood over the man he sought to rescue. He had saved the husband of his boy-love by yielding up his own life instead. There were many tearful eyes that marked a sad, sweet smile upon the cold dead face as it lay there in the dusty roadway lighted by the raging fire.

Harrison Kortright heard the sad tidings and offered no more resistance to those who would bear him away. He realized as no one else could the sacrifice that had been made for him. He remembered the brave, set face lighted by the lurid glow of the explosion, that for a moment hung over him. He remembered the strong arms that for an instant clasped him close, held him above the strangling current and then relaxed their hold, tremulous and weak, while he who had come to rescue fell prone across his breast and bore him again beneath the water.

As the crowd started on along a narrow street that led up the hill-side from the bank of the stream with their sad burden, there came a cry from those whom Smith had rallied to protect the mill below:

"The water is rising! The bridge has gone!"

At the same time the flame that was springing up in the debris of the explosion began to hiss and splutter.

"The sluice-gates are open," said Kortright feebly. "It is all right. The channel is too narrow and the water will back up so as to overflow the lower story. Thank God! the town is safe."

He was right. The long unused channel of the mountain torrent had been so obstructed by walls and piers that when the tide poured out of the sluice-gates there was not space for it to flow off, and it had choked and fouled until it overspread its banks and poured into the lower story of the mills that lined them. By this means the fire was prevented from spreading, and Skendoah was saved from a disaster which for a time seemed to be unavoidable. Yet the tale of destruction was not yet ended. As they bore the living and the dead up the hill to the shelter of a friendly house some one uttered an exclamation which caused all to look around. Upon the dark hill-side beyond, the roaring torrent that boiled between, a sheet of yellow flame shot up, lighting the whole surrounding region. Mrs. Kortright saw at a glance what it meant.

"Move on, move on!" she cried lustily to those who bore her husband. She dreaded, above all things, lest his dull eyes should learn the truth. Paradise Bay was wrapped in flame.

NIGHTFALL.

I stood on the hill as the sun went down,
Flooding with glory the cloudland West,
While lengthening shadows crept over the town,
And night descended with peace and rest.

Soft tinges of violet, crimson and gold
Crowned the far hill-tops, then faded away,
And the sentinel ranges of years untold,
Were wrapped in a mantle of sombre gray.

The wearying hum of the spindle and reel
Below in the village at last was still;
And down in its dungeon the water-wheel
Slumbered under the silent mill.

And I heard the sounds that the twilight brings—
The myriad voices of eventide;
The chirping of crickets, the rustling wings
Of insects fluttering far and wide.

A cloudlike mist from the shadowed stream
Sailed over the lowlands of grass and grain.
And shapes grotesque in the moon's weird gleam
Moved to and fro in a mystic train.

I heard the cry of the bird of night—
A flute-note sadder than words can tell—
And a clear, low voice—did I hear aright?
Or was it only a strange, sweet spell?—

An influence born of the scene and hour—
That wakened remembrance from her sleep?
Perhaps, high up in the tree-top tower,
Among the boughs where the south winds sweep,

Some marvelous harp, by the breeze caressed,
Answered and echoed the low refrain,
While darkness shadowed the hills of the West,
And night, incarnate, came down again.

For the beautiful singer who sang the song—
The beautiful one with the brave, sweet eyes—
In dreamless slumber, the whole year long,
Through all the day and the darkness lies.

THE HOUSEHOLD—THE WATER SUPPLY.

THE reader of scientific journals and periodicals needs no persuasion to make him admit with the greatest alacrity that his neighbor's well is undoubtedly poisoned by defective drainage. His own, he claims, is necessarily all right, and argument on that point an impertinence and superfluity. If the well-informed are so curiously sensitive, it is not at all surprising that the ill, or not-at-all-informed, resent as a personal insult any hint that their water supply is not of the purest.

It is certainly in order here to ask what is the purest, and this has already been done by one or two correspondents. Rain water, collected in clean, open vessels, as it falls, is the nearest approximation to the chemical formula, eight-ninths of oxygen and one-ninth of hydrogen, the latter gas having, like oxygen, where both are pure, neither taste nor smell. But such rain water, though the very type of purity, requires, like people, a slight admixture of earthiness to make it really likable. This earthiness, however, must not be dirtiness, and as such water runs usually over dusty roofs and through tin or wooden leaders of uncertain age, but very certain dirtiness, it reaches the cistern or other reservoir loaded with soot, dust and any other impurity found on the way.

A filter thus becomes necessary, no matter for what use the water is intended, and this is made in several ways. Some cisterns are simply divided into two parts, the water being received on one side and filtering slowly through the dividing wall of porous brick, considered by many practical engineers as a sufficiently efficient filter. Another method is to build a circular brick cistern, cemented inside and domed over. In the centre a square shaft about two feet by two is built the whole height of the cistern, and in brick closely jointed in cement. Into this shaft the water is carried and filtered through the brick, as in the first plan mentioned. In other cases a much more elaborate one is used, divided into upper and under parts, the upper one holding the usual arrangement of iron, charcoal, sponge and sand or gravel.

Whatever the form adopted, one rule is imperative for all. Never allow the overflow-pipe to be connected with any other drain whatever, as a siphonage may take place that will fill the upper part of the cistern with foul air, which will escape as it can, often by one of the leaders from the roof, which, if near a bed-room window, will fill the room at night with poisonous gas, and in due course of time insure the carrying off of the inmate of that room, if not by diphtheria, then by typhus or typhoid, all of them most mysterious and sad dispensations of—not the Lord, but men.

With a free current of air passing over rain water it gains sparkle and flavor, but is, on the whole, excessively flat and to most people unpleasant, having none of the earthy salts and the carbonic acid gas found in good spring or river water, which is really a far more satisfactory and, if filtered, quite as healthful a drink.

Whether well or cistern water be used, or that of rivers, which of course requires a system of pipes as leaders, no impurity that we can guard against should be allowed to enter it. A shallow well fed by surface springs will necessarily hold all the impurities of the soil, and so to dig deep is the first essential of all wells.

"A well," says Dr. Parker, of England, in one of his papers on "Practical Hygiene," "drains an extent of ground about it in the shape of an inverted cone, which is in proportion to its own depth and the looseness of the soil. In very loose soils, a well of sixty or eighty feet will drain a large area, as much as two hundred feet in diameter or even more; but the exact amount is not, as far as I know, precisely determined.

"As there is now no doubt that typhoid fever, cholera and dysentery may be caused by water rendered impure by the evacuations passed in these diseases, and as simple diarrhea seems also to be largely caused by animal organic matter in suspension or solution, it is evident how necessary it is to be quick-sighted in regard to the possible impurity of water from incidental causes of this kind. Therefore all tanks and cisterns should be inspected regularly, and any accidental source of impurity must be looked out for. Wells should be covered; a guard put round to prevent substances from being washed down; the distances from cesspools and dung-heaps should be carefully noted; no sewer should be allowed to pass near a well. The same precautions should be taken with springs. In the case of rivers we must consider if contamination can result from the discharge of fecal matter, trade refuse, etc."

As a matter of fact, such precautions are, nine times out of ten, disregarded. In many a New England and Middle States farm-house may be found this state of things: First, a well dug near the kitchen door and between kitchen and barn. Second, an open drain leading from the kitchen sink, pouring out all the dirty water of washing day and every other day, which sinks in the ground about and becomes one feeder of the waiting well. Even when the drain is nominally closed and out of sight, it is not an earthen or iron pipe, but simply a wooden conductor, parting with its contents at every joint. But for not only New England, but South and West as well, the open drain is the general rule. Such drain having contributed its share toward the family water supply, the manure pile in the barn-yard sends its quota, not at once, but gradually soaking through and infiltrating the ground; and last and worst, the privies in the same manner finish the work. And the most startling of all these most disagreeable and unsavory facts is that with every one of these conditions in existence, the water may be unchanged in odor or taste; may even be especially sparkling and delightful, this having been proved in various well known cases too long to cite here. With the result we shall have to deal again.

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

"Does the color of the glass bottles or cans in which liquids are kept have any influence upon them, and in what degree?"

J. B. S., Newark, N. J.

In an article published in one of the German scientific journals on the effect of the color of glass bottles on the liquid contained in them, some interesting facts are stated. It appears from this that liquors contained in colorless bottles, when exposed for some time to the light, acquire a disagreeable taste, notwithstanding the fact that they may have been of superior quality before being so treated; liquors contained in brown or green bottles, however, remain unchanged in quality, even if exposed to direct sunlight. Since, then, the results in question are due to the chemical action of light, it follows that red, orange, yellow, green or opaque bottles are essential to the preservation of liquors, while colorless, blue and violet ones are to be discarded.

"We are going to Florida for the winter and want a rule for preserving sweet oranges. Have you any one can trust?"

A. V. W.

Here is one which has never yet failed to satisfy: Cut or grate off the yellow outside rind of the oranges and squeeze out most of the juice and seeds; leave in the pulp. To a dozen (ripe) oranges put a handful of salt scattered over them in a dish; let them lie in it from afternoon till next morning. Wash that off well; then let them lie three hours in alum-water, made in the proportion of a gallon of water and a piece of alum size of a hickory-nut; this brings them into good shape. Then dip them into clear water and weigh them. Make a syrup with three-quarters of their weight in sugar, and boil and simmer them five hours; add the juice which was squeezed out. They will come out white, tender and delicious.

HELEN CAMPBELL.

THE advantages of an alliance between the Civil Service Reformers and the Democracy are very forcibly shown in recent Congressional action. By means of this alliance the Democracy secured the executive control of a half dozen of the most important states of the North and an overwhelming majority in Congress at the late election. The avowed purpose of the alliance was to promote civil service reform. The result of it has been to demonstrate that the most active and determined opponents of any movement that tends to limit official patronage are to be found in the Democratic party. The course of its representative men in Congress has not only disclosed this fact but it has also shown what should have been apparent from the first, the futility of all hope of reform from a party constituted as that is. The Bourbons of the South are by training and inheritance political traders. They instinctively fight for success, and success means to them the right to rule and to enjoy the perquisites of victory. They constitute two-thirds of the Democratic electoral strength. The most trustworthy portion of the other one-third is to be found in that part of the population of the great cities of the North who are the faithful and abject followers of the "bosses." The big end of Democratic strength at the North is made up of men like those who mourn "the good old times" of Tweed and his "Ring" in New York. Should the party cut away from these two elements it would be more of a skeleton organization than our army at its meanest estate. Speaking through their representatives in the Senate, both these elements have boldly declared their hostility to the peculiar dogma of their astute allies. The result is evident even to the dullest mind. The success of the Democratic party in 1884 has been rendered all but certain by this alliance; and when it is remembered that no sort of Congressional action can in any manner limit the discretion of the President in making appointments to office, unless he shall elect to be bound thereby, it will be seen that the immediate effect of the treaty between these two peculiarly discordant elements is to defer all practical advancement in this direction until the close of the period of Democratic ascendancy which it makes probable.

THE "Stone Age," the "Age of Brass," the "Iron Age," the "Golden Age"—all these have a certain euphonic ring when spoken, and convey a distinct idea when they are printed; but who can hope to round a period or construct a well-cadenced sentence or work into passable poetry such a word as "alum," or its more scientific form "aluminium"? "The Age of Alum" neither looks nor sounds especially inspiring. It irresistibly suggests the little ten-cent packages sold by druggists to mammas with cankerous children. There is certainly nothing grand about it, and yet the indications are that we are on the august threshold of An Age of Alum! Next to the omnipresent silica alum forms in combination with other constituents perhaps the most abundant element of known geological strata. It exists in all the clay formations, is far more abundant than iron, and is therefore cheaper if we can get at it. In its metallic form, aluminium, it is not much heavier than the hard woods, but is as strong as steel. It can be hammered, or spun from sheets, or drawn out into wire or tubing. Rust does not corrupt it, nor is it chemically affected by heat or cold. In spite, however, of the prodigal fashion in which nature has scattered this valuable metal about, she has hitherto kept safe the secret of its reduction to commercial uses, although metallurgists have for years been working and experimenting to wrest the secret from its keeper. Progress has been slow, and, though the methods of manufacture have been greatly simplified, the cost of aluminium still remains at fifty cents to a dollar an ounce, which, of course, forbids its use in most of the thousand ways for which it seems so admirably adapted. The announcement that a process for its cheap production has been discovered in England, while as yet lacking detailed confirmation, comes from a quarter which justifies its acceptance with a degree of faith. Should it prove to be true the discovery may well take rank with the greatest of the age, or indeed of any age. Should the substance approximate in cheapness to iron it would at once take the place of that metal wherever lightness and strength are required. Bridges, truss-work of all descriptions, many kinds and parts of machinery, ships and buildings would be largely constructed of aluminium, which, owing to its non-rusting properties, its great tensile strength, its beautiful surface, and its lightness, is greatly to be preferred to iron or steel. A very important consideration in regard to this metal is its relation to the possibilities of aerial navigation. The one insurmountable difficulty in the way of setting has thus far been the impossibility of combining lightness and strength in the motive power. This lack aluminium, if cheap, would very probably supply, and in combination with some of the improved electric motors might lead the way to human exploration in the fields of air.

". . . the nation's airy navies Grappling in the central blue"

"THE gentleman whose funeral we have just attended was a sweet and beautiful soul—but I have forgotten his name." So said Emerson with the frankness of second childhood, just after his friend Longfellow had been laid in the grave—Emerson, the poet's poet, great thinker and scholar, already enfeebled by age, his memory gone, and himself soon to follow to the land of the immortals. Very suggestive are the words. The name which every lover of a pure literature hopes will be gratefully cherished while time endures, had already gone from his recollection, but the impression of the man's character remained—Emerson still remembered his "sweet and beautiful soul." It is thus that the soul of a man is more than any outward symbol of him. His name may perish from the earth, but the character endures; the influence which he has exerted he leaves behind him as a subtle force, to do its work for good or ill through all time. If Longfellow should be forgotten; if his name should be obliterated from every book, from every portrait of his noble face and form, from every place with which it is now associated, even from the memorial shaft that is to rise above his grave; it is not possible that "his sweet and beautiful soul" can cease to bless the world. Love will always have sweeter expression because he has lived; home will be a more delightful name for the tender thoughts with which he has beautified it; life will be nobler, fuller, more expressive, more significant, grander in its possibilities and in its destiny, because of the life he has lived. If that age ever comes to the world when the name of Longfellow is known no more to men, there will even then be those who, still feeling the inspiration of his thoughts, and catching the echoes of his songs, will know and say that in his time there must have lived such an one as he was. His name they may not know, perhaps never discover it, but that he was "a sweet and beautiful soul" they will declare, as did the aged philosopher who had forgotten his name before the turf was laid above his resting place.

A FRIEND who sends us a club of thirty-three new subscribers remarks: "I made it up in a little better than three hours. I found that all that was needed to get subscribers for THE CONTINENT was to bring it to the notice of my friends and business acquaintances." He has hit the nail upon the head—a little friendly exertion on the part of our readers is worth more than all other agencies combined to promote the circulation of such a publication as this.

WE beg leave to invite the attention of our readers to the announcement on our second cover page of "THE HOUSEKEEPER'S YEAR BOOK." This volume, which is obtainable only by subscription to THE CONTINENT, is entirely unique in design. It comprises a housekeeper's account-book—weekly memoranda of needed work, hints for every season, timely marketing, and a menu for each week, with many other valuable suggestions. The purpose of the volume is to assist every housekeeper in lightening and systematizing her yearly routine of labor and responsibility. The system of accounting is peculiarly simple, and the insertion of two flexible slate pages for transient memoranda makes it an indispensable companion to the careful housewife. It is prepared with the utmost care by Mrs. Helen Campbell, the accomplished editor of our Household Department and author of "The Easiest Way in Housekeeping and Cooking." Every formula and receipt given in its pages may be relied upon with absolute certainty, having been fully tested and approved by the most competent authority. Having demonstrated that the easiest way is the best, Mrs. Campbell, in this little cadecumecum, has shown how to reach the easiest way. Every new subscriber for one year to THE CONTINENT and every subscriber sending us a new yearly subscriber, is entitled to one of these manuals. Club subscribers are included in this offer, as also subscribers through agents, but subscribers who select other premiums will not be entitled to receive this one.

It is only a very few years since the art of etching gained a foothold among Americans, and even now there are thousands who know it only as a not altogether admirable species of engraving. To such the first part of Mr. Miller's "Art for Enthusiasts," published in this number of THE CONTINENT, will convey a great deal of fresh information and suggestion. For the illustrations of this article we are indebted to many of the artists who contribute to the present exhibition of etchings, and desire to express our obligations also to Mr. James L. Claghorn, of Philadelphia, who has kindly lent us for reproduction in these pages a number of valuable etchings from his private collection, well known for its completeness in this department and for the rarity and beauty of particular examples. The article will be concluded in the next number of THE CONTINENT, including in the two installments more than a score of etchings from the best work of this and other lands.

BIOGRAPHY is so likely to be one-sided and untrustworthy in its presentments, that one turns naturally to the letters on the subject with a feeling that in them, if anywhere, the real person will stand revealed. Now and then there is disappointment, the writer choosing to pose rather than sit naturally and quietly; but in the present case¹ no such difficulty will be encountered. Written with the greatest freedom to a number of friends of very varying character and pursuits, through a period of sixty-three years, and containing her views and convictions on every imaginable topic, they form one of the most perfect portraits we have had for long. It is not only a typical New Englander whose conscientiousness and thrift and power of self-sacrifice are shown on every page, but something finer and broader. Never were stronger sympathies or a keener sense of justice given to mortal women, and hardly a woman has lived among us who has ever shown more perfectly not only these, but other strong characteristics, which could hardly have been fostered in any other country, and which rank her first among representative American women.

Her opportunity was a large one, but it needed a large mind to embrace and use it. Born to narrow means, or what to-day seems so, it was yet the almost comfortable limitation peculiar to New England, where no man or woman can be called poor who has two hands and a clear brain to direct their use. In her case there was no struggle, for her father was a substantial citizen of the little town of Medford, Mass., and her earliest recollections were of giving, all the needy in town having a warm supper the night before Thanksgiving. Education was limited to the public schools, save one year at a private seminary; but she had a natural thirst for knowledge, and her brother, Convers Francis, afterwards theological professor at Harvard College, stimulated her in every way. At twenty-one, she had written her first novel, "Hobomok," which was quickly followed by "The Rebels; a Tale of the Revolution." "The Mothers' Book" succeeded it, running through eight American editions, twelve English and one German, and she became "the most popular literary woman in the United States."

Fifty years ago this could easily be, for the literary ranks were very thin in more senses than one; but her success was a genuinely deserved one. She did the first work for children ever attempted, and all her work bore the stamp of a sweet and steadily-growing nature—full, not only of kindness, but of a bright and delicate humor, a quick fancy, and great gift of expression. At twenty-six she married David Lee Child, and, if the book held no other record, it would be of immeasurable value in its unconscious yet lovely picture of an almost ideal marriage. The two were lovers to the end, and one in every thought and purpose. Five years later came the turning-point in her life. The Anti-slavery party had become a fact. She joined it, and wrote an "Appeal in behalf of that class of Americans called Africans."

A thunderbolt could not have caused greater consternation in the society that had delighted to honor her, and which rejected her with a speed and indignation that, at the present day, seem incredible. The sale of her books almost ceased, and her brilliant career seemed over once for all. Her friends mourned, but her own courage never failed. In fact, she never seemed to realize that courage was needed, but went her serene way undisturbed.

In these letters she writes at this time: "Why use the word sacrifice? I was never conscious of any sacrifice. A new stimulus seized my whole being." "Besides, it is impossible to estimate how much one's own character gains by a warfare which keeps the intellect wide awake, and compels one to reflect upon moral principles."

Whatever losses may have come, there are some permanent gains. As usual in a moral crisis, her friends were thoroughly sifted, and only the wheat remained. The noblest and best in the land were from henceforth side-by-side with her. More tolerant than many of them, her views were juster; but to the end of her life she scouted respectability in its narrow sense, and cared more and more for the masses. Her literary power was for a period merely, and as author she may be forgotten, but her lovely and benignant personality is a possession for all time—a memory we cannot afford to put aside even if we would.

A NEW work in dialogue form is in preparation by Walter Pater, the scene being laid in Rome, in the time of Marcus Aurelius.

MADAME ADAMS' volume, "La Chanson des Nouveaux Epoux," has been illustrated with original drawings by Doré, Munkaczy, Dettaille and other distinguished artists.

THE exciting correspondence on the copyright question still goes on in the London Athenæum, and, as it at present stands, the English publisher is apparently quite as merciless with his authors as the American.

PROBABLY no more silly book was ever published than "Novissimum Organon; The Certainties, Guesses and Observations of John Thinkingmachine," by James Ferdinand Mallenckrodt, issued by the Hugh R. Hildreth Printing Company, St. Louis. It has absolutely no excuse for being, but may be had for 75 cents.

THE children of the period are encouraged to climb to a proper understanding of the laws of nature by means of the Science Ladder of D'Anvers, constructed by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. The fifth round, just finished, is called "Lowest Forms of Water Animals." It is simple, compact and very entertaining. Like the preceding books of the series, it is destined to be popular and useful. (Square 12mo, pp. 59, 50 cts.).

PAUL FEVAL, who made a large fortune by his books, "The Mysteries of London" and "The Nights of Paris," is dying in extreme want. His fortune was lost by speculation, and he became directly after this event as religious as he had been skeptical. The Jesuits held him entirely, and in writing up church legends he became rich once more. This second fortune he lent to a friend, who in turn speculated and again ruined him, this time hopelessly.

AN excellent collection of short plays, charades, etc., has been published by Lee & Shepard under the title of "Footlight Frolics," by Mrs. Charles Fernald, which will be found of great use in getting up school entertainments or in small parties at home. The collection is quite free from slang or objectionable features, and thus can be put in the hands of young people without fear of increasing any tendencies in such directions. (Paper, 30 cents).

MARGARET VANDEGRIFF'S "Holidays at Home" is a handsome volume for boys and girls, containing thirty-two separate stories and fifty-nine illustrations. The author has delicate taste, a keen sense of humor, imagination and sensibility, all of which are employed in this book. The lessons of her well-told tales are such as parents will be glad to see inculcated, being cheerful, helpful and good. There are stories in verse as well as prose. The wood-cuts are very unequal, some being excellent and others very poorly executed. (pp. 302, $1.75; Porter & Coates).

THE Buffalo Express states that the journal to be published by the lunatics on Ward's Island, under the title of The Moon, is not the first periodical printed by the inmates of an insane asylum. Thirty years ago, The Express says, the prisoners in the Utica Insane Asylum published a monthly magazine called The Opal, which contained some of the craziest poetry ever printed. It quotes this couplet as an example:

"Canst thou be the mackerel's queen, Blighted, plighted Isoline?"

On the whole, this is no crazier than much that comes to the reviewer's table.

It will surprise the many who have been convinced that aside from Lowell's Commemoration Ode and a few minor productions, we had no patriotic poems, to discover with what success Mr. J. Brander Matthews has met in the compilation of his volume, "Poems of American Patriotism." The arrangement is, as far as possible, chronological, and Mr. Emerson's "Boston" is chosen as the opening poem. There are many old favorites—some less familiar, but there is hardly an American poet who has not written stirring verse on some incident or suggestion in our history, though most, as would be expected, date from the Rebellion. The collection is a valuable one, and should have its place in every library. (12mo, pp. 269, $1.50; Charles Scribner's Sons).

THE readers of THE CONTINENT need no introduction to Mr. E. C. Gardner's delightful work in "The House That Jill Built, After Jack's had Proved a Failure." A Book on Home Architecture, with illustrations. Mr. Gardner's reputation as a practical architect would in any case give value, and, unlike many architects, he has an educated sense in interior as well as exterior decoration, and full knowledge of every sanitary law. He is wise as well as witty, and the little thread of story on which the papers are strung is very delicately managed. The illustrations have in reproduction lost some of their original clearness, but unpretentious as the book is, it would be hard to find a more comprehensive or faithful guide to needed work. (OUR CONTINENT LIBRARY. 16mo, pp. 249, $1.00; Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York).

It is pleasant to find that grammar is coming to take its true position, and that even teachers admit it has had small influence on the speech of the masses. "We do not wonder," says the Augusta Chronicle, "that pupils regard their lessons with loathing, and it is a most hopeful sign when teachers begin to comprehend the true nature of the case and aid in exploding the whole fabric which has been befogging the infant mind for generations. The technical science of language is well enough to know as a specialty, but is no more necessary for ordinary purposes than is the technical knowledge of the art of poetry to a genuinely inspired writer of verse who has an ear attuned to musical expression. Good prose and good poetry can be written without such instruction in book form, crammed as a memory lesson."

In a recent criticism on Paul Heyse's latest novel the London Spectator, in some points the most discriminating of all the weeklies, says: "Heyse's speech is a very apt illustration how the language of every country is an evidence in record of its characters and manners. Such situations, modes of thought and feeling as Heyse has depicted in "Children of the World" are imaginable in Germany and in the German tongue, but they lose a large part of their not too solid reality in their divorce from their native speech, gaining instead an uncomfortable semblance of absurdity and childishness. Certain modes of thought can be naturalized as little as certain words, because, in fact, the feelings which the latter would express do not exist. We believe that this fact in large part accounts for the circumstance that translations from German novels so rarely find favor in this country. Though the two languages start from kindred sources, they have too hopelessly diverged for the hazy dreamings of the one country to be rendered into the speech which expresses the more practical instincts of the other."

DORÉ has seldom done work more representative of his peculiar power and scope than in the illustrations to "Dante's Inferno." Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co. have published them in quarto form, with the Rev. Henry Francis Cary's translation, the present edition having critical and explanatory notes, a life of Dante and chronology. Half an inch more of margin would have made the book without flaw, but it is, in any case, a very beautiful gift for holidays or any days. (pp. 183, $6.00).

So much travel comes to us this season disguised as fiction, that a travel wave would seem to have swept over the whole publishing world, who send out volume after volume of sugar-coated information. The most resolute parent, however, will be forced to yield to the charm of the latest one, "Our Boys in India; the Wanderings of Two Young Americans in Hindustan," by Henry W. French. Profusely illustrated, and with an exciting story as background for the travels, any boy will fare well into whose possession it comes, the facts being given in a very picturesque and lively style. (Square 12mo, pp. 484, $2.00; Lee & Shepard, Boston).

At a recent meeting of the Linnean Society Sir John Lubbock read an account of his further observations on the habits of insects made during the past year. The two queen ants which have lived with him since 1874, and which are now, therefore, no less than eight years old, are still alive, and laid eggs last summer, as usual. His oldest workers are seven years old. Dr. Müller, in a recent review, had courteously criticised his experiments on the color-sense of bees, but Sir John Lubbock pointed out that he had anticipated the objections suggested by Dr. Müller, and had guarded against the supposed source of error. The difference was, moreover, not one of principle, nor does Dr. Müller question the main conclusions arrived at, or doubt the preference of bees for blue, which, indeed, is strongly indicated by his own observations on flowers. Sir John also recorded some further experiments with a reference to the power of hearing. Some bees were trained to come to honey which was placed on a musical box on the lawn close to a window. The musical box was kept going for several hours a day for a fortnight. It was then brought into the house and placed out of sight, but at the open window, and only about seven yards from where it had been before. The bees, however, did not find the honey, though when it was once shown them they came to it readily enough. Other experiments with a microphone were without results. Every one knows that bees when swarming are popularly, and have been ever since the time of Aristotle, supposed to be influenced by clanging kettles, etc. Experienced apiarists are now disposed to doubt whether the noise has really any effect, but Sir John suggests that even if it has—with reference to which he expressed no opinion—it is possible that what the bees hear are not the loud, low sounds, but the higher overtones at the verge of or beyond our range of hearing. As regards the industry of wasps, he timed a bee and a wasp, for each of which he provided a store of honey, and he found that the wasp began earlier in the morning (at four A. M.), and worked on later in the day. He did not, however, quote this as proving greater industry on the part of the wasp, as it might be that they are less sensitive to cold. Moreover, though the bee's proboscis is admirably adapted to extract honey from tubular flowers, when the honey is exposed, as in this case, the wasp appears able to swallow it more rapidly. This particular wasp began work at four in the morning, and went on without any rest or intermission until a quarter to eight in the evening, during which time it paid Sir John one hundred and sixteen visits.

FEATHERS to the amount of $6,250,000 are exported from South Africa every year. Nine-tenths of these feathers are taken from tame birds. Ostriches pay considerably better than any other kind of live stock. The breeding is managed in the following way: A pair of birds, which cost at Cape Colony, Africa, from $750 to $1200—or what is called a set, that is, a cock and two hens—are inclosed in a paddock varying in size from forty by sixty yards to two acres. If the birds are in good condition, they will soon begin to lay. Then the eggs are taken from them and put into an incubator for hatching. They will lay thirty eggs before setting, and, if well fed, begin again in two or three weeks. The number of eggs each bird will lay varies from forty to ninety a year. One set of three birds, a cock and two hens, from June 30, 1873, to June 30, 1873, laid 188 eggs, which produced 133 chicks. Of these 18 died, leaving 115 young birds. Seventy-four were sold at three months old for $80 each, and allowing the remaining 41 to be worth only $60 each, we have a return of $8380 from one set of birds. The next year the same set laid 113 eggs, producing 77 chicks, and the first six months of the third year they laid 97 eggs, producing 81 chicks! The average increase is from 30 to 45 chickens a year from each pair. The chickens are worth, when a month old, from $40 to $50 each; a year old, $100; two years old, $150; four years old, from $200 to $250. At five years, when they begin to lay, they are worth from $600 to $1000 a pair. The chickens require careful attention for the first three months, after which time until breeding they are run in a flock like sheep and mustered for plucking every seven months. Each pair of full-grown birds will furnish feathers worth $60 at each period of plucking, or $120 worth every fourteen months. The white ostrich feathers bring in the London markets from $120 to $150 a pound. The diseases to which ostriches are liable are few. It is thought that California would be a good place for ostriches. They might do well also in Virginia, Florida, Texas and Colorado, and in some other parts of the country. It is proposed to form a company in New York City for the breeding of these birds in California. A capital of $25,000 only will be required to begin with.

For a long time the favorite mode of committing suicide in Paris has been by leaping from one of the towers of the Notre-Dame. This choice of place is not a mere whim, but rests on a belief that in falling so great a distance the velocity would become so great that respiration would be impossible, and death would really take place before the body could strike the ground. Indeed, in a recent case, a physician has testified that such was the real cause of death. The height of the balustrade of the tower of Notre-Dame is sixty-six metres above the pavement. Now according to the well-known law of falling bodies the descent would take place with a velocity accelerating as follows: Five metres the first second; fifteen metres the next; twenty-five metres the third; and thirty-five metres the fourth—in all, eighty metres in four seconds. Hence, the fall from the tower requires less than four seconds, and the final velocity does not reach thirty-five metres per second. Now railway trains not unfrequently attain a velocity of one hundred and twenty kilometres per hour. This would give two kilometres per minute or thirty-three metres per second. This is almost precisely the velocity a body would acquire at the end of the fall through the space in question. Now, as engine-drivers experience no danger of suffocation in moving through the air at this rate, and whether the direction of motion is horizontal or vertical being immaterial, it is plain that all Parisian suicides who have leaped from the historic tower of Notre-Dame have done so under an erroneous theory; but, like so many other mistakes, the discovery came too late, and the poor, deluded wretch met, after all, the fate he climbed so high to avoid.

ACONITE is a member of the buttercup family, and is a native principally of Europe and Northern Asia. About a dozen species have been introduced and cultivated in gardens for their showy flowers, the most common being familiarly known as monk's-hood and wolf's-bane. Its showy blue flowers make it a favorite in cottage gardens, but it and its allies are poisonous in the highest degree, accidents having occurred through eating the leaves for parsley, and death having frequently occurred from using the roots in place of horse-radish. Much might be done to prevent such mistakes by exhibiting in school-rooms the figures of the two plants and their roots, their nature being explained by the teacher. The chemical alkaloid called aconitine is obtained from the roots of this plant; it possesses all the virulent poisonous properties of the plant in a tenfold degree.

THE DRAMA.

MR. JOSEPH MURPHY, the successful Irish low comedian, has added another play to his repertory, entitled "The Donagh," by Mr. George Fawcett Rowe.

MRS. LANGTRY played to her first slim audiences in Brooklyn—the performances there on Christmas day were but sparsely attended. The furore about the imported "professional beauty" is deservedly and speedily dying out.

"YOUNG MRS. WINTHROP" will be sent "on the road" immediately, bearing the stamp of approval of New York. Certain members of the original company will be sent from the Madison Square Theatre, New York, to San Francisco to produce it in that city.

"THE RANTZAUS," although pronounced by many to have been one of the best dramas ever produced at the Union Square Theatre, proved but a slight pecuniary success. The name, it is held, militated against its popularity. It was withdrawn after a few weeks' run in favor of M. Octave Feuillet's "A Parisian Romance" cast to the full strength of the Union Square Company.

"OLD HEADS AND YOUNG HEARTS" was revived at Wallack's, New York, on December 20. Mr. John Gilbert, who made his first appearance since his recent dangerous illness, received a most hearty welcome from the large audience present, being applauded at every exit and frequently summoned before the curtain. The occasion was rendered still more interesting by the presence in one of the boxes of the author of the comedy, Mr. Dion Boucicault, who had just arrived from England. It was the anniversary of the playwright's birthday, too, December 20, 1823, being the date of his birth. What a rare gratification it must have been for the author to witness the interest of the public in his forty-year-old play. The peculiar coincidences at the latest production of "Old Heads and Young Hearts" served to make the occasion especially noteworthy.

Tying the Knot.

"THIS is a true-lover's knot," he said,
As he twisted over a bit of thread,
And carefully drawing the ends out straight,
Presented the form of the figure eight.

"It is, my darling, a double noose,
Pretty to look at if left quite loose,
But two hearts closely we may unite
By pulling the ends of the cord up tight.

"This is a bowline knot," quoth he,
To the merry maiden upon his knee;
"And terrible things on the mighty ship
Would happen, you know, if this knot should slip:
In dropping the anchor, in hoisting sail,
In making safe from the fearful gale:
And the bowline knot you will understand
Should never be made by a careless hand.

"And this is a weaver's knot, my dear;
An intricate puzzle to you, I fear;
But you'll find you'll often have use for it
When the children's stockings you learn to knit.
O, what confusion and loss beside,
If a knot in the warp were left untied!
Hither and yon would the stitches run,
And the weaver's weaving be soon undone.

"In tying a knot, if you tie it wrong
You can't depend on it very long;

But if made as it ought to be—firm and fast—
'Twill hold, and tighten, and always last.
Now which of these knots do you like the best?"
Said he—and the maiden whom he addressed
Like a woman answered, and queried, too,
"I like the true-lover's knot. Don't you?"

Practical Venice.

(By a Commercial Child Harold.)

I STOOD in Venice on the Bridge of Sighs;
A factory, a mill on either hand:
I saw from out the wave tall chimneys rise,
And wharves and busy steam-cranes edge the strand,
And palaces to warehouses expand.
A murky air, where sunshine never smiles,
As black as Bradford. This was once the land
Where poets sang its countless marble piles,
And Ruskin wrote and reveled in its sunny isles!
In Venice Ruskin's echoes are no more,
And steam has stopped the songless gondolier;
Her palaces are crammed with goods galore,
And barcarolles no longer meet the ear:
Those days are past—but Enterprise is here.
Shares fall, Stocks fade, but Commerce doth not die,
But reckons dodges more than Doges dear,
And gain above artistic sanctity;
Accounting best on earth, the Trade of Italy!

AN OLD DUTCH SETTLEMENT.

SCHOHARIE VILLAGE.

WANDERING over the Catskills one summer's day we came upon the queer little village of Schoharie, snugly ensconced among the hills. Nowadays, when a body of immigrants strike out to found a new colony, they carefully examine the features of the surrounding country with a view to the selection of some spot not only suited to their immediate wants, but which from the character of the surface, soil and climate, may become a centre for future emigration, and also afford accommodation for the natural increase of their numbers. Not so thought the early colonists. To entrench themselves in some secluded spot, not readily accessible to outsiders, or otherwise to settle in some place from which they could easily escape on the approach of intruders, was their first regard; hence the mountains and the sea-coast were usually chosen, and immigrants seldom settled upon the open plains. If they concerned themselves at all about posterity it was probably to reflect that they could best discharge their duties in that regard by taking care of themselves.

Travelers through the Green Mountains and along the Catskills may happen upon some odd little town, isolated by reason of its physical conformation, and presenting a singular type of domestic and social life. Upon inquiry the curious traveler will learn that he has found one of the settlements of the early colonists. It is sure to be a narrow, fertile tract shut in by the mountains. Manufactures will never flourish there, for communication with the outside world—the world of railroads and steamboats and canals—can only be had by climbing over those rugged mountains; and not the most reckless legislature that will ever legislate will subsidize a tunnel through ten miles of rock for the sake of getting into a valley that is only a mile wide and five miles long.

Conformably with the general teaching and belief, this secluded nook, guarded by the impregnable hills, and secure against the contamination of city vices, should present a picture of stalwart virtue, blooming health and tranquil innocence. Here we should find the moral as well as physical stature of that race of heroes who peopled the "good old times," but we feel our respect for our ancestors dwindling away as we pursue such reflections; for before us is a people weak-kneed, loose-jointed, hollow-chested, and with moral constitutions equally infirm. Tipplers, almost to a man; and as for the women, the female physique and the parish records are alike abnormal and irregular. Insanity, epilepsy and cretinism are frequent disorders. Out of a hundred people whom you would meet on Broadway the average individual would present a more robust appearance than would the average of the same number taken at random from one of these insular settlements.

But this condition of things is by no means chargeable to defects in the original stock. The evils of isolation are far more ruinous and certain to produce decay in a community than are the extravagances and excesses of an urban population.

In the spring of 1711 a colony of six hundred German Palatinates, under the patronage of Queen Anne, went up the Hudson to Albany, and there encamped, sending out scouts into the neighboring country in search of a spot suitable for making a permanent settlement. On comparing reports it was voted that the valley of the Schoharie, about thirty miles to the northwest, should be the site of their new home. Very beautiful must have been the spectacle presented to the longing eyes of the weary pilgrims on that April day when they entered standing, though but few lives were lost, for the citizens, being warned of the approach of the British, were gathered into their forts, which they gallantly defended. You will hardly find a man in Schoharie who will not tell you of the brave deeds of his ancestors upon that day. One of the forts is still standing, in a good state of preservation, and there is an annual appropriation by the state for its repair. It was built for a Dutch Reformed Church, and on the stones which appear in the foundation we read the names of the founders—and we read them again on the slabs in the adjacent cemetery. The names of their grandchildren we read, with scarce a break, upon the sign-boards along the main streets. Droll, unpronounceable, many-syllabled names they were, too, but succeeding generations have cut them down and trimmed them up, seriously curtailing, thereby, their ancient Dutch dimensions.

A PRE-REVOLUTIONARY DUTCH MANSE—SCHOHARIE.

that picturesque valley—a fertile tract sharply inclosed by spurs of the Catskills, and lying some twenty-three hundred feet above tide.

They first called their settlement Bruna Dorf, signifying the town of springs; afterward adopting the Indian name, Schoharie, meaning driftwood. At the junction of Fox Creek with the Schoharie, near the site of the village, a quantity of driftwood had collected, forming a natural bridge—hence the name.

In a neighboring valley was a tribe of Indians composed of refugees from other tribes and under the chieftainship of Karighondontee, a French Indian, who had been taken prisoner by the Mohawks. The daughter of the Mohawk chief having fallen in love with the prisoner, he was spared on condition that he should espouse the maiden; and his father-in-law, moreover, gave him as much land along the Schoharie as would be required for planting such quantity of corn as his dusky bride could carry away in her petticoat. So runs the tradition.

It was a little more than a hundred years ago—the crops being snugly harvested—that Colonel Johnson, with an army of five hundred troops, swept down upon the beautiful valley of the Schoharie, leaving ruin and desolation in his wake. Scarcely a house was left

Since the opening of the Albany and Susquehanna road, a few years ago, the town has lost something of its habits of isolation. A convenient cleft in the mountain admits the passage of the local road to a point about a mile from the village, and a handsome new court-house proclaims that Schoharie has become the county-seat. Through that mountain-cleft the breath of a newer civilization has crept in, and the external evidences of the old life are fast passing away; but enough remains to impress the stranger very forcibly. The township includes several outlying hamlets, but that portion which is known as Schoharie, and which was settled over two hundred and fifty years ago by six hundred people, now numbers only a population of about twelve hundred, and of that number three hundred are the blacks and their descendants emancipated by the law of 1824. The phlegmatic Dutchman, less alert than the prudent Yankee, did not sell his slaves on the eve of their emancipation.

Old Jacko, who still hobbles about the premises on which he was born, loves to tell about the “dark day,” when the cows ran lowing through the fields, and the cocks crowed, and the people said their prayers with more than Sunday unction. Old Jacko enjoys the distinction of being “the oldest inhabitant.” He is probably about a hundred and eight years old. He never learned to read nor write; but he is the repository of all the local traditions, which he rehearses with solemn satisfaction, as one who feels the importance of his office.

The negroes rank second best in the social scale, while a third class of poor whites, known by the descriptive term of Slughters, are huddled together in miserable shanties on the outskirts of the village. Strike out in any direction from Main Street, and at the end of the second mile you will be sure to come upon the habitations of the Slughters. They toil not, neither do they spin, and life presents no harder problem to the Slughter than is involved in the scrutiny of his neighbor's crops, and the calculation of per centum which is likely to accrue to him in the distribution of the township alms.

If the student of social science should come hither he will not go away empty. As a brief summary of facts gathered from the town records, we have here a hardy, long-lived, industrious people, of sober and religious habit, living in a beautiful and fertile district, but under conditions which for generations isolate them almost wholly from the rest of the world. Gradually we find the land passing into the hands of the thrifty few; and not long after mention is made of the almshouse; and presently the criminal records grow more bulky. Thus, by easy stages, we reach the logical outcome of these conditions—Slughters. Marriages of consanguinity have been inevitable, and grow more frequent as the land-owners become fewer in number; and the ranks of the Slughters are constantly recruited by defections from the superior classes.

We also remark the general decrease in longevity, the increase of infant mortality, marasmus, paralysis, epilepsy, insanity, and, lastly, cretinism—the lowest form of human life.

Here, too, is a striking verification of the theory that nature does, in extremity, exercise a law of limitation tending to the extinction of deteriorated races. Under normal conditions the number of males born in a community is considerably greater than the number of females, but should the stock become enfeebled or diseased, not only does the number of normal births decrease, but the births of males become relatively fewer. Since the opening of the present century there has been a steady decrease in the ratio of male births.

Here are Silurian shells, and the likeness of ripples marked by the retreating waters, and probably covered by a fresh layer of sand from the adjacent rocks before the waves came back again to form new ripples along the tide-washed shore. which fortunate collectors have gathered stalactites of pure white, translucent and solid, sulphate of barytes, calcite, satin-spar, tufa, bog ore, black oxide of iron and aragonite. Among the fossils crinoids and spirifers are found in great abundance and perfection. Occasionally a patient search may be rewarded by the discovery of trilobites. Branches of coral and sea-weed may be picked out by careful hands from the shaly stone which is scattered over the mountains.

Hither the city-worn artist comes to sketch this splendid scenery and gather fresh inspiration as he inhales the keen, bright air which seems to come from illimitable distances as it sweeps over the mountain tops. And here the late tourist loves to linger while the mellow autumn haze hangs over the hills, softening their rugged outlines until they seem to meet and mingle with the shifting clouds. The sumac and the maple flaunt in crimson and gold, and overhead is the stir and flutter of the South-returning birds, whose punctual migrations constitute the chiefest share of travel between this pretty niche and the great world beyond.

A BIRTHDAY.

How strange the magic of this golden day !
 From dawn to eve the calm autumnal air
 Has brooded, like the shadow of a prayer,
 Above the hushed waves of the tranquil bay :
 Through the clear dusk now shines with steadfast ray
 One peaceful star, in lonely beauty, where Slow, step by step, down Twilight's sombre stair
 The sun has passed upon his westward way.

Even so, dear heart, your face has shone for me
 Since, on this day, in God's good time, you came My guide, my guerdon and my goal to be ;
 And even so your love's pure, ardent flame
 Shall light the way 'mid all my dreary gloom,
 Like that lone lamp that burned in Tullia's tomb.

BARTON GREY.

MRS. BISHOP AND HER BAG.

BY JENNIE S. JUDSON.

A FAMILY long subjected to malarial influences sought, years ago, health and strength from a sojourn in the barren regions of the pines. Many impressions there formed on the mind of one of its child-members still remain; but clearest cut of these intaglios of memory is that of Mrs. Bishop and her bag, and it shall form the subject of this sketch.

A weird procession of three wound up the pine-crowned hill to the village church one evening, each member bearing a flickering pine-torch in her hand. Arrayed in scarlet calico, with coarse locks straggling on the breeze, what wonder that to a youthful imagination Mrs. Bishop and her two daughters, Miranda and Rejoice, seemed, beneath the fantastic glare of the torches, to be Macbeth's witches in the very flesh?

A closer survey, however, under the cross-barred wooden candle-holder, which formed the literal "drip-pings of this sanctuary," revealed a grim, gaunt woman and two strong, sun-burnt girls.

Brass-bowed spectacles covered the woman's bright eyes, and a large blue bag, whose use did not appear, was suspended from her arm.

"Seem like she caynt step 'thout that bag," some one whispered near; and from that moment the article, which, in accordance with this statement was so necessary to Mrs. Bishop's well-being, became invested for me with a peculiar interest.

"Does your maw want to buy any quilts, sis, as you knows on?" was the question with which I was accosted, as a few days later the mysterious bag and its owner appeared at our front gate.

"I'll light and come in," was added ere I had time to reply.

"Here, Dood," to a boy who rode behind, "hitch the critter an' foller me."

The specimens of handiwork shortly displayed for our gratification were gorgeous creations of scarlet, green and yellow calico, and bore such striking names as "Star of the Evening," "Wicked Ways of the World," "Pride of the Prairie," and "Solomon's Temple."

When my mother had conveyed to Mrs. Bishop as gently as possible the fact that we had no need for the articles offered, she replied, "Now, ma'am, don't you go to thinkin' I feels put out about it. Laws, no! it's enough for me to have 'sociated fur awhile with the quality ef I hain't made no sale."

"What is your little boy's name?" asked my mother, with a compassionate glance at the little woe-begone-looking creature.

"Doodney is the name he was baptiz by, but we calls him Dood for short."

"Is it a French name?" she further inquired, doubtless thinking of the beautiful name Dieu-donné, or God-given.

"Laws no, ma'am! me an' his paw is strong Primity Baptises, and wouldn't never give no chile of our'n a heathen name. Brother Stuart, an old preacher, named the chile, and I reckon it's a mighty good, religious name, 'cause Brother Stuart is a pow'ful good man. He ain't in this deestrick no mo' now, but he'll be here come next foot-washin' time, an' it'll jes' do you good to hear him e'zort and laugh them holy laughs of his'n."

After a short conversation in regard to a cow which my mother thought of purchasing, and which her visitor averred "gin a bushel of milk," Mrs. Bishop rose to go.

"Let me put these apples in your bag," said my mother; "the little boy may like them."

"Much obleeged, ma'am, but I won't sile the bag. Here, Dood, put them apples in your pocket, and don't you begin a-eatin' of 'em now," as she noted the brightening of the little fellow's eyes.

So the bag went empty as it came, and its use was not yet discovered.

I will state here, digressively, that "come next foot-washin' time," which we found to be a ceremony of great solemnity, we heard "Brother Stuart" first "endeavor to jine the two eends of his mind together" by singing entirely alone a "hyme" six verses in length, and then hold forth for two long hours from the text, "A great king r'ared his bul'arks agin a city, an' the city tuck an' fell," during which he indulged frequently in that peculiar form of nervous excitement called "the holy laugh."

After the sale of some butter and eggs brought a few days later, but not in the bag, which flapped idly from her arm, Mrs. Bishop remarked to my mother, "If that there chile was mine," alluding to my humble self, "I'd set her on my mantel-board an' never take eyes offen her. She looks to me jes' like a alabaster image."

"Like as not, honey," turning with a sudden inconsequence to me, "you never seed a country dance, did you? There's a-goin' to be one out to Meachem's to-morrer night, an' I hope your maw'll let you go. Me an' Mirandy'll be there, and will see that you are well took care of."

After much coaxing, permission was granted me to attend the desired dance, and in charge of a trusty servant I went out on the next night to "Meachem's."

A log cabin, containing but one room, from which all furniture had been removed, served as the dancing apartment. This was illuminated by dismal lanterns hung from the walls, and a blazing pile of pine knots in the mud chimney.

A negro fiddler furnished the music, and as he fell asleep at intervals during the playing, many of his airs might have been styled "dreamy."

"Mirandy," her mother and the bag were present. Miranda wore a dress of pink paper cambric, cut in notches at all the edges, and festooned with ribbons of every conceivable hue, and I soon discovered she was quite a belle. Dancing was vigorously carried forward by all the young people, but her nimble gymnastics were something wonderful to behold. Once she passed us at a flying leap which set every ribbon dancing, and Mrs. Bishop remarked, with maternal pride, "Well, that chile's got grace in her heels ef she hain't in her heart."

While the gayety was at its very height there came a strong swaying in the boards beneath our feet, and before its cause could be conjectured the whole company was thrown into a large heap in the middle of the room—the floor had given way!

With much laughter and breathlessness, all were rescued unhurt, and the dancing was resumed in the yard, whither the fiddler and the dismal lanterns were at once transferred. Seeing the host and a few of the male guests under the house endeavoring to re-establish its frail foundations, Mrs. Bishop playfully remarked:

"Come now, Meachem, 'taint no ways likely you can r'ar them bul'arks agin to-night; so s'pose you come out and try your hand at vittlin' the company."

Mr. Meachem good-naturedly acquiesced in this view of the matter, and shortly after appeared with the refreshments, which, to my unbounded astonishment, consisted wholly of pie—thirteen different varieties!

"Ah, now I see why Mrs. Bishop carries the bag," thought I, as, the party over and the guests departing, I saw her deftly open its capacious mouth preparatory to introducing an immense pie. But no, I was mistaken, for, after a moment's deliberation, she laid the bag aside and wrapped the pie in a large pink calico handkerchief instead; so the mystery still remained unsolved.

Mrs. Bishop's next errand at our house was to inquire if we "took ary a fashion paper" that she "could borror the loan of?" I want to make a pa'sol like your maw's," she added, by way of explanation, "an' I 'lowed I could find somethin' in that to go by."

My mother, though deeming the proposed undertaking one of a difficult nature, offered no discouragement, but produced not only the "fashion papers," but allowed Mrs. Bishop to make a thorough examination of her parasol.

The ubiquitous bag hung as usual at her side, but she did not deposit the papers in it when she rose to go. She placed them under her arm instead, and the bag again went empty.

A week later, as I sat drowsily conning my lessons in the village school, which began at seven in the morning and lasted till half past five at night, I saw Mrs. Bishop, her daughter Rejoice, and the bag advancing. In her hand Mrs. Bishop bore an object, which was both "fearfully and wonderfully made," and it required several moments' close inspection to convince me of the fact that it was a "pa'sol" made in imitation of my mother's. This remarkable structure, instead of assuming the modest, drooping tendency peculiar to that class of objects, was of so aspiring a nature as to turn completely wrong side out and point its ribs up at the sky. All effort to lower the willful article at the door proved fruitless, so Mrs. Bishop sailed into the school-room with it held complacently aloft, thus upsetting the gravity of several of the small band assembled there.

"I've brung Jicey to school," she announced with a flourish of her parasol toward her daughter. "Not that I want to get shet of the chile. Laws, no! for she's a mighty help to me about weavin', milkin' and so on; but it's time she took to book-larnin'. When I was twelve year old," with an air of virtue, "I knowed a right smart outen books. 'Twas then I larned that a lizzard was a symptoms (species) of a snake, an' many other cur'os things I disremember now. Now, Jicey here, she's eleven past, an' peert enough to learn e'enamost anything, ef she'll only try; so this mornin' I tole old Bishop—that's her paw—that she should be brung to school; an' here she is."

The subject of these remarks hung a blushing head as her mother thrust her forward, and began a wild endeavor to dig a hole in the floor with her toes. She was clad, as to bonnet, apron, dress and pantalettes, in striped homespun, and was as sturdy a young creature as one would wish to see.

Poor child, her trials began from that hour. Her mother's parting injunction to the teacher was that "ef she didn't take to larnin' naterally, it was to be druv into her with a stick." Weeks and weeks had sped, however, before she had even reached that part of the "First Reader" wherein is affirmed the fact, "These boys have no hats." This sentence she learned by heart, and when called on to read rendered it thus: "These here boys hain't got nary a hat."

"Jicey," I impulsively asked one day, after Mrs. Bishop had made a visit at the school, bearing the empty bag upon her arm, "why does your mother always carry that bag?"

"Dunno," was the satisfactory reply; "reckin it's 'case she wants ter."

Was my curiosity never to be gratified?

"I kim to town to-day for two reasons," explained Mrs. Bishop while calling at our house one morning. "One was to fetch Rempster's little gal in to see the keers, an' the other was to borrow a bit of mournin' from your maw."

"Have you lost any of your family, Mrs. Bishop?" asked my mother in alarm, remembering little Doodney's pale face in Sunday-school the Sabbath before.

"Oh, no'm. The mournin' is to be wore as a token of respec to a ole friend of mine, whose funeral sermont is to be preached to-morrer. Poor Piety Ann," she continued, "little did she think when she died as her remains wouldn't be done justice to for fifteen long ye'r."

"Fifteen years!" exclaimed my mother, in shocked surprise.

"Yes'm. Fifteen ye'r! I'll just tell you how it was: Brother Brown, her husband that was—and a tol'able good man, too, as men go—lost her some fifteen ye'r ago. He took on a right smart at the time, and 'peared quite 'flicted at his gereavement; but, if you'll believe me, ma'am, he didn't even so much as put a piece of black on his hat afterwards to implicate his feelin's; an' he never had no funeral sermont preached; an' what should he do in less'n six weeks but up an' marry agin! Oh, men is so owdacious!"

"Now I'd knowed Piety Ann ever sence she was a sucklin' babe, an' there never was a better 'ooman born. So when Brown's second wife turned out a reg'lar ternygrunt, I wa'n't in no wise upset, for he needed a come-uppance, an' he got it in her."

"Well, Number Two she finally took an' died, an' Brown was quite chipper-like for a while; but lately somethin' has been a-workin' on his mine, and last week he 'lowed to me openly that he'd wronged Piety Ann, an' was a-goin' to do jestic now, an' have her funeral sermont preached at last."

A "bit of mourning" in the shape of a black tissue veil was brought forth by my mother. Mrs. Bishop expressed herself as highly pleased with its suitability to the occasion and took her departure.

Imagine our surprise when we saw her at church next day arrayed in a startling dress of red calico, the blue bag hung as usual on her arm, and the borrowed veil trailing back in sable darkness from a bonnet profusely trimmed in green!

As one of the chief mourners she occupied the pew with "Brother Brown," who in tardy reparation for past indifference had tied an immense piece of black calico about his hat. As if further to attest his grief, he wore this funereal-looking object during the whole sermon.

Brother Stuart conducted the services. He quoted the line "Hark from the tombs a doleful sound," which he said "was the voice of Piety Ann a-asking for her dew." He once referred to the departed lady as "a extra fine cabbage-biler," and again as "a bewingled angel." After each assertion as to her excellent qualities he asked in mournful accents, "Ain't that so, Brother Brown?" To which "Brother Brown" would always reply with a lugubrious "yes," and a nod of his grief-laden head.

With a prayer, in which Brother Stuart earnestly desired that "each member's heart might be putrefied," the services were closed.

I dreamed that night that Mrs. Bishop passed our front door bearing "Brother Brown" in an immense blue bag toward the cemetery, and that she was repeating again and again the sentence, "Oh, men is so owdacious!" Was that bag to haunt me even in my dreams?

"Ef you 'll look in that splint basket on the table," said Mrs. Bishop to me when she called to return the veil, "you 'll find some pa'tridge eggs Doodney sent you. Seem like that chile ain't never done a-thinkin' about you an' your maw."

"How is Doodney?" inquired my mother, who had grown quite attached to the little fellow as a member of her Sunday-school class.

"Why, he's quite peaked an' pinin' from some cause or 'n'er. I've been a-doctorin' him, too, with shuck-tea, pine-water an' boneset, but it don't 'pear to do no good."

"I 'll send Doctor Holmes out this evening," said my mother with decision. "He may need immediate care."

On the next morning my mother and I drove out to Mrs. Bishop's house, a distance of five miles, to inquire after Doodney, and carry him some delicacies. We found him hot and restless with fever, but he gave us a sweet smile of welcome, and clung closely to my mother's proffered hand.

All during our stay his bright, distended eyes were fastened with a dumb affection on her face, and when we came to leave he panted out, "I likes you, I do for true, an' I likes your little girl, an' I likes the Sunday-school, too."

"I wish we could take him home with us, mamma,"

I said earnestly as we drove away, "he is so bright and quick; I'm sure you could teach him to be a nice boy when he is well again."

"He will never be well again, my child," she answered with tears in her voice. "He was the brightest and best of my little class, and I would gladly have trained him to a higher standard, but 'Death will soon teach him more than this melancholy world doth know.'"

Her words were prophetic. Little Doodney died the next day, and two days later we went out to the funeral.

As we neared the door Mrs. Bishop came out to meet us, and for the first time we saw her without the bag.

Depict to yourself our astonishment when, on entering the room to take a last look at our dear little friend, we found that the bright blue object, so long familiar to us as a bag, had been transformed into a pair of little trousers and in these Dieu-donné, now Dieu-pris, was clothed for his last, long sleep.

"I reckon you 'll reganize them breeches?" said Mrs. Bishop as she gazed at the quiet, little figure through dripping tears. "I sot a heap o' store by that bag," she continued. "I bought it two ye'r ago to kerry about and be handy to put things in, but seem like I couldn't never make up my mind to use it. It 'peared to be a shame to sile it. So I jes' kep a-kerryin' of it, more fur a ornament like than anythin' else. Doodney," with a broken voice, "allus egmired the bag so much that when the poor little feller come to die, says I, I 'll make a purty little pair of breeches outen it and put on him, an' it 'll kinder make him feel more cheerfuller like when he wakes up all strange, an' so fur from his paw an' me."

So thus at last the matter was explained, and from this simple and touching recital I learned both the history and the mystery of the bag.

Time has wiped out many pictures of that past, but not less vivid to-day than when I saw it last is the one of little Dieu-donné, lying ready for his early grave, his yellow hair, black lashes and pallid brow brought out in strong relief by the bright blue of the little trousers which were to cheer him when he woke, and which had so long haunted me in the shape of his mother's bag.

SLEEP.

DAY that I hailed with gladness, bright and fair,

How glad I am that you are spent at last!

And nerves and limbs, that have been pricked with care,

In loose night robes upon the sheets are cast.

Cares of to-day, your needle-book is shut,

With the sharp, tiny points in wool encased,

Another leaf from Life's worn book is cut,

In the Recording Angel's fingers placed.

Scissors and needles, put them quite away;

And that poor page that sums the petty whole,

Take it, my God, and read it right, I pray!

Seal it with safety for my stifled soul.

Questions that vex, and griefs, whose heavy weight

We wear like armor fitted close and hard;

Matters it that the lonesome hour and late

With burning planets on the dark is starred,

Or that the moon-tide o'er the moss-edged roof,

Slips to the gallery spreading silently,

Weaves in the starry threads a silver woof,

Chaste as a bridal robe? I will not see!

I'm tired, so tired to-night! earth's bright things call

No pulse to gladness rhyming happily.

I'm dully tired, and in thine arms would fall,

Merciful Sleep! The good friend left to me.

Always thou comest unto me at last:

Tho' sometimes I must long implore, I know

That thou wilt kindly come and hold me fast,

As nightly to thy white-kept shrine I go.

Some time these hurried hands, this life-lashed heart,

Will come unto thee where grave shadows creep,

Claiming at darker doors the well-earned part

In thy domain of silence, Holy Sleep!

LUCAS R. JEFFERIES.

OLD COMRADES—FRANK T. MERRILL.

AN ART FOR ENTHUSIASTS.—II.

Of a different type from the etchers mentioned in the preceding number is Mr. Whistler, who, as he was born here, will always be claimed, in a sense, as an American, though almost his whole artist-life has been spent abroad. He, too, is, in his way, the centre of a group, and, if you will, the founder of a school.

I have spoken of the limitations as well as of the peculiar excellences of the artistic temperament. There are things to be overlooked or forgiven as well as things to be admired; things to be taken for granted as well as those actually expressed.

Among the artists of the present generation who have made themselves conspicuous, and—I am sorry to say—notorious, I suppose no one asks us to forgive or to overlook more than does Mr. Whistler. No one seems in his work to ask us to take more for granted, and, with all deference to those who disagree with me, I think that no one has a better right to expect it. No one's caprices have more the stamp of authority. In the work of none do the vagaries of fancy bear more unmistakably the sign of original power.

I presume that no student will take Mr. Whistler's work as a model in technique; the way in which his work is done is probably the last thing he cares about, and much as I admire good work for its own sake, I frankly confess that I like his work all the better for this evident disregard of means. There is in his work, as, in a much nobler way there is in that of Millet, a protest against certain blandishments of the artist's craft; the graces of execution which are very apt to take the place of the end for which the artist is working—the impression which he wishes to convey. I know very little of Whistler's painting—I only know that his mother's portrait is superb—and it is not of this that I am speaking, but for genuine artistic insight into the essential qualities which it is the business of art to portray, such etchings as his "The Forge;" the series of old buildings, old boats and old men which he found along the Thames; the portfolio of a dozen little figure-studies, or the best of his recent sketches in Venice, entitle him to a high place among those who put artistic perception above the mechanism of any profession.

If he chooses to trifle with his reputation sometimes; if in his work he occasionally allows bravado to take the place of confidence, that is his own affair. We may be sorry—I am sure I am—but it ought not to prevent the fullest acknowledgment of the really splendid work which he has done.

It is only within the last ten years that artists in America have bestowed any very serious attention on etching, for although the traditions of the art have never been lost, and although its processes are for all practical purposes fully enough described in books which have been published any time within the last two hundred years and more, and although engravers' work is always in certain stages of it really etching and nothing else, yet it is only in very recent times that the proper atmosphere has been found for it to really flourish in. For it is, in an eminent degree—and in this is found, at the same time, the secret of its limitations and of its greatest charm—an art for enthusiasts, and it is something that goes without saying, that until very lately the enthusiasm of the American people—a quality in which I hope they are not deficient—has expended itself in other channels than in the patronage or pursuit of art.

M. Cadart, whose name is so closely associated with the best work which has been done in France, and which, in his capacity of printer or publisher, is found on so many of the best plates, did, it is true, come to America in 1867, and hoped and tried to impart to artists and patrons here something of the fervor which he felt himself. But it was too early, and art in America was not ripe for the innovation. We were, as Turner said in refusing to let one of his pictures be brought to America, "not up to the mark yet."

Among the artists who first turned their attention to etching with any seriousness was Mr. Stephen Ferris, of Philadelphia, who began to make experiments and who even published a few plates in 1875. Mr. Peter Moran also began to etch about the same time, and the large etching of Wagner's, "The Chariot Race," which was exhibited at the Centennial Exhibition, in 1876, was the product of their united labors, Mr. Moran having executed the horses and Mr. Ferris the rest of the plate. It is not in point of time alone that the work of these two artists demands prominent recognition in any notice of the progress of the art in America. It is in the work of Mr. Moran that one looks for the very best qualities which distinguish the painter of animals. Always sympathetic and refined; as modest, too, in the quiet strength of its execution as it is refined in sentiment, the work of no painter-etcher of to-day more easily maintains its place and asserts its charm in the midst of much that is importunate, not to say impertinent in noisier work by younger men, than the simple and elegant etchings of Peter Moran, while I suppose no American etcher has succeeded so well as Mr. Ferris in the delicate work in portraiture and in the treatment of the figure generally, by which he is best known. Whoever is familiar with his etchings after Fortuny or Vibert, or has seen his exquisite "Spring," after the younger Kaulbach, knows something of the possibilities of the art in the way of interpreting the subtler qualities of painting or of nature, in which etching is commonly supposed to be particularly deficient. The etchings of Mr. Gerome Ferris are almost, perhaps quite as good as the work of his father, while among those who bear the name of Moran there are so many artists of ability, who etch as well as paint, that it is out of the question to even name them all. There are, I believe, no less than twelve of this name who would have made a name, each for himself, if they had not united their efforts to produce one. "The twelve apostles of American art" they have been called by a good-natured and sometimes facetious critic—critics, I believe, are always good-natured and are occasionally facetious. Among these, as among any other group of American artists, the work of Mrs. Mary Nimmo Moran demands particular notice. I doubt whether in the work of any etcher in America or in Europe are to be found more painter-like qualities than hers exhibit, and if I were asked to select the etching by an American artist which exhibited these qualities in the greatest profusion, I should unhesitatingly name her "Twilight at Easthampton." Her work is not always equal to this, it is true—nobody is always at his best—but I am inclined to regard such work as this as about the high-water mark of etching in America. Perhaps if one were to seek for the etcher whose work exhibits the highest average of excellence, the best sustained effort, let us say, to borrow a somewhat hackneyed phrase, he would not go far wrong if he chose Stephen Parrish. Such classification and comparison as this is needless, however, besides being, on the whole, unfair. The work of no artist invites comparison with that of others less than Mr. Parrish's, or can better afford to do without it. He is original in the best sense in his treatment, not less than in his choice of subject; for he has made delightful pictures out of what to others would have offered little hint of artistic motive.

Among American etchers only less known than these, Mr. Charles A. Platt and Mr. Joseph Pennell deserve especial notice. Both are very young men; Mr. Platt is only twenty-one, and his first plate was etched but two years ago; and Mr. Pennell is hardly older either in years or in art. Mr. Pennell is well known as an illustrator also, but Mr. Platt's reputation rests on his etchings alone. Both show the genuine artistic insight in their choice of material and exceptional ability in making the most of its picturesque possibilities. Of the two I should say that Mr. Pennell was the most original in his methods, and that Mr. Platt was at present the most finished and confident workman.

My catalogue is already too long, for, after all, this is not an exhibition notice; but in recording, even imperfectly, the claims of etching as one of the finest of arts, and its progress in America, one cannot forget the charming work of Mr. R. Swain Gifford as tender and as true to the quiet scenes he loves to paint as his work in color; the simplicity and freshness of Mr. James D. Smillie, and the grace and beauty with which Mr. Farrer, Mr. Bellows and Mr. Van Elten know how to clothe homely and humble themes.

As with everything else in these days of organized enterprise, the increasing interest in the subject of etching has already assumed the proportions of a "movement." Every city has its society or club, by means of which the members are mutually instructed and assisted. It is to the existence of such societies that we owe the exhibitions noticed in this and the preceding paper, and the creation of an atmosphere more favorable to artistic pursuits than the ordinary air of American towns is apt to be. It would be hard to tell how much beautiful work we owe directly to this influence. Other forms of art are encouraged by the commercial spirit, but hitherto it must be conceded that the etcher has appealed to a public too select for much inspiration to have been derived from this quarter. Among the illustrations to this article will be found a group of exquisite works from Boston artists. Mr. Garrett was a successful engraver, and Mr. Merrill was well known as an illustrator, but it is at least doubtful whether the delightful etchings which, within a few years, have come from their hands would have been produced had it not been for the influence of such associations as I have named, and of Mr. Ross

Turner and Mr. Charles H. Turner this is quite as true.

I have left to the last the one who perhaps illustrates best of all the point I wish to establish about etching, as compared with other forms of printed art—Mr. F. S. Church. For, while he cares less than any other for certain technical qualities which artists and connoisseurs are apt to prize very highly, his work shows, on the whole, rather more than that of any of his fellows the presence of those powers which are independent of all methods. I think he rather despises, as Millet despised, technical excellence as an end in art, and that he regards the labor spent in acquiring it as thrown away, unless it is to remain, as I am afraid it seldom does, the willing servant of the imagination. He leaves to others the embellishment of the story, which makes the mere telling of it delightful to talker and to hearer alike. He only delivers his message and is off. And he always has something to say. The voice of no one has a truer ring. Other artists have quaint conceits and fine fancies, but none, I think, are quite so quaint or quite so fine as his.

Mr. Haden says that of all the arts etching is the last one for the amateur. But the truth of this, like that of the larger lesson about the goodness and the badness of the world, "depends on how you take it." If by amateurs is meant that large and increasing class of persons who spend an hour or two a week at the studio of some poor artist in copying his productions, while they silence their consciences and delude their friends by the pleasant fiction that they are "taking lessons," then it is true enough that they ought to be more profitably employed than in caricaturing the work of artist-etchers, though they are certainly no further from the mark in etching than in many other forms of art. But there are amateurs of another sort, students who are not the less earnest because they are not needy; men and women—their number is not small, and is increasing, too—to whom nothing seems quite so well worth doing as the work of the artist. I see no reason why less should be expected of them because their hands are free.

What, after all, was Goethe but an amateur? What was Leonardo but the prince of amateurs? I am sorry that so good a word has lost so much of its significance, and has come to be applied only to those who trifle with high occupations.

I think it is Mr. Ruskin who has somewhere said that the surest test of the quality of our minds is the use we make of leisure. Now of those who devote themselves to art I should say it is only the amateur who has leisure, and without him and his influence I hardly see how intelligent and appreciative patronage is possible. If the term is used with the significance which such a view of the subject makes possible, I am sure that for the very same reasons as those for which it commends itself to the professional painter, the most artistic and delightful of the arts in black and white commends itself to him who deserves the name of amateur.

CHAPTER VI.

IT is too true. While the words are yet in Sarah's mouth, the door opens and admits the red face, the grizzled fringe, and the black and white plaid gown that they have all been apprehensively expecting.

"Any admittance?" cries the burly voice, as the owner enters without awaiting an answer to her question. "All alive and well?"

"We are all alive," replies Sarah gloomily, giving a hand ten degrees limper even than that one which she had vouchsafed to Rivers. "As to being well—"

"Why are you all sitting in the dark? Why are all your blinds down?" interrupts the other breathlessly, unable any longer to contain the curiosity with which she has been bursting all the way up the long stone stairs.

There is a moment of stupefied silence, as the conviction flashes coldly on all their minds that they have over-reached themselves.

"I happened to look up as I was passing," continues Miss Watson inquisitively, "and saw that the blinds were all drawn down. I thought that of course I had better inquire the reason at once; but I could not get any satisfactory answer out of your page-boy—Tommy he tells me his name is. I had a little talk with him on the stairs coming up; he does not seem a very intelligent boy—Tommy—does he?"

"We had him cheaper by getting him out of an idiot asylum," replies Sarah gravely; and Rivers, moon-struck as he is, explodes.

"Grandmamma quite well?"

"Do you think that she is dead, and that that is why we have the blinds down?" says Sarah ironically. "Thanks, she is quite well, but she is not up yet. You see it is a little early!"

At this side-stroke Rivers winces. Does not it apply equally to him? But upon the object at whom it is aimed it is absolutely wasted.

"No bad news from England, eh?"

"Thanks, no!"

"I was afraid"—her eyes wandering inquisitively round—"by seeing the blinds down, that you might have heard of the loss of a relation. No? Well, then, why are they all down?"

There was a moment's silence. What question can be easier, and yet more difficult, to answer. At last:

"There is no reason why they should not be pulled up now!" says Sarah dryly. "Mr. Rivers, up with the blinds!"

Mr. Rivers obeys. The houses on the other side of the street again come into sight, and the gloom flies.

"I am so glad of this opportunity to make your acquaintance, Mr. Rivers!" says Miss Watson, following him to the window, and cordially extending her large hand. "As soon as I heard your name I longed to ask you what Rivers you are? I know so many Rivers. I am sure that I must know all your people! What Rivers are you?"

The young man has turned, the blind-cord still in his hand, toward her. His face has grown nearly as red as hers, albeit the red is of a different quality.

"That is a rather posing question, is not it?" he says, with a confused laugh, the Englishman's difficulty in discussing himself being, in his case, intensified a hundredfold by the consciousness that Belinda is eagerly listening; "how can I describe myself?"

"All the rivers run into the sea, but the sea is not full!" says Sarah flippantly; and Rivers looks vexed.

There is not one among us, however wise and good and humble, who does not detest a joke upon his own name.

"I know Lord Rivers," continued Miss Watson, fixing him with her inexorable eye. "At least I may really say that I virtually know him; we were at the same hotel at Cairo for two nights together; and though we never exactly met, as he did not dine at the table d'hôte, yet there is a sort of freemasonry in being at the same hotel! How is Lord Rivers? is he quite well? Is there any chance of his coming here?"

"I have not the slightest idea," replied Rivers bluntly. "He is not the most distant connection of mine!"

"Ah! then—" with a look of enlightenment, "you are one of the other Rivers; one of the Stukeley Rivers—Sir Edward Rivers' family. Now do tell me, which of the brothers are you? I am always so puzzled amongst them! Are you Humphrey? or Randulphus? or a younger one still?"

"I am neither Humphrey, nor Randulphus, nor a younger one still!" answers Rivers sulkily, his usually amiable and always beautiful boy's face beginning to look rather dangerous under this continued baiting. "I am not related to Sir Edward Rivers, and I never heard of Stukeley!"

"Then I declare that I am quite at a loss," says she baffled.

But as her eye shows no sign of releasing him, as she is evidently bent upon extracting from him a response of some kind, he has to make what shift he can to answer her.

"I am sure I do not know what Rivers we are!" he says, in a shy, fierce voice, looking out of the window, as if with some vague idea of escape by it. "There are a good many of us, and we live in Yorkshire, and my father is in business!"

As the back of his head is turned to the room, and as, unlike Sarah, he has no eyes in it, perhaps she is justified in putting up one hand as a speaking-trumpet to her lips, and noiselessly mouthing through it for her sister's benefit the syllables, "Ar-ti-fi-ci-al ma-nure!" At all events, this is what she does.

"She is really gone!" says Sarah, turning away from the window half an hour later, after a cautious reconnoitre, and drawing a long breath. "Mercifully, the Greens were passing, and she fell upon them from behind, so that they could not escape her. Generally, she has a way of pretending to have forgotten her umbrella, and coming back to hear what one is saying of her."

"I wonder she has not been cured of that before now," says Belinda gravely, "as she never can have heard any good."

"It is the triumph of hope over experience!" rejoins Sarah. "Well," with a gay look at Rivers, "at least it is a comfort to think that she has at last found out conclusively what Rivers you are!"

"Or, rather, what Rivers I am not," replies he dryly; "it is not quite the same thing."

"To be neither Humphrey nor Randulphus!" says Belinda, with a happy, shy, rallying smile; "how sad!"

"I wonder, now, what your Christian name really is?" says Sarah. "Come out, Slutty; she is gone! Slutty always crawls under this bureau when Miss Watson calls; she hates her so! I have tried to teach her to bite her leg, but she will not go so far as that. Yes now, what is your Christian name?"

"What should you think?" he asks joyously, his heart leaping wildly at that small coy smile which his dear lady has just spared him. "What do I look like?"

"You might be Arthur," replies Sarah, sitting down with Slutty in her lap, and looking him over well and thoroughly; "there is no reason why you should not be Reginald; and I have heard of more unlikely things than your being Guy!"

"Wrong! grossly wrong!" replies he, enduring her scrutiny with the most perfect sang froid, and, indeed, giving her back her cool hardy look. "I never heard a worse shot! And you—what do you think?" his tone growing suddenly reverent, and his bold eyes veiled and shy.

"You shall give me only one guess?" she answers merrily. "I say—David!"

"David!" repeats Sarah scornfully. "How likely! Try Goliath at once!"

But Rivers, in an ecstasy of pleasure at his love's intuition, is crying out:

"How did you know? How did you find out? I never told you!"

"Was not it a good guess?" she says with a demure smile. "No; it was not a guess; I read it—you know you sat before us last Sunday—in the fly-leaf of your prayer-book in church!"

She blushes faintly as a China rose at this admission of how her thoughts and eyes had stolen away from praise and supplication to spell out his name.

"David!" repeats Sarah, in an extremely dubious voice. "H'm!"

"It is a family name among us," he adds in explanation; among my mother's people, that is."

There is a moment's silence. For the first and only time in her life Sarah wishes for Miss Watson back again, to ascertain, as she undoubtedly would by direct inquiry, who and what his mother's people are. But as she herself does not feel quite equal to the task, the fact remains wrapped in as much mystery as does the nature of his father's commercial operations.

"Well, I suppose," says the young man, sighing heavily, and gently and reluctantly setting down Slutty (Slutty loves him; he has mastered the exact spot in her back which demands delicate and perennial scratching. She has forsaken Sarah to jump up on his lap, though she has in general but a poor opinion of men's laps, as cold and hollow pretenses)—"I suppose I must be going. I am afraid that you have already had too much of me!"

He pauses, with a wistful look toward Belinda's bent and shining head, but neither girl contradicts him: the one because she so cordially agrees with him; the other because she so passionately dissents. He moves unwillingly to the door, but there halts again. "And—and Wessenstein?" he says desperately.

"What about it?" cries Sarah peevishly. "Did not you hear us calling all our gods to witness to Miss Watson that we were so broken with fatigue since Moritzburg that we could scarcely lift a finger?"

"I heard you," he answers bluntly, laying a significant stress upon the pronoun.

"Now I warn you," says she, holding up her forefinger threateningly at him, "that if you mention Wesenstein again, I shall stop my ears."

"There are other places besides Wesenstein," returns he pertinaciously; something about Belinda—not anything she has said, certainly, for she has said nothing—but possibly the unnatural fury with which she is knitting, encouraging him to persevere.

"Of course!" very snappishly; "Tharandt!"

"No, not Tharandt; there are other places beside Tharandt. Loch Mühle, for instance; have you ever seen Loch Mühle?"

"Never!" very crossly; "and I humbly hope that I never shall. Why should we go anywhere?" pursues she, burying her ill-humored face in the sofa-cushion; "leave me, leave me to repose. I have not the faintest wish to go anywhere."

"And you never do anything but what you wish yourself?" asks Rivers snubbingly, eyeing with extreme disfavor her petulant prettiness. To him she does not appear in the least pretty.

"Never, if I can help it!" replies she, raising her head, surprised and languidly titillated by his tone, which is not what she had expected in him. "Do you?"

He laughs dryly.

"Never, if I can help it; but in a large family one cannot help it."

"In a large family," repeats she. "You are one of a large family?"

"It depends upon what you call large; there are six of us."

"Five too many," rejoins she promptly. "And where do you come—third—fourth?"

"I come first."

"Are you taking a leaf out of Miss Watson's book?" asks Belinda severely, joining in the dialogue for the first time.

"I think I am," replies the other composedly.

"Well, then, we will make a bargain: I will ask you no more questions if you will promise to invite me to go no more expeditions; there!"

So saying, she re-buries her head in the pillows; and as she totally declines to raise it again, and as neither does Belinda add another syllable, he is at length obliged to withdraw defeated.

For a moment after he has disappeared, Belinda still knits violently, her forehead puckered, a warm pink wave ebbing and flowing in her cheeks, and a sharp brush between love and pride going on in her heart. For the first time in her life pride goes to the wall. She tosses down her stocking and springs to the door.

"Mr. Rivers!" she calls tremblingly; "Mr. Rivers!"

He must have walked very slowly, for he has only just reached the double doors of egress.

"Yes," he answers pantingly; "yes?"

"It is nothing," she says, faltering into deep shyness again, and quivering under the fervent expectancy of his look. "I only wanted to tell you that—that it is not my fault; that, for my part, I should have liked to go to Loch Mühle."

"Then why in Heaven's name could not you say so sooner?" asks Sarah, whose long ears have again served her faithfully, pouncing out upon them. "I am sorry that his name is David," she says reflectively, a little later, when he has gone, jubilant now, to arrange the excursion. "I am afraid it looks ill; the poor people are so fond of Scripture names."

A high sun, hot and benign; a west wind, sweet with last night's rain; myriads and myriads of blossomed fruit-trees; villages that seem built of and buried in snow; enormous bunches of pear-blossoms, that look as if the boughs must break under their weight; the ways all white with arches of cherry-bloom; the horses trotting over a carpet of strewn cherry-petals, as at some high wedding pomp; and a seat opposite Belinda, who has allowed him to open her parasol for her. Is it any wonder that Rivers has forgotten that it is near three o'clock, and that at an hour at which most people are full, he and his company are still fasting? But they have not forgotten. For the last mile and a half he has been pelted by an ever sharper shower of anxious and peevish questions as to whether the Kutscher knows the road; as to whether they have still a mile, two miles, half a mile to go; as to whether he is sure that there is a Gast-hof; as to whether, lastly and desperately this, he is certain that there is such a place as Lohmen (it is at Lohmen that they are to lunch) at all.

"I suppose," says the Professor finally, putting on his spectacles in order to look full and murderously at him through them (he does not often look at undergraduates, he dislikes them too much), "I suppose that you are aware that the whole responsibility of the excursion rests with you?"

"Yes, I am aware," replies Rivers inattentively and dreamily.

She has just deigned to accept a little switch from him—a flowered cherry-bough, blossomed to the end of each brown twig—and is daintily waving away the audacious summer flies with it.

The Professor has five distinct good reasons for being cross, and for most people one suffices. Firstly, he did not want to come at all; secondly, he has the threatenings of a snuffly cold, contracted in the long Moritzburg grass and among the Moritzburg pigs, and probably to be sensibly worsened by the present pleasure-trip; thirdly, he hates sitting with his back to the horses—a thing which his votaries indeed seldom suffer him to do—but in this case there has been no suggestion of offering him a front seat; fourthly, his digestion has been for so many years his master, that it now allows him with impunity no least derangement of his meal-times; fifthly and lastly, Sarah has three times flagrantly pretended not to hear him when he addressed her, and has once crabbedly asked him to let her have a little more room. For Sarah is, if possible, still crosser than he.

The low, trivial words that the sweet wind carries not to her, but alongside of her; the ardent iron-gray eyes that she is always accidentally meeting, and that instantly lose their ardor the moment they encounter hers; the dust, for, despite last night's rain, there is dust; the sense of physical emptiness, that no tickled vanity, no warmed passions redeem, have wrought her by the time they at length alight at the door of a simple but not untempting-looking Gast-hof to such a pitch of ill-humor as makes her betrothed's mild fractiousness pale beside it.

"How cross they are!" says Rivers, having, for the first time, realized this long sufficiently patent fact, and looking after them with sunny wonder, as the Professor hastens into the inn to order luncheon, eagerly followed by Sarah.

"And how greedy!" adds Belinda.

And having thus calmly characterized their companions' vices, they stray away together down the little garden path, where the bloody warriors and the cat-faced pansies merrily grow in the sandy border, and forget them. They have not, however, been long left to watch the happy butterflies hover, and the young flowers blow, before a captious voice overtakes and recalls them.

"I thought," cries the Professor from the open Gasthof door, and in a voice whose exasperation is sensibly sharpened even since it was last heard in querulous inquiry five minutes ago—"I thought, Mr. Rivers, that you gave us to understand that there was a good hotel to be found here?"

"And is not there?" answers the young man absently.

He has just thieved a sweetbriar spray, young and vernal, and is making it fit for his love's tender hand by carefully nipping off all its thorns.

"I think," pursues the voice, "that an inn can hardly be qualified as good when there is not a single vegetable to be procured—not even a potato!"

"Of course it cannot," replies Rivers serenely. "Look!" pointing joyously out to his companion a poised butterfly opening and shutting its freaky wings on a dark pansy face; "does not he look jolly? He is the first tortoiseshell I have seen this spring."

"And where," continues the voice, in an intenser key of resentment, "there is absolutely nothing of any kind to be obtained except veal!"

"Except veal!" repeats Rivers, rousing himself with an effort into a simulation of interest; "you do not say so! Well, but," lapsing into unavoidable radiance again, "does it matter much? German veal is always so good. 'I hope,' looking sunnily round, 'that no one dislikes veal!'"

There is a sulky silence, broken only by Belinda's murmuring that she loves it, and by the Professor's remarking that all white meats are more or less indigestible. Whether they like it or not, however, further inquiry only serves to confirm the fact that they must either resign themselves to a luncheon of kalbfleisch and bread (calf-flesh being the one universally procurable flesh in Germany) or not lunch at all. Nor, when this is settled, does the calf-flesh seem in any hurry to appear. By-and-by, indeed, a leisuely Blowsabella of a serving-maid lays a coarse, clean cloth and some knives and forks in what she calls the bavillion, a homely arbor at the garden end; and thither the Professor at once repairs, and seating himself at his place before the empty table, lays his watch before him, and seems to derive a bitter solace from counting the numerous moments as they pass, and announcing them by five at a time aloud to Rivers. But Rivers does not hear.

"Do not let us go near them," he says in a cajoling, low voice to Belinda, willing her away again into the sun and the flowers; "in their present frame of mind, it is not safe."

"Well, you know it is not the first of April, and you have made fools of us!" she answers, a little dryly.

"Are you starving?" he cries, roused into sudden, tardy compunction.

The Professor's and Sarah's pangs had left him cold as a stone, merciless as Herod.

"Famished!" replies she; but she says it with such a charming smile of absolute well-being, making mirthful her grave lips, that his misgivings fly. For all they care, the kalbfleisch may be an hour, two hours, three in coming!

It has been smoking for a couple of minutes, indeed, on the table, and the Professor and Sarah have been seen greedily to help themselves before they think it worth while to draw nigh. When at length they do:

"It is uneatable!" says the Professor, laying down his knife and fork with a shocking calmness, and regarding Rivers as he approaches in his infuriating, senseless radiance with a glassy look of vengeful despair.

"Impossible!" cries the young man, hastily helping himself, and boldly taking a good mouthful. "Pah!" changing countenance; "but it is, though! What filth!"

Nor is this expression, albeit strong, at all too strong to qualify the plat now set before these hungry persons. In the first place, it is but too clear that the kalb has originally died a natural death, and has afterwards, perhaps in order to disguise this slight accident, undergone every possible variation of baking, boiling, roasting, stewing, frying, seething! But, after all, it is not disguised.

There is a blank, sulphurous silence. They all look at Rivers.

"I thought," says the Professor, in a cutting, small voice, "that you gave us to understand—"

"What does it matter what he gave us to understand?" cries Sarah, in a fury, rudely interrupting him. "The more fools we to believe him! It would be more to the purpose if you or he or anybody would give us to understand how we are to get back to Dresden alive!"

Another murderous silence, broken this time by Belinda diffidently syllabing the word "eggs."

"Eggs, of course," cries Rivers, snatching at the happy suggestion, and darting a look of enamored gratitude at her who has made it. "How stupid not to think of them before! nothing in the world better than a fresh egg, nor more nutritious!"

This last clause is a poor little sop thrown to the Professor's ireful maw. In a moment he has fled swift as any scudding rabbit to the house, and in two seconds more is back again, beaming.

"Of course they can have eggs—any number; and in three minutes at the outside they will be cooked."

But the three minutes pass, and three more, and three more again.

"I wish," says Sarah, addressing herself in a tone of the most intense and poignant crossness to the young man, "that you would kindly sit somewhere where I could not see you; I think I could bear it better if you did. You look so idiotically cheeprful!"

Even as she speaks, the Dienst-mädchen comes into sight, sauntering deliberately down the path; having by her want of sympathy with their sufferings clearly amply dined herself, and with a plate upon which many eggs are drunkenly rolling about together in her hand.

At this simple sight the Professor smiles faintly, and even Sarah's sulky brow grows smooth. But alas! too soon do they exult! It takes but one glance to show that no new-laid eggs are these, milky and warm, over which the triumphant hens have but just ceased chuckling. Elderly, nay, veteran eggs are these, as their dirty, mottled hue but too plainly testifies. The only wonder is how a single family can have become possessed of so many addled eggs at once.

"You had better take care how you open it!" says Rivers, laughing nervously, and with an ill-timed attempt at a joke, as the Professor cautiously cracks one, his fellows looking breathlessly on; "it will probably go off with a bang!"

Nobody smiles.

CHAPTER VII.

"I HAVE cut my own throat," says Rivers ruefully, taking six addled eggs out of his pocket, in which he has carried them off, to prevent their being imposed as fresh upon any more unsuspecting travelers.

It is somewhat later in the day. They have shaken the dust of Lohmen off their feet; have tramped, faint and silent, along a charming road whose wayside flowers they do not see, and through a long straggling village, whose high-pitched roofs and general picturesque-ness they execrate, to Loch Mühle, whither, with premature confidence in the Lohmen Gast-hof's powers of entertainment, they had sent on the carriage. They have passed down a gentle incline, and found at the foot the mill-house, sitting by the brisk mill-stream. The Frau Müllerin has brought them out excellent milk, coffee, cakes, and eggs, unimpeachably, splendidly fresh, and they have eaten them at a snowy-draped deal table, to the sound of the whizzing mill and the dripping water and the caroling birds. Here by the riverlet sits the floury mill, and past it the quick stream runs, and over a small weir, a few yards higher up, the noisy bright water pours. Ostensibly to look at the weir, but in reality only urged by that rage for being tête-à-tête which possesses such happy fools as they, even if it be only to say to one another, "How much dust!" or "How many flies!" Belinda and Rivers have left their companions, and now stand side by side at the river's edge.

"They might have got over the veal!" says Rivers, pensively regarding the eggs in his hand, previous to hurling them with vindictive force, one after the other, across the stream.

"Never!" interpolates Belinda, with emphasis.

"But it was these that gave them the coup de grâce!" adds the young man, wrathfully aiming the last one at an opposite rock, against which it breaks with a dull, addled thud. "I suppose they will never make an excursion with us again?"

"Never!" repeats Belinda, with still more energy. "I am sure that I would not, if I were they."

"Then next time," says Rivers hurriedly, and looking away, "we shall have to go by ourselves."

It is the most audacious and leading speech he has ever made her; and whether it be his own audacity or the picture his words have conjured up, his voice trembles. What a picture! A whole long summer-day!—she and he together, and alone! A day when he need never take his eyes off her; when he would ask leave to lie at her feet, and might pull her flowers and soft grasses, and could count her eyelashes and each breath she sweetly drew; and perhaps, at the very end of the day, if he were very good, and she in a very gentle mood—he has to own that she is not always gentle—she might give him one of her long white hands to kiss—once, just once! In his imagination he is already feeling its cool satin beneath his lips, when her reply comes and at once knocks down his card-house.

"How likely!" she says curtly, also turning her head, but in the opposite direction to that which he has turned his.

"You would not like it, of course?" he says, chappellenly, and yet with a sort of slight interrogation in his tone.

She would not like it! To herself she almost laughs. Is it possible that he does not guess that the reason why she has turned away her face is that she dares not let him see the stir and tumult that his mere suggestion has made there. But he would be very much keener-sighted, and a much greater coxcomb than he is, if he could draw this conclusion from her harsh and snubbing words.

"I never waste time," she says chillingly, "in speculating as to whether I should like or dislike what is absolutely out of the question."

There is a slight silence. Rivers feels as if a large pail of half-frozen water had been thrown over him, and were now trickling down the nape of his neck. Belinda is still hearing, with passionate vexation, the sound of her own ungracious voice. Why is it that she never can hit the juste milieu of cool and friendly civility? How is it that her heart is so burning hot, and her words so icy cold? Her eyes, averse from meeting the reproach of his, look across to where, on the other side of the racing beck, the rocks rise straight up, and out of their clefts slight little fir-trees grow, grasping the stony soil with their shallow roots, and dainty green birches wave, and just-new creasy ferns droop and sprout, and hang their small spring ensigns.

"What an iceberg you are!" says the young man at last, in a low tone of irrepressible mortification.

"An iceberg?" she repeats, lifting one hand to her face, and with her forefinger and thumb gently pinching her own trembling under-lip. "Yes; so I have often been told. I think," after a slight pause, "that I am a little tired of being told it."

"Are you tired of being it?" says Rivers, sinking his voice still more, though there is no one but the brook to overhear him, and it is much too occupied with its own sweet chatter to attend to him, and giving her a piercing look as he speaks.

For all answer she leaves him at once, and walks with such speed as if a mad bull were behind her, back to the other pair of sweethearts. He follows her, despair at his heart—the light lover's despair, that is to say, that a frown engenders and a smile kills; thinking, heart-sickly, that he will now have to redeem his own rash forward step by half a dozen tiresome retrograde ones.

But fortune deals more kindly with him than he had expected of her. The Professor and Sarah are both asleep. Coffee is generally supposed to be a wakeful potion; but in their case, mixed in nice proportions with fatigue, ill-humor, and boredom, it has had a precisely contrary effect. The Professor's head has dropped forward on his chest—always a trying position to any one beyond rosy childhood; the veins on his forehead have started forward, the blood has run into his long nose, and his under-lip protrudes. It is clearly an unintended nap, which has overtaken him accidentally, in defiance of his rules, and contrary to his sanitary principles. Sarah's, on the other hand, is the slumber, deliberately undertaken, of a person who sees in sleep the most endurable mode of getting over an irksome period of time. Her feet, carefully covered by a shawl, repose on a chair in front of her; a light ulster, rolled up so as to form a little bolster, nicks comfortably into the nape of her neck; her head is so much thrown back as to afford an excellent opportunity for cutting her charming white throat.

"It would be a pity to disturb them," she says, whispering.

"A thousand pities!" assents he eagerly. "Would not it be better," speaking with a timorousness born of his late rebuff, "for us to go out of earshot?"

She looks first at the mill, then reluctantly at him.

"Should you think that there was a nice path beyond?" she asks demurely.

So through the noisy white mill they go, nodding friendly to the powdery miller as they pass. Along the river path they saunter, rocks above their glad heads—rocks, not frowning nor grand, nor by any means very big and beetling, but with finest grass and yellow wall-flowers nestled in their rifts, and making mimic gardens of their little ridges and crannies.

On their other hand the small river frolicking, and on its farther side rocks again, grass again, sun and flowers again: drooping birches and straight pines. At every step that carries them farther from the mill Rivers' spirits rise.

"I hope," he says, chuckling over the recollection, "I hope, for his own sake, that Professor Forth will awake first. If Miss Churchill sees him as we have just done, I would not give much for his chance!"

"And I would not give much for it, whichever wakes first!" answers Belinda, ominously.

By-and-by, though they are not at all tired, they sit down. After all, it is not so very unlike his vision—the vision that she had so disdainfully pooh-poohed. Nor when she speaks, does she, as he half-fears that she would, break the illusion, for her voice is gentle, almost apologetic.

"I should like to explain something to you, if you will attend to me."

If he will attend to her! Could he ever dare to think that any utterance of his idol's might be nonsense, it would be now. If he will attend to her! He who, if at dinner she ask him to pass the salt, listens with such entranced reverence, as if it were to the Spheres together singing.

"Do I usually not attend when you speak?" he asks, with timid irony.

He has rested his elbow on a little plat of soft turf upon the rock, and his head on his right hand, which brings him fully an inch and a half nearer her (in itself no despicable gain), and is feasting with leisurely rapture—there must be no discomfort of posture to mar such high enjoyment—on each slow turn of her head, on its thick white throat; and without any fear of Sarah's gimlet eyes derisively perforating him.

"I know," continues Belinda, who is not leaning on either elbow, but is sitting very upright and looking shy, "I am conscious that I have taken things you have said to me—little harmless, unmeaning, civil things," with a hasty blush of fear, lest she should be supposed to have attached too much importance to them, "very awkwardly! very surly!"

"Have you?" he answers ruefully. "I do not think you have taken them at all! I think you have thrown them back in my face."

"I know," she answers penitently; "that is what I wanted to explain to you. In point of fact," no longer blushing, but looking at him directly with her honest eyes, "I am not used to them!"

"Not used to civil speeches?" repeats he, in an accent of the most profound astonishment; he who when in her company is in a continual state of biting his own tongue out to prevent it from breaking into extravagant laudations; and who cannot but believe that all other created things are laboring under the same difficulty with himself!

She shakes her head.

"No; I am not. I suppose," looking reflectively at the flower-lipped brook, "that it is an unusual case; I think it must be owing to my forbidding manner!"

"Then why, in Heaven's name, have you a forbidding manner?" asks he in a sort of involuntary passion of wonder.

Even he cannot altogether deny the fact: and yet it seems so coarsely inconsistent with everything else about her. A forbidding manner with that throat, and those ears, and that nape to her neck! Her hair is dressed rather high in the French fashion, and she often turns her back upon him, so that he has a good view of it.

"Why have I a short nose?" replies she, with a good-humored shrug; "you might just as well ask me that! It is a misfortune with which I was born!"

But as he makes no light rejoinder—poor fellow! he is beyond it, up to his neck in the hopeless dullness of a serious passion—only enveloping her with the smothered flame of his silent looks, she grows shy and grave again.

"It is a bonâ fide misfortune," she says, slightly shaking her head; "I have no wish to be forbidding. I think in my heart I am quite as anxious to please as any one else can be; I will even own," with a brief, nervous smile, "that I should like whenever I entered a room to hear a buzz of admiration run round it! No, no!" suddenly changing her tone and stretching out both hands forbiddingly toward him; "do not try to say that I might now; if you do, I shall go back to the mill at once!"

"It would hardly be worth while," replies he dryly; "you might put up with my clumsy compliments this once—by-the-bye, as it happens, I was not thinking of paying you one then—since it is, as you say, the last time!"

She has reddened painfully at the idea of having sought to avert a flattery which, after all, was not coming; but she tries to carry it off lightly.

"Perhaps it may not be the last," she says cheerfully; "we have always one resource left; we can ask Miss Watson to chaperon us. I never knew her refuse to go anywhere, at any time, with anybody, and she never has any previous engagement."

He laughs, but adds quickly with reflective seriousness:

"She would be better than nothing."

"She would be able, too," says Belinda, idly rolling her open parasol to and fro along the narrow path in front of her, and smiling rather consciously at her own thoughts, "she would be able, too, to repair any omission she may have made in the catechism she put you through the other day. She might ask you a few more home questions as to your ancestors and your social standing, etc."

"I am sure she is very welcome," answers the boy straightforwardly. "The only thing that I am afraid of, for her sake, is that she has already pumped me nearly dry! I think I have told her everything. What did I tell her—that I had just left Oxbridge?"

Belinda shakes her head.

"No, you did not tell her that; because, if you had, she would certainly have asked you at once if you had not been plowed; or if you were quite sure that you had not been expelled!"

"That we live in Yorkshire?" continues he, aiding memory by lifting a hand to his forehead; "that there are six of us? and that my father is an ironmaster?"

"An ironmaster!" repeats Belinda, suddenly discontinuing her idle fidgeting with her sunshade, and looking up with great animation. "No; you certainly did not tell her that! An ironmaster, is he?"

There is such obvious surprise and pleasure in her tone that Rivers looks at her with some astonishment.

"Yes," he answers, "an ironmaster. Why, what did you think he was?"

But this is a question to which it is, of course, quite impossible that she can truly respond. How can she unfold to him Sarah's degrading supposition, nor her own relief at learning to what an eminently respectable branch of commerce his family belong? An ironmaster, indeed! Why it is the stuff of which merchant princes are made! So she only answers, with something of a stammer:

"Oh, I—I—of course, I did not know! I had no idea!"

"It is to be hoped, for her own sake," says Rivers, raising himself from his elbow, and looking proud and eager, "that she will not get me upon the subject of my father, for it is a theme upon which I am apt to be long-winded."

"Is it?" she answers, interested, while in her heart she is calculating how soon she can produce to Sarah this triumphant refutation of her suspicion. Probably not before they reach home.

"I know that one cuts but a poor figure swaggering about one's own belongings," continues the young man, his love-sick air for the moment gone, and with courage and spirit in his eyes; "but if ever a man deserved to be looked up to, my father does!"

"Does he?" now very much interested.

"If ever a man made a plucky up-hill fight of it, it was he!" Her heart feels a slight qualm. Up-hill! it is clear, then, that he rose from the ranks! "To begin with, he started in life without a penny!" The qualm grows sicker. He is going to tell her that his admirable father swept out the warehouse! Well, recovering herself, very creditable of him if he did, and Sarah need never know! "My grandfather had got through most of his money racing," pursues Rivers innocently. Her spirits run up like quicksilver. Though there is undoubtedly greater moral culpability in squandering your children's heritage in horse-racing than in earning them an honest livelihood with a besom, yet, such is the force of habit and association, Belinda is relieved that her lover's grandfather apparently did the one and left undone the other! "And so father had nothing in the world but his younger son's share of my grandmother's fortune to look to; but he gave that up at once to the others, and faced the world without a stiver! You may think whether he had to put his shoulder to the wheel! For years he worked like a—like a navy. Poor dear old boy! when I think of what his youth was, and what mine is!"

He breaks off in genuine emotion, eyes kindling and hot color rising. And Belinda, lovingly thinking how well such generous enthusiasm becomes him, keeps a sympathetic silence.

"And now," continues Rivers, sighing—"now that we hoped he had got into smooth water, and might take breath and enjoy his life a little, comes this depression in iron; but," his diffidence rushing back in floods upon him at the thought of how he has been teasing with his egotism his dear Lady Disdain, "I do not know why I should bother you with all this!"

"I do not know why you should not," she answers softly.

If only she could always speak in that tone! At seeing her thus gentle, approachable, humane, all his splendid hopes seem suddenly set within his reach. Would not he be a poltroon who deserved to lose them forever if he did not now stretch out a hand to grasp them?

"I hope," he says, not daring to look fully at her, and covertly, unknown to her, touching an outlying ribbon of her gown to give himself courage—"I hope," trembling exceedingly, "that some day you will know my father."

"Do you?" she answers curtly.

Instantly she has frozen up again. Her heart is beating even faster than his. Eager as he may be to make her known to whatever is nearest and dearest to him on earth, he cannot be more eager than she is to be made known; but her repellent voice and her chill face—in reality the outcome of a fierce shyness which she can no more master than she can control the course of her blood—give him to infer that in his last speech he has outstepped the bounds set him by her.

For a moment he keeps a hot, humiliated silence. Then, reflecting that he is but a dastard, who can be beaten back from his heart's desire by one rebuff; taking comfort, too, from what she had lately told him as to her own shortcomings in manner, he plucks up courage for one more effort.

"I should like," he says—but he has involuntarily moved half a pace further away from her, and in his tone there is less heartiness and more misgiving than before—"I should like you, of course, to know all my people."

"Should you?" she answers dryly. The very effort to steady it, the potency of the emotion which dominates her, making her voice harsh and surly; and with a discourteous, stiff laugh: "I am afraid it is not very likely!"

There is a dead silence. For to-day there is no more fear of his transgressing her limits. He sits looking blankly at the brook. If, in the crises of foolish men's and women's lives there were but a go-between to interpret! But there never is!

For full five minutes the river loudly runs, and the finches piercingly sing, without any human noise to break in upon their concert. At last Belinda, who has been snatching remorseful glances at the severe melancholy of her sweetheart's profile, hazards a timid propitiation:

"Have you many sisters?" she asks conciliatingly.

"Two," he answers shortly, looking straight before him; "but," with a spurious smile, "I have inflicted enough of my family upon you for one day."

She is too much wounded to make any rejoinder, and the conversation, which before had flown as glibly as the stream or as the lark's roulades, drops into silence again. At their feet the rock-shadows couch. The sun's rays, no longer vertical, blaze obliquely upon the water and upon the sunlike dandelion flowers.

"It must be late," says Belinda reluctantly, her eyes turning from the hurrying sparkles of the beck to consult his face; "had we better be going back?"

She had hoped for an earnest protest from him, a supplication for yet a few moments more of their bright solitude. But none such comes! He makes no sort of objection; but, on the contrary, rises at once and stands ready to attend her; and silently they return to the mill.

CHAPTER VIII.

"A whole long month of May in this sad plight,
Made their cheeks paler by the break of June.

'To-morrow will I bow to my delight,
To-morrow will I ask my lady's boon!'

'Oh may I never see another night,
Lorenzo, if thy lips breathe not love's tune.'
So spake they to their pillows; but alas!
Honeyless days and nights did he let pass."

"WHAT a mercy it is to be alone for a change!" says Sarah; "is not it? You do not assent with the warmth I should have expected, eh? And what a much richer and rarer mercy it is that we are not to be driven a-pleasuring twenty hot miles at a stretch, and carouse on rotten eggs at the end!"

It is near noon, and the sisters are walking in the Grosse Garten, that green and ample pleasure-ground, with its tall trees and its intersecting drives, of the Dresden burghers. Against a peevish sky the Museum of Antiquities lifts its greenish roof; in its pool, with the little swan-house in the middle, there is beginnto come a vernal glow from the reflections of the young-leaved horse-chestnuts standing round; in the flower-beds the pansies and cinerarias bloom purple and yellow.

Belinda's only answer to her sister's self-gratulations is to stoop and console Slutty, who has returned in some disorder from a slight excursion, having been coarsely hustled away by the shabby surly Polizei, who guard and pompously warn off profane dogs from the meagre blossoms.

"The beauty of these straight drives," continues Sarah, thoughtfully eyeing one of the long vistas of trees that gradually lessens away to nothing, "is that you never can be taken by surprise in them; nobody can pounce out upon you from round a corner; it is merely a question of long sight. Now, if I saw my admirer in the distance, I should simply whip behind one of these friendly trees," looking up at an oak that, still wintrily brown, rises from the tenderly greening undergrowth. "What would you do if you saw yours?"

"I do not know which you mean," answers Belinda, with an awkward attempt at gayety, for this morning she is not gay; "I have so many!"

"No, you have not," replies Sarah calmly; "but you have one. How long you will keep him is another question. Judging by the crushed and flattened condition to which you had reduced him last evening, I should say probably not long."

"At all events," cries Belinda, whom this chance cut has stung more deeply than it was intended, "at all events, I had not reduced him to the condition of foaming rage to which you had brought Professor Forth. He said," laughing unwillingly, "that if he had not known that you were sincerely attached to him, he should have had difficulty in overlooking your conduct!"

"Do you think he will jilt me?" cries Sarah in a delighted voice, and with a radiant smile. "No," shaking her head; "no such luck. My conduct was not good," with a candid air; "but it had its palliations—he fell asleep!"

"So did you."

"But did I look like him?" dryly. "Anyhow, with my good resolutions, it was a case of 'look in his face, and you forget them all.'"

A pause. A solitary rider is cantering along the drive. A blue Gardereiter is practicing his four-in-hand team of chestnuts in a sort of phaeton, up and down, up and down. The girls have reached a spot where there is a little quiet peep among the trees; a plot of lush green grass, vividly green, backed by sedate high firs, across which a few young birches are throwing their infinitely delicate leafage, and stretching their shining white stems.

"It seems he has a mother," says Sarah presently, her eyes following the diminishing Gardereiter and his team.

"Has! had, you mean!"

"Has. I am afraid I let him see that I thought it a remarkable instance of longevity." She stops to laugh, and then goes on, letting fall each little sentence with deliberate serenity. "She lives with him; she is in her dotage; she never stops asking questions; and it seems that the chiefest of his wife's married joys is to consist in answering them."

"Was it at that stage of his confidences that you cried out, 'Ceci est insupportable!' and took to your heels and left him?" asks Belinda dryly.

"It must have been somewhere about then," answers Sarah modestly. "He did not recognize the quotation, and he was displeased at the sentiment. However," with a shrug, "I will not do it again, for your sake, and in your interests; and if he does not fall asleep, and shoot out his under lip, I think I shall be able to hold out until we go. This is the fourth," reflectively checking off the numbers on her fingers; "one, two, three, four, five—in less than five weeks we shall be in London."

"In less than five weeks!" repeats Belinda, stopping short and paling, while an expression of something very like terror looks out of the pupils of her dismayed eyes.

"In less than five weeks!" assents Sarah, nodding. "I heard granny telling Gustel that she would not need her services after the first of June, and courteously adding how glad she would be to be rid of her. Pooh!" laying her hand on her sister's shoulder, and giving her a shrewd, good-natured glance, "do not look so woe-begone; it is only a case of hurrying the pace a little."

Belinda's answer is a gesture of disgust. She walks quickly on.

"It is coarsely worded, I admit," continues the other, briskly following and keeping up with her; "but believe me, the advice is sound."

And so it may be; but as it is addressed to a person who is utterly incapable of making use of it, it is, like most other advice, wasted. To hurry the pace a little! For days and days afterwards the vile phrase recurs to her, dinning in her ears. As often—and that is not seldom—as the terror which had seized her in the Grosse Garten returns, so often does the brutal consolation with which her sister had tried to allay it. And as the priceless days slip by—slip away out of the fingers stretched forth in such a fever to detain them—it takes in her ears a horrible inflection of irony. Over and over and over again it keeps saying itself to her, as she lies awake at night, hour after hour—she can lie awake with the best of them now—hearing the engines screech and the trains thunder along the Böhmischer Bahn; watching the now withering blossoms drop from the pear-tree in the keen moonlight, and reckoning over to herself, until her brain grows dull and tardy sleep releases her, the small and diminishing hoard of precious hours during which there will be any object in living. For that what makes the essence of these days may not pass, may last on through a long transfigured lifetime, is a hope too glorious for her to dare lift her wet and dazzled eyes to its face. And meanwhile the days themselves are passing! Oh, how they are passing! To hurry the pace! How can she hurry the pace? she asks herself desperately, in the watches of the night, unconsciously accepting the detestable phrase. What can she, being she, do? How can she, tied down by her nature, by her stiff-necked virgin pride, by the very force of her dumb, pent passion, put out a finger to help herself? As easily can she make the gray irises of her eyes coal-black. Is it her fault that all strong emotion with her translates itself into a cold, hard voice, and a chill set face? With other women it translates itself into dimples and pink blushes and lowered eyes? Ah! but do they feel as she does? Sarah, for instance. When do men ever leave Sarah's company with the down-faced, baffled, white look with which Rivers has more than once quitted hers? Preening themselves rather; with sleeked feathers and cosseted vanity.

"I am not of the stuff of which the women that men love are made!" she says, thinking with an envious humility of her sister's graces, and staring blankly at the stove, beginning to glimmer white in the dawn. But to such a radical fault of nature and constitution, what remedy can there be? Tamely to copy her sister's airy charms and light coquetries?

"It would be the donkey playing the lap-dog!" she cries bitterly.

And yet, despite all their mischances, and their agues, and their desperations, what superb days these are? Few? Yes, perhaps. But when one reflects how much acute happiness may be packed into five minutes, and how many five minutes there are in a month, these two may be accounted to have been largely dowered, seeing that to many a one, not held to be specially spited by fortune, it is not given in all his or her lifetime to attain to one such day. Days when round each corner lurks a splendid possibility; days when each ring at the bell may mean that Heaven has opened. Very often it means nothing of the kind; it means Miss Watson, or Gustel, or a parcel; but it may.

In later life you may be as fortunate as you please; a laurel garland round your head, a colossal balance at Coutts', a chaste, fond wife and paragon children, but Heaven can no longer pounce upon you from round the street corner.

"Parting, they seemed to tread upon the air,
Twin roses by the zephyr blown apart,
Only to meet again more close, and share
The inward fragrance of each other's heart."

Yes, superb days! though on one or two of them the east wind blew piercingly, sweeping across the wide plain; and on another one or two the rain slid down from the heavy clouds, and blurred the windows.

But if it blurred the windows, did it not thereby make the task of Miss Watson's spyglass a more difficult one? and could the wind reach them in the little pine-wood behind the bleak Barracks, where they walked safe and warm on strewn fir-needles, and listened to its harmless scolding far above their happy heads?

How often they meet! how perpetually, how always! In the Alt Market, buying jonquils of the ugly German Fraus, as they sit under their great cotton umbrellas, queening it over their carrots and radishes; with the old houses, all different heights and shapes, russet-red roofed, endlessly dormer-windowed, standing round; at Plauen under the cool cherry orchards; at Meissen, in the hot Fabrik; in the Neu-Stadt, in the Alt-Stadt—everywhere. If, in after years, they revisit the bright city, what spot in all its precincts will be empty and innocent of associations to them?

Superb days! But they are going. Racing-pace they gallop by. How will it be when they are gone?

As the time passes, she grows ever less and less in a condition to face this problem. By-and-by she refuses to face it at all. When it comes it comes; but till then let her not be defrauded of her birthright. Let her, too, like the Mayflies and the Painted Ladies, have her span of careless, giddy bliss.

Whenever the conversation turns upon their departure, their journey, their arrival in London, upon anything that lies beyond the horizon of the now, and the here, if it be possible, she leaves the room; if it be not possible, she feverishly seeks to divert the talk into other channels.

But if she can fight thought off pretty well in the day, the variegated, distracting, kaleidoscope day, it indemonstrates itself at night. At night there it is, and nothing but it; no flickering leaves, or scudding clouds, or passers-by; nothing but it; an image drawn on night's plain black canvas with a hard, cutting clearness, as of an acid biting into steel; so that she must look at it.

As for her, at this time she would be thankful that there were no night at all. She does not need its refreshment. Without it her every power seems strung up to the highest pitch of efficiency, and she dreads, oh, how she dreads its solitude and silence! In the daytime, however unconventionally early or improbably late may be the hour, there is always a possibility, nay, a likelihood, of seeing his strapping figure and his burning eyes following the infant stolidity of the page, Tommy, into the salon. But in the night this is impossible. The night, therefore, is time absolutely wasted; now, too, when there is so little time left to waste. Of what use is it but for lying broad awake in, counting up how many hours the different moments, half-hours, of their meetings make? To her, just so much of life is worth reckoning as life at all; the rest is unimportant padding.

And he? As to him, the pavement of the quiet Lütichau Strasse before her door is worn hollow by his footsteps; his eyes devour her; his tongue stutters in lame speech to her, and altogether omits to answer when addressed by any one else. He has abandoned all other occupations in life but that of dogging her. But he has not asked her to be his wife.

To how much more purpose would be that one short practical question than all his resultless, love-sick maneuvers; than all the enormous nose-gays with which her room is over-filled and over-scented—for she cannot bear to throw away even the dead ones.

Perhaps this thought crosses her mind now and again. It certainly does Sarah's. It not only crosses it, but finds not unfrequent egress through her lips.

And meanwhile, May is three-parts over. The twenty-fourth of that month is reached, and, indeed, is almost ended; for dinner is past, and the girls and their grandmother are loitering over their light and leisurely dessert.

Their grandmother is an old lady with a bright eye—strangely bright, considering that it has wept, or been supposed to weep, for a good-natured husband, five promising sons, and three dutiful daughters—with a skin that is still no penance and that, if tradition lies not, it was once considered a high treat to kiss, and with a cap whose secret will die with her.

"Granny's religious principles are slack," Sarah is wont to say; "her morality is hazy, and in moments of excitement I have even known her let fly an oath; but on the other hand, she is thoroughly clean, and she always laughs at my jokes; so that, taking her all round, I could better spare a better woman. One knows that if she were called upon for any of the sublimer virtues of life, she would be found wanting. But, after all, the sublimer virtues are the thousand-pound notes that one seldom needs to change, and granny has plenty of the sixpences."

At the present moment her attention is absorbed in the effort, aided by a cracknel, to induce her new pug Punch to give three cheers for the Queen, with the thorough mastery over which elegant accomplishment he has arrived credited. On the present occasion, however, this talent seems inclined to hang fire, for, though in general a remarkably free barker, he is now, relatively to his sovereign, either disloyally silent, or irrationally incoherent. He will give ten cheers, or one and a half, or five muffled ones and a sneeze, but he will not give three.

"Granny," says Sarah, desisting from a vain effort to make Slutty cheer too, an endeavor which the latter frustrates by instantly rolling over on her back, and remaining in that position until all attempt at education is suspended—"granny, do you know that we are going to have a long and happy day at that everlasting Wesenstein to-morrow?"

"By all means, my dear; so as you do not ask me to go with you."

"I believe," says Sarah, regarding her grandmother with an air of cool dispassionate speculation, "that if we were to tell you that we were going to Greenwich Fair, or the Argyll Rooms, you would say 'By all means, my dears!' Only that I am not at all so sure that in that case you would add, 'So as you do not expect me to go with you!'"

The old lady laughs pleasantly, as if her granddaughter had paid her a compliment.

"Are you going to take your sweethearts with you?" asks she gayly; "your popinjays? No, Punch! three cheers! Nobody asked you to sneeze for the Queen!"

"Our popinjays?" cries Sarah, delighted. "Not mine, thank God! By-the-by, granny, as I have no further use for him, I am thinking of arranging a marriage between you and him. Your ages are suitable; and, though you have slightly the advantage in externals, he is greatly your superior in intellect."

"God bless my soul! No, thank you, child!" replies Mrs. Churchill with energy; "I prefer Belinda's."

"So do we all!" says Sarah, with a dry look.

At this last speech, Belinda, who has been growing ever hotter and more restless since the word "Wesenstein" was mentioned, suddenly leaves her seat under the pretext of comforting Slutty. Slutty hates Punch and his tricks, and the kudos that attends them, and has now squeezed herself under a piece of furniture to which, in general, only Miss Watson's voice has power to banish her, and from beneath which there is now nothing visible of her but a small spiteful face, full of mortification and ire. As she firmly resists all Belinda's blandishing inducements to her to come forth, though the agitated beat of her tail upon the floor proves that she is not wholly unmoved by them, the young girl desists, and passes into the neighboring salon, where, as there is no one to comment on her actions, she at once walks rapidly to the window, and looks eagerly down the dull and empty street. Not for long, however. Ere many moments have passed, a hand is laid on her shoulder; a rallying voice sounds in her ear:

"Come! he cannot be in sight yet! He will surely have the good feeling to let us swallow our coffee in peace."

Belinda gives a great start, and angrily shakes off her sister's touch.

"I cannot think how it concerns you!" she says testily, in intense vexation at having been surprised on the watch; "he does not trouble you much!"

"That is the rub!" replies Sarah calmly. "If he did, my nose would probably be flattened against the pane as well as yours: but seriously, I should not mind how often he came—not much, at least—not more," in candid parenthesis, "than I always hate seeing other people made love to, if it seemed to lead to anything; but, as I live, I cannot see that you are a step further advanced than you were when I spoke to you in the Grosse Garten three weeks ago. Come now, are you?"

For a moment Belinda is silent. Perhaps she has put that question to her own heart before now, and been as unable as now to give a satisfactory answer to it.

Instead of replying, "What a mercy it would be!" she says irritably, bringing her hands sharply together in a wrathful clasp, "If you could be persuaded to mind your own business, and leave me to be happy in my own way."

"Happy in your own way," repeats Sarah, with a shrewd look. "Yes; and when he has taken his twelve German lessons and gone home to his papa, the iron-monger—ironmaster—what is he?—how happy you will be in your own way then, eh?"

The other's hands unclasp, her arms drop limply to her sides; a sudden cold pallor chases the fierce vermillion from her cheeks.

"I suppose," she says slowly, "that there is a sort of coarse and brutal common sense in what you say; but I wonder," her voice breaking a little, "that it does not occur to even you, that since I am I, and not you—"

"Granny and I both agree," interrupts Sarah, "that it is the most tedious courtship we ever assisted at. Granny's idée fixe is that it should be arranged by the first, so that he may travel with us and look after the luggage; for my own part, I rather doubt if even after the twelve lessons he will be able to take our tickets and order our baths; at least," breaking into a laugh, "I know that my Schatz was not, though he is in correspondence with half the savants of Germany."

Belinda has turned again to the window, but, that her motives may be beyond suspicion, she is ostentatiously gazing in the opposite direction to that whence Rivers will come. An occasional writhing, shivering movement of her shoulders alone betrays what suffering her sister's ruthless and irrepressible rummaging in her holy of holies is causing her.

"We do not blame him," continues Sarah, with a candid air: "in fairness, I must say that we do not blame him. He is always trying to pour out his poor little tale like water out of a jug; and you, for reasons best known to yourself, are always corking it back again. Mark my words," emphasizing the sentence with three pats on Slutty's chest—Slutty lying, as usual, reversed and Cleopatra-like upon her lap, "you will do it once too often!"

"What shall I do once too often?" cries poor Belinda in an agonized voice, wheeling suddenly round at bay. "What do I do? If you could only explain that to me! I believe," beginning to falter, "that you mean well; I would—would try to take any hints you could give me."

"I have always told you that your high and mighty airs would be the death of you," rejoins Sarah, not perceptibly conciliated by her sister's humility. "If you could make them up into a parcel and toss them into the Elbe, and perhaps throw in your high nose, too, you would be a better and a happier woman."

"But I cannot!" very regretfully.

"I confess," says Sarah, after a pause, her eyes speculatively fixed on the two smart shoes extended before her—shoes whose unnatural altitude of heel, arch of instep, and crowding of lacerated toes proclaim them of the highest fashion—"I confess that I am a little disappointed that the news of our approaching departure did not bring him to the point. I should have thought that when that fact transpired, not even you could have iced him into silence."

"He does not yet know that we are going," replies Belinda, murmuringly. "I have not told him."

"Have not you?" cries Sarah, joyfully leaping up and beginning to frolic about on one toe. "Courage! Then our best card is still unplayed!" Suddenly ceasing her frisking, approaching her sister, and speaking with great eagerness: "You must tell him to-morrow, at Wesenstein. Choose a good place; well in the wood, if possible, out of eye and ear and Watson shot; be a little depressed, and make him ask you what is the matter with you; if you could let fall a tear or two? No? Ah!" with a gesture of impatience, "I am sure you will spoil the whole situation! Dear me!" with an accent of sincere regret, "what a charming thing I could have made of it!"

"I will tell him," replies Belinda meekly, yet wincing.

"If it is not brought to a crisis at Wesenstein," pursues Sarah, brutally, "I warn you that I shall ask him his intentions. I have been trying to spirit up granny to do it, but you know how she always shirks every duty; it would have come better from her, but since she will not, I must. I shall tell him that you are wasting away! I wonder," with an amused look at her sister's firm-fleshed, healthful beauty, "whether he will be idiot enough to believe it?"

THE PESSIMISM OF LEOPARDI.

STRANGELY enough the name of Giacomo Leopardi, which is slowly becoming familiar to English readers, is at present most often mentioned in connection with his views of pessimism. To have elaborated this is his least claim upon posterity, as those who know his writings are aware. It is because he is the leading Italian poet of the nineteenth century, and the most masterly Italian prose writer of any century, that he deserves a high place among the great intellects of the world. His philosophy, if I may dignify by this name the pessimism which is itself the surest proof of pitiable want of philosophy, overshadows all his works, prose and poetry alike; but even this cannot seriously mar their exquisite beauties. The steps by which Leopardi descended from the buoyant hopefulness of youth to the leaden gloom of despair were few, but they can be easily followed, for in few cases have the physical conditions stamped themselves so plainly on the moral and religious sides of a strong mind.

Born in the sleepy town of Recanati on June 29, 1798, of a noble and bigoted family, his youth was passed in studying the classics in his father's library. Partly deformed from his birth, his body was always sickly, his nerves became over-sensitive, and his intellect developed prematurely. At fourteen he had left his dull priestly tutors behind, thenceforth going on alone to master Latin, Greek, Hebrew, English, German, French and Spanish. In Recanati was none to appreciate, to advise, to bear company. His father and mother were apparently blind to his genius and to his needs. At sixteen he finished a fragment of the "Lives of Fifty-five Fathers of the Church," soon followed by a treatise on the "Popular Errors of the Ancients," in which no less than four hundred ancient writers were quoted, showing his already wide range of classical literature. At this time his faith in the Roman Catholic Church, in which he had been brought up, still remained, although signs were not wanting to indicate that his daring, inquiring mind would not long be tethered by dogmas. In his treatise on the "Popular Errors" he says, addressing religion: "It is sweet to be able, with a firm and certain spirit, to conclude that there is no true philosopher who does not follow thee and respect thee." But beneath catholic utterances like this, we occasionally hear a low murmur, as if the young reason were already perplexed and in doubt. He remarks that even Kepler, astronomer and mathematician as he was, was led into error, and exclaims: "Terrible example! We might almost believe that errors, like comets, have an orbit, and that at the end of several centuries, when men have ceased to inveigh against them, they reappear on the scene under a new aspect. . . This reflection would lead us to think that the human mind does not follow a straight line, extended to infinity, but a limited circle, and returns perforce from time to time to the same point." A eulogy upon Voltaire in the same essay indicates that Leopardi already knew and admired the writings of the great French skeptic, if he did not openly agree with them.

The chief influence upon Leopardi's intellectual development, however, was Greek literature. So thoroughly was he imbued with its vigor, its grace, its majesty, its consummate artless art, that in his writings he is the most Greek of all moderns, not excepting Goethe, Shelley and Keats. In the glorious masterpieces of Athens he learned his first lessons in human nature. His imagination drew pictures of men of Attic type; men full of virility, of enthusiasm, of patriotism, of passionate worship of beauty, capable of the loftiest achievements in war, in art, and in government. When he contrasted the men he saw around him with the portraits of his fancy, the disenchantment was mortal. Of all cities in priest-ridden Italy, Recanati was the dullest. Ignorance, like the dark slime of centuries which encrusts some statue and hides its pure marble and loveliness, encased all minds but his own. Not only were the works of the ancient world unknown; even the names of Dante, Petrarch and Alfieri needed an explanation and an apology. The aristocracy fairly reveled in its duncedom.

Leopardi, at eighteen, did not fail to make this comparison between the world of his ideal and the world as he found it, but though discouraged he still believed that elsewhere he might realize his dream. He felt that some persons must live who would blush to be slaves; who would be ashamed of ignorance; who aspired to be more than mere animals eating, drinking, sleeping and going to mass. He longed to travel, to enjoy the companionship of some of the brilliant men of letters with whom he was already in correspondence, to secure better opportunities for study; to dispel, by new sights and interests, "the obstinate, black, horrid, savage melancholy which wasted and devoured him."* For several years he was unable to carry out his desire. His father stubbornly refused to assign him even a moderate allowance, believing, it has been asserted, that Leopardi was too progressive and anti-clerical in his views. His health was further impaired by his excessive study, and for nearly a year he suffered blindness, accompanied by a nervous prostration which debarr'd any mental application.

At last, when he was too much of an invalid to enjoy his liberty, he was permitted to escape from Recanati. The annoyances and discomforts of travel often outweighed its pleasures. Then, too, instead of the Italy he had pictured to himself, he saw a land oppressed by despot, sunk in poverty and wretchedness, ill-hiding beneath her rags her festering constitutional sores. Rome was buried in moral degradation. Ignorance was the passport to success and promotion at the papal court, and in Leopardi's case a sojourn at the headquarters of Romanism dispelled not only all faith in its religion but the last vestige of respect for its methods. After a while his poverty dragged him back to the repugnant paternal roof, and at twenty-five he espoused a pessimism from which he was never afterward divorced.

Up to this time his mental growth had been marked by two phases. His profound acquaintance with the classics won him a reputation as a philologist so distinguished that he was acknowledged by such scholars as Niebuhr, Bunsen, Mai and Giordani to be the ablest Hellenist in Italy; while the publication, in 1818, of his odes "To Italy" and "To the Monument of Dante," placed him at once above all contemporary Italian poets. From that time until 1824, when he published the first collected edition of his poems, his work was evenly divided between poetry and philology. After that date he gave himself more closely to philosophical studies and to the perfection of a prose style which none of his countrymen has equaled. But although, during the last thirteen years of his life, he often avowed his preference for prose, he could not quench his poetic nature, and many of his most exquisite, passionate and majestic lyrics sprang from the sufferings and emotions of this period. His health grew worse, so that more than once he was unable to read for many months at a time, and the mere cessation of bodily pain was his single desire. Poverty was constantly at his side to harass, and death, earnestly invoked, delayed long to end his misery. Only on June 14, 1837, did she close a life more than half of which had been passed in daily anguish of body and mind.

Fatalism is the principle underlying Leopardi's pessimism. Unconsciously taking as a model his own career—which had been so persistently assailed by untoward circumstances—he inferred that Fate rules the world. Moreover, Fate is malignant, cruel, pitiless, delighting in torturing humanity. The only part of life that is worth living is made especially attractive in order to deepen the misery of the rest. Youth—the season of noble dreams, of boundless hopes, of indescribable loveliness—is only a delusion. We enjoy its pleasures because we are ignorant. But Fate, to accomplish its work fully, endows us with a craving for knowledge, and knowledge leads inevitably to disillusion. Those bright hopes, those joyous fancies, which ushered us into life, when examined through the glass of reason, prove to be thin, misty veils, concealing the black and desperate reality. As our expectations were high, our regret becomes poignant. Though we resolutely shut our eyes to the facts, and try to enjoy in spite of disillusion, we cannot. Relentless destiny has cut off even that frail consolation. We recognize our impotence and our powerlessness to remedy it; to know and not to be able—therein lies the quintessence of our pain and our despair. Who would choose to live to feel himself the victim of a demon against whom there was no battling; from whom justice, redress, mercy were impossible; whose gifts were a thousandfold more sorrow-causing than his torments? Had men been left in ignorance, like the brute creation, they might, like it, have a sensuous, careless existence; but men are forced to drink the sap of the tree of knowledge, which poisons but does not destroy. Morality and virtue have no reasonable ground on which to stand. Like everything else they are delusions, or, worse, perhaps, caprices of the scourging Fate. Nevertheless, with love, they take a strong hold upon us, and are among the last to be eradicated by the remorseless harrow of Knowledge. Long after we understand their real emptiness, we continue to cherish them as errors sweeter far than truth. Finally, we reach the bottom of the abyss, and immortality itself—the earliest and deepest-rooted of all delusions—is torn up by our despairing spirit, which calmly awaits annihilation, without joy or sorrow, because, when the troubled soul has arrived at this awful stage it has ceased even to frame a wish.

A compressed statement of Leopardi's philosophy is found in this short poetical fragment, which he addresses "To Himself:"

"Now wilt thou rest forever, weary heart;
The last delusion—that I thought myself
Immortal—perished, died. Too well I feel
Not the hope only, but the wish is quenched.
Repose forever, for thou hast throbb'd enough,
Thy beatings naught avail; nor is the earth
Worth any sighing. Weariness and gall
Is life—no more—and the whole world is mire.
Henceforth be still. Breathe out thy last despair.
Fate to our race has granted death alone.
Nature—that brutish power, which, hidden, reigns
For common woe and for the infinite
Vanity of all things—now thee disdains."

Leopardi, cast away into this outer darkness, still retained a strong respect for his intellect, which, if it caused his sorrows, was also the source of those mental joys which he deemed the noblest that ignoble man is allowed to taste. He foresaw that posterity would attribute his pessimism to his own supremely unhappy life, and he attempted to refute in advance this criticism, which implied that his philosophical reasoning was worthless, being prejudiced by physical pain. He therefore wrote, several years before his death, to a friend: "You say truly that it is absurd to attribute to my writings a religious tendency. Whatever my misfortunes may be, which persons think seasonable to parade, and which, perhaps, they have a little exaggerated in this newspaper,* I have had enough courage not to seek to diminish their burden either by frivolous hopes of a pretended future and unknown happiness, or by a cowardly resignation. My sentiments regarding destiny have been and still are those which I have expressed in Bruto Minore. As a result of the same courage, having been led by my researches to a despairing philosophy, I have not hesitated to embrace it entirely; while, on the other hand, it has been only from the cowardice of men—who must be persuaded of the worth of existence—that they have chosen to consider my philosophical opinions as the result of my individual sufferings, and that they persist in attributing to my material circumstances what is due to my understanding alone. Before dying, I am going to protest against this invention of the weak and the vulgar, and to beg my readers to consent to destroy my observations and reasoning, rather than to accuse my illnesses."†

Notwithstanding this positive declaration truth compels us to discover in Leopardi's infirmities the moulding of his sentiments regarding destiny. To the end his mind kept its marvelous clearness for all subjects save philosophy. His power of diction was never more conspicuous than in one of his last poems, "La Ginestra." His memory, sparkling with the jewels of eight literatures, was still brilliant. But his pessimism was a monomania, and, like all those afflicted with similar mental troubles, he deemed himself sanest on the very topic on which he was least sane.

Not irrelevantly, the morbid creed of Leopardi suggests the no less wretched doctrines of Schopenhauer, who now enjoys the unenviable distinction of being the apostle of modern pessimism. By right, however, to the Italian is due the credit of being the earlier of the two to formulate the philosophy of despair; but their rival claims may well be waived when we remember that Buddha forestalled both of them by twenty-five hundred years. The Italian and German agree in regarding annihilation as more preferable than life, but beyond this they have nothing in common. Leopardi became a pessimist because unkind circumstances goaded to desperation an over-sensitive, lofty spirit; Schopenhauer became so because his spirit was essentially base. Few characters in history are more despicable than this German's, whose teachings have exercised a fatal fascination over his countrymen. Inordinately selfish, absolutely wanting in affection; cold, harsh, false; impure in life and thought, almost bestial in his immorality; monstrous in his self-esteem; a groveler to wealth and titles—it is fitting that Arthur Schopenhauer should have prostituted rare intellectual gifts to render popular a "philosophical system" to match his character. Low himself, he imagined all men low. Shameless in his disregard for morality, he denied the very existence of moral laws. Who can wonder that he pronounced annihilation to be the goal of a race of which he deemed himself the representative?

Leopardi, on the contrary, was by nature high-minded. He believed men better than he found them. His sensitive mind was shocked when it saw the prevalence of untruth and low ideals. Disappointment and disillusion, intensified by nearly crushing bodily ills, led to metaphysical monomania. Yet even after he had embraced pessimism entirely, Leopardi was nobly inconsistent. Unlike Schopenhauer, he did not try to prove the non-existence of virtue by being himself a reprobate. Pessimism logically leads to suicide, but he, for some reason unacknowledged to himself, recognized that it is the coward who flees from pain. Pessimism consistently confounds good and evil, but he was inconsistently virtuous. He never sought to discount future suffering by present sensuality, but was a staunch friend, a devoted brother; a dauntless enemy of superstition, bigotry, ignorance and oppression; a writer who was satisfied with nothing short of perfection in his own work. Modest as to his own attainments, he was generous and encouraging toward all his rivals. His most prominent failing, increased no doubt by his extreme nervousness, seems to have been suspicion, the cause of want of frankness with his father, whose tyrannical and uncandid treatment of his son at least showed that the fault was not wholly on the latter.

Not only did Leopardi not live up to his pessimism, but he also occasionally indicated that his theory of despair might not be applicable to mankind in general. Even in one of his saddest lyrics this admission is made: "This I know and feel, that of the eternal revolutions of the stars, and of my frail being, some good or pleasure perhaps another will have: to me life is evil."* His beautiful poem, Il Risorgimento, written at a time of comparative physical and mental health, is a still more striking proof of the fact that his pessimism was a disease.

In time, perhaps, Leopardi will be known among English readers for those qualities in his works which compel admiration. Meanwhile it is unfair to lay too deep emphasis upon his despairing theory of human life and of destiny. While we may justly pity him that he was driven to despair, we must discriminate between him and Schopenhauer, who deserves to be loathed.

MY LETTERS.

ARE they lifeless all—my letters?

They seem like wingéd words,

Which fly to my breast in sweet unrest,

And flutter like nest-hid birds.

They cannot be mere white paper!

They thrill and tremble so;

There must be life-heat where pulses beat

With such a passionate glow.

Ofttimes, at the touch of their glowing breath,

My eyelids droop in shy surprise,

And I flush and tremble as though beneath

The passionate glance of love-lit eyes.

And if at eve upon my pillow

I fold their snow-white wings,

I can feel them beat beneath my cheek

All night like living things.

Oft when they come I hold them

With seal unbroke, and say:

"What loving word, oh, dainty bird,

Have you brought me this golden day?"

And then, when the seal is broke, I read,

While smiles and tears quick start,

To see how dear I have grown to be

To a loving and loyal heart.

Then the letters seem like a Venice cup,

Of crystal clear and fine,

Through which I gaze as it filleth up

With Love's rare ruby wine.

Thus my letters ne'er seem mere letters—

They are always living things,

That fly to my breast in sweet unrest

And fold love-laden wings.

REBECCA CAMERON.

THE HOUSEHOLD—A GOOD CUP OF COFFEE.

ALMOST every one likes coffee. Some people like it indiscriminately, the poor as well as the good; while others are made miserable unless their favorite beverage is just what it should be.

A thoroughly good cup of coffee is a very rare thing,—considerably more rare indeed than many people are willing to believe. So many observances go to the making it good that, considering the spirit of hurry and the spirit of saving that possess so large a portion of the civilized world, it would seem almost unreasonable to expect perfection except among the favored few who can command the best of everything.

The exhilarating cup is so often spoiled at the beginning, and the coffee devotee is often ready to declare that, if he would have a beverage fit to drink, he must raise his own berries.

Very satisfactory results, however, may be attained without going quite so far back as this; but to catch the berry in its green state and roast it at home is highly desirable. The point of perfection at this stage is to thoroughly brown and yet not burn the berries, as, if not sufficiently roasted, the coffee will have a raw, weak taste; while the other extreme will give a bitter flavor impossible to eradicate by any after process.

Before the roasted berries have quite cooled, the whites of as many eggs as there are pounds of coffee should be added, and the whole thoroughly stirred until every berry is coated with the egg. This preserves the aroma, or true coffee perfume, which is so often absent.

In coffee-growing countries, where the berry makes but a short journey from the bush to the mouth, this process is not necessary; and in the mountains of St. Domingo, the native darkies make coffee in very quick fashion. "They take the fresh berries and parch them for a few minutes, then crush them in a mortar—and for each person put a tablespoonful of the fragrant fragments into a conical-shaped bag; the exact number of coffee-cups full of boiling water is measured out and poured twice through the bag. This completes the process, and the result is—nectar."

Another method of preserving the aroma and properly browning coffee when there is no roaster, is to put the berries, after being thoroughly picked over and washed, into an oven or pan with a tight-fitting lid. When quite dry, a lump of butter the size of a walnut should be added to make it brown evenly. As soon as the coffee browns on top, the lid should be removed, and the mass thoroughly stirred and loosened—the top may then be leveled and the lid replaced, until the coffee is all of a light-brown hue, and will break with very hard pressure of the finger and thumb.

The vessel should then be taken from the fire and the lid left on until the coffee will bear the addition of egg without cooking it. This receipt recommends the use of both the whites and the yolks of the eggs; and the stirring is then resumed according to the directions in the former receipt. Great stress is laid upon keeping the coffee covered until the egg is added, as this is said to be even more important in preventing the escape of the aroma.

When dry, the coffee should be put into an air-tight canister, and only enough taken out at once for immediate use. It is desirable to have the coffee finely ground; and besides allowing a tablespoonful for each person, to put in one or two extra. Boiling water should then be poured upon it, and the pot set on to boil for eight or ten minutes. Then a beaten egg mixed in a bowl of cold water should be added, and the whole thoroughly boiled for a moment longer. It should then be taken from the fire; and, if needed, more boiling water added before it is placed upon the table.

But some one comes forward with an air of authority and says: Take a coffee-cup of the best Java coffee browned to the color of chocolate (not scorched), ground not too fine, and mix with it half an egg. Put this into a coffee-pot, or boiler (which is as clean as the cup you drink from) and pour over it one quart of boiling water, stirring as you put the water in; boil slowly for fifteen minutes, then stand the boiler on the back of the range ten minutes to settle; turn all coffee off from the grounds at once into an urn or coffee-pot that can stand upon the stove to keep hot. Coffee loses its flavor by standing on the grounds longer than half an hour, and should be very hot to be good. Put into the cup a teaspoonful of "American condensed milk" and some boiled milk, and turn the coffee into it. No French coffee is any better.

"I know a better way than that," says some one else; and then discourses as follows: Put your ground coffee in a bowl, a large tablespoonful for each person (most authorities seem to agree about the quantity); break into it the white of an egg (we use an egg for two mornings, the white for one and the yolk and shell for the next),* stir this thoroughly—this is an important part of the process—then add cold water very slowly, stirring all the time, until a teaspoonful or more has been mixed in. Having previously scalded your coffee-pot, pour the coffee into it—rinsing out the bowl with a little cold water; fill the coffee-pot more than half full with boiling hot water; then, with a spoon, stir it a moment; set it on the fire, and when it first boils up, stir it down and add half a teaspoonful of cold water; this settles it. Then set it back on the range, when it will keep hot till your breakfast is ready. It should never be set back far enough to grow cold. When needed, let it boil up once more; and then pour into your silver coffee-pot, and serve up as hot as possible. Block sugar should be used and condensed milk, or cream; boiled milk alone will not give it the proper color or flavor. Any one who desires to get up a reputation for good coffee should not forget this.

There are persons, however, who dislike the taste of condensed milk, and cream is not always attainable. In such cases, there is nothing for it but boiled milk; but there must be plenty of it, for coffee weakened with milk and coffee weakened with water are very different things; and the housekeeper who is disposed to scant either coffee or milk will never produce satisfactory results.

The best coffee, according to a housekeeper who always has a delicious beverage on her table, is a mixture of three-fourths Java and Mocha in equal parts, and one-fourth chicory. The latter, she says, when judiciously used, gives body and color, and seems to bring out the delicate flavor of the other two.

Coffee should never be made long before using; and it should be served as hot as possible.

ELLA RODMAN CHURCH.

* The editor of the Household Department while endorsing, as a whole, Mrs. Church's pleasant article, adds that a better method with the egg is to beat the whole egg, with two tablespoonfuls of cold water, using the shell also, which should be well broken up. As it is the albumen in the white, which possesses the settling property, it requires mixing with the yolk, which simply slightly enriches.

FOR a year or two Mr. James M. Hubbard, of Boston, has been waging a vigorous, and, it is to be hoped in some degree, a successful war against that class of fiction which people of modest habits of thought are prone to consider hurtful. His attention was first called to the enormous circulation of such literature through his connection, in an official capacity, with the Boston Public Library, and his protests have been based upon the very practical ground that if people will read such novels they ought to pay for them out of their own pockets, and not have them furnished gratis by the commonwealth. Eighteen months ago a list of seventy-eight books, with citations from competent critics, mostly foreign, was read before a committee of the Boston City Government, two of the library trustees being present. This list, selected at random from the catalogue, was intended simply to show that the public, including children of both sexes, had free access through the library to books which contained matter essentially objectionable from any rational standpoint. The discussion thus inaugurated caused the library trustees at first to hesitate, and finally to withdraw from circulation a number of the volumes specified. The list was sent to many libraries throughout the country, and on the strength of its showing a large number of the books were condemned and removed from circulation. At present the trustees state that no immoral book had ever been put into public use with the knowledge of the trustees, and that all books of an immoral influence are carefully excluded from circulation, especially among the young. To this Mr. Hubbard retorts that the library contains a large number of novels which have never been examined with a view to discovering whether they are moral or immoral. For, while there is small reason to believe that the fiction department has ever been thoroughly examined by competent persons, it is certain that the volumes of magazines and papers, chiefly devoted to stories, numbering several thousands, have never been subjected to any examination whatever. Considering the fact that these periodicals are read also by children in the reading rooms in vast numbers, it is a fact not to be questioned that of a considerable part of the fiction accessible to the children in the library the character is absolutely unknown, so far as its fitness for their reading is concerned. It appears then, by this showing, that Boston spends annually some thirty thousand dollars in supplying reading matter for the public, a large proportion of which is demonstrably unfit for decent people to read, and this work of insisting at least, upon some pretense of judicial discrimination is deserving of the highest praise.

It may be deplorably true that the art of story-telling is dying, and there are those who assert that the so-called story of modern literature is not a story at all; but be that as it may in regard to the literature of the period, it certainly is not altogether true in regard to social life. The present writer is not able to vouch for the status of story-telling among women when they are by themselves and without the restraining influence of the other sex, but you shall rarely find a coterie of men which has not its story-teller or several of them. Clergymen and lawyers, when they convene at their stated yearly or quarterly gatherings; physicians, when they meet, as they often do at clubs or otherwise; artists at their informal evenings in one another's studios, enjoy many a hearty laugh over stories, told with admirable dramatic force and capital powers of mimicry. That too many of the stories—excepting, of course, and by courtesy, those current in clerical circles—are “off-color” must perforce be admitted, but this is by no means true of all, and the story-teller still has a recognized seat at masculine reunions everywhere. But how curiously his type varies! There are those who seem able to introduce a story at any time; there are others for whom an opportunity has to be made; and others again who are apparently always on the point of telling a good story, but never succeed, and this applies not only to stories, but to more or less extended remarks of all kinds. We have in mind a genial gentleman, who not infrequently “sets the table on a roar” by his unpremeditated comments, but who can never, save by the rarest chance—not even at his own table—satisfactorily tell a story or discourse at all beyond the limit of three or four sentences. When he begins to speak, be his topic what it may, something is sure to happen. The waiters come in with a fresh course; some one at the other end of the table starts a discussion which attracts all ears, save perhaps the unwilling ones of his immediate neighbors, who endeavor, with such politeness as they may be able to command, to hear two things at once. If the occasion be a dinner party, at which ladies are present, the case is even worse, and he is sure to find himself desperately hurrying to end what he fondly believed at the outset was a capital narrative—his sole auditor being the lady next him, who, to do her justice, really strives hard to keep her attention from wandering too obviously. How different is the fate of the born story-teller! The hum of conversation is general, perhaps, when he begins, but before he has spoken a dozen sentences every one is listening, afraid to lose a word. How he does it is a puzzle to every one who has tried and failed. He waits for no pause in the general talk; he raises not his voice; his manner is unobtrusive, yet he has things all his own way, and delighted laughter and good humor follow his concluding words. Mr. Bernand, in “Happy Thoughts,” if we remember rightly, introduces a character who affords a parallel. The poor fellow knows a sleight-of-hand trick with a shilling and a glass of water, and he is always seeking an opportunity to perform it. Half-a-dozen times, in salon or dining-room, he is on the point of success, but the tide invariably turns at the critical moment, and leaves him high and dry, with the shilling in one hand and the glass of water in the other. Our last glimpse of him is in this posture, the carriages of the guests having been announced while the servant was gone to the dining-room for the water. So it is with the story-teller who has not the true afflatus. He may as well give it up, in a social way, and reserve himself for state occasions, where there is a toast-master or a chairman to preserve order and give every one a chance who has been selected to furnish his quota for the general entertainment. Even then it is very doubtful if he can really succeed in keeping the attention of his audience, and he will probably save himself and the rest of the company much discomfiture by confining himself to less conspicuous fields of action.

"DAISY MILLER" and the "Fair Barbarian" and "Miss Stackpole," and all the rest of their American sisterhood, old and young, are amply avenged at the hands of Miss Broughton, in the pages of her new story. So far as we are aware, no one has ventured to paint a venerable American gentlewoman in such colors as those in which the grandmother of the two Churchill girls is here set forth. "One knows," says the dutiful Sarah, in commenting on the old lady's character, "that if she were called upon for any of the sublimer virtues of life she would be found wanting. But, after all, the sublimer virtues are the thousand pound notes that one seldom needs to change, and granny has plenty of the sixpences." A good text that, by the way, for some able sermonizer to discuss. Then there is Miss Watson, a type of English-woman which we fervently hope American civilization may never develop. We are curious to see what our English contemporaries will have to say in regard to the two young ladies, especially Sarah, who appears to have all the effrontery, coquetry, beauty and lack of good breeding which the critics of the American young woman have decided are her peculiar property. Will not some transatlantic cousin relieve the suspense of Miss Broughton's American readers, and tell them what they are to infer from these strongly-drawn English characters.

THOSE who take up the latest work of Mr. W. E. Griffis on Corea¹ need expect little of the enjoyment which was to be found in "The Mikado's Empire." The larger part of the book, though of great value to the historian, is too hard reading ever to become very popular, the several chapters on domestic and social life being the only ones of general interest. These, however, are sufficiently fresh and peculiar to excite the attention of even the most jaded reader, the chapter on child-life in Corea being especially charming. There are specimens also of Korean folk-lore, and a collection of proverbs, and a valuable one on "Shahmanism and Mythical Zoology." So vivid are the descriptions that one finds it difficult to believe that Mr. Griffis has never been in Corea, and has simply used the results of long and patient research, his familiarity with Japanese history and antiquities giving him advantages which have been used to the utmost. Japanese scholars, interested in the subject, have worked with him, furnishing many of the details given; the journals of the Jesuit missionaries have afforded others, while maps, charts and photographs made by officers of the United States Navy in Corea, in 1871, are freely used. The record is thus, in many ways, a broader one than if limited to personal observation alone, and the author has known so well what to use and what to reject that the book must stand as the first and only valuable authority on the subject treated.

All culture in Corea is founded upon the Chinese classics, and a literary examination is the first condition in a civil-service appointment. Buddhism is the religion; but Chinese ethics and philosophy underlie it, Corea having adopted Chinese methods to the exclusion and abandonment of her own. Shahmanism, which peoples all nature with spiritual forms, is a more active faith than that in Buddhism, and the various gods of the hills and streams are worshipped in annual picnics, in some points very like our own camp-meetings. The King is very nearly a divinity, and his "person is hedged round with a divinity that has an antipathy to iron. This metal must never touch his august body, and rather than have an abscess lanced, the King Cheng-Jong, in 1800, died from the effects of the disease. No ordinary mortal must touch him, and if, by accident, this is done, the individual must ever afterward wear a silk cord."

Four political parties vex the state, and every noble must belong to one or another. Every subject is obliged to have a certificate of identity. This, "for the people, is a piece of branded wood; for the soldiers, of horn; for the literary class and government officials, of bone. Often the tablet is in halves, the individual having one-half and the government keeping its tally. The people who cannot read or write have their labels tied to their clothing. When called upon to sign important documents or bear witness on trial, they make a blood signature by rudely tracing the signs set before them in their own blood."

Corean character, on the whole, would seem to be rather agreeable than otherwise, for, though very dirty, addicted to strong drink and a great deal of it, and with far less cultivation than either Chinese or Japanese, they are hospitable, kindly and honest. Their greatest fault seems to be voracity, and the author's description of this trait is very graphic:

"One striking fault of the Coreans at the table is their voracity, and to this trait of their character Japanese, French, Dutch and Chinese bear witness. It might be supposed that a Frenchman, who eats lightly, might make a criticism where an Englishman would be silent; but not so. All reports concerning them seem to agree. In this respect there is not the least difference between the rich and poor, noble or plebeian. To eat much is an honor, and the merit of a feast consists, not in the quality, but in the quantity of the food served. Little talking is done while eating, for each sentence might lose a mouthful. Hence, since a capacious stomach is a high accomplishment, it is the aim from infancy to develop a belly having all possible elasticity. Often mothers take their babies upon their knees, and after stuffing them with rice, like a wad in a gun, will tap them from time to time with the paddle of a ladle on the stomach, to see that it is fully spread out or rammed home, and only cease gorging when it is physically impossible for the child to swell up more. A Corean is always ready to eat; he attacks whatever he meets with, and rarely says "enough." Even between meals he will help himself to any edible that is offered. The ordinary portion of a laborer is about a quart of rice, which, when cooked, makes a good bulk. This, however, is no serious hindrance to his devouring double or treble the quantity when he can get it. Eating matches are common. When an ox is slaughtered, and the beef is served up, a heaping bowl of the steaming mess does not alarm any guest. Dog-meat is a common article of food, and the canine sirloins, served up in great trenchers, are laid before the guests, each one having his own small table to himself. When fruits, such as peaches or small melons, are served, they are devoured without peeling. Twenty or thirty peaches are considered an ordinary allowance, which rapidly disappears. Such a prodigality in victuals is, however, not common, and for one feast there are many fastings. Beef is not an article of daily food with the peasantry. Its use is regulated by law, the butcher being a sort of government official; and only under extraordinary circumstances, as when a grand festival is to be held, does the king allow an ox to be killed in each village. The Coreans are neither fastidious in their eating nor painstaking in their cooking. Nothing goes to waste. All is grist that comes to the mill in their mouths."

Corea has suddenly assumed importance from the fact, noted by Mr. Griffis, that she is "the pivot of the future history of Eastern Asia. On her soil will be decided the problem of supremacy by the jealous rivals, China, Japan and Russia. The sudden assumption of self-imposed tutelar duties by China proves her lively interest in the little country, which has been called both 'her right arm of defense' and 'her gloved hand'—the one to force back the ravenous Muscovite, the other to warn off the ambitious Japanese." The book has thus a special interest for all students of the time, and deserves it, not only for its scholarly qualities, but for its literary style, which is, if not brilliant, always clear and often exceedingly picturesque.

(1) COREA, THE HERMIT NATION. By William Elliott Griffis. 8vo, pp. 462, $3.50; maps and illustrations; Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

SIX different translations of Mr. Jenkins' "Paladin of Finance" have appeared in Russia, where the book is exceedingly popular, and there is still a steady demand for it.

AND now a "Dictionary of Political Economy" is to be added to our various handbooks, the project originating in England, where it is proposed that the work shall be done by specialists.

FUNK & WAGNALLS are issuing a cheap edition of Canon Farrar's "Early Days of Christianity," and Cassell, Peter & Galpin announce various forms, the cheapest, in paper covers, being only forty cents.

MARCUS WARD & Co. have sent out their usual illuminated calendars, "Day unto Day," holding a text for every day. The "Every Day Calendar" has quotations from various authors, and the Shaksperian is made up of apt quotations, the low price, fifty cents, making them an easy acquisition, while their beauty will commend them to everyone.

"BIRD SONGS OF NEW ENGLAND," by Harriet E. Paine, is a set of simple and often musical little poems, many of them giving as correct an imitation as possible of the actual song-notes of the birds. Red-lined and daintily made up, the little book is a pleasant reminder of New England summer days, and has already passed into a second edition. (50 cents, pp. 28; A. Williams & Co., Boston).

"HARPERS' CHRISTMAS" is by no means worthless when that season has ended. On the contrary, it has an intrinsic value that increases in possession, and the marvellous work of the engravings will gain rather than lose by time. Many critical people have mounted and framed one or another of the full-page illustrations, and the sheets must stand, in all points, as one of the most beautiful specimens of American presswork ever given to the public.

To the many who own and prize the beautiful little collection of religious poetry known as "Quiet Hours," there will be no need of recommending another compilation by the same editor, "Sunshine in the Soul," second series. The "Wisdom Series" has been carefully edited, and each number is valuable, its dainty letter-press and small size making it easily handled by an invalid, while it can also find room in the pocket. (32mo, pp. 159, 50 cents; Roberts Brothers, Boston).

MACMILLAN & Co. have issued in one volume several of their sixpenny editions: "Tom Brown's School Days," "Wanderings in South America," by Charles Waterton, and Irving's "Old Christmas" and "Bracebridge Hall," the two latter being most profusely and delightfully illustrated by Randolph Caldecott. Though the varieties in type give a rather peculiar effect, the volume is an excellent one to own, and will be an unfailing source of entertainment as long as it holds together. (Price, $1.50.)

MR. ROBERT GRANT, known to all as the very amusing author of "The Little Tin Gods on Wheels," "Confession of a Frivolous Girl," etc., has written a tragedy, "The Lambs," in which the adventures of various young speculators who go into the stock market and are painfully fleeced is recorded. The tragedy, profusely illustrated, is one of the daintiest pieces of book-making the season has given, the design on the cover being especially good. ($1.50, pp. 61; J. R. Osgood & Co.).

DR. HOLMES writes concerning the new Hawthorne romance "Dr. Grimshawe's Secret": "I feel as one might have felt who had been admitted to Rembrandt's studio. I have been closeted with a magician and admitted within his mysterious circle." Mr. Whittier says: "The work is Hawthorne's. There can be no question about it. It is one of his weird, unmistakable creations—a creation not fully rounded, chaotic, peopled with strange shapes, like our planet in its first discovery. It is powerful, of course, and will be read with interest by his admirers on both sides of the water."

A SECOND edition of Mrs. Oliphant's "Literary History of the Nineteenth Century" has been issued by Macmillan & Co., the first having sold immediately. Age seems to increase the power of this brilliant author, whose work is of far higher grade than even ten years ago. It has always been pure and fresh, but stronger qualities have been added, and she bids fair to take the first place among literary women of to-day. With a story running in Blackwood's and another in Macmillan's Magazine, she has a third under way; is writing a life of Sheridan and editing a popular literary series.

If another birthday book can be tolerated at all, it is certainly one made up from Mrs. Browning's poems, and that Mr. R. H. Stoddard has edited it is sufficient guarantee for its excellence. He has made it not only a collection of choice extracts, but a summary of many of her opinions of the persons whose births are given, several representative names having been selected for each day. A portrait is also given, and the book has an especial value and interest from the method of its compilation, which has involved far more labor than appears. (18mo, $1.00; James Miller, New York).

THE American Canoeist, now entering upon its second year, appeals to a limited but very appreciative audience of interested subscribers, who love the open air and seek recreation on inland lakes and streams, and along the sea-coast from Labrador to the Gulf. It is recognized as the official organ of the American Canoe Association, which includes several hundred members, and makes a special point of ruling out "professionals," and keeping the conduct of its affairs in the hands of those who have at heart the true interests of a manly, rational and health-giving recreation. (Published by Brentano, New York).

A VERY bright and charming story for children is "When Papa Comes Home: The Story of Tip, Tap, Toe," lately published by Macmillan & Co., with illustrations by W. J. Hennessy. Two girls and a boy own these abbreviated names, which are really Theresa, Theodora and Tregarva. "Papa" is in India, and the little story opens with preparations for Christmas, the day itself bringing news that he is coming home. The daily doings of the children, their lessons, their squabbles, their small adventures are told in the simplest way, but the book holds so much innocent life and gentle feeling that any child must be the better for reading it. The illustrations are far above the usual order. (16mo, pp. 183, $1.25).

"THE PROBLEM OF THE POOR, a Record of Quiet Work in Unquiet Places," by Helen Campbell, is a collection of thirteen articles contributed to Sunday Afternoon, and, in part, to Lippincott's Magazine. They tell the story of the McAuley Mission in Five Points, New York, in a dramatic, vivid manner. Nothing is described, but the actors come forth and tell their own stories—Jerry McAuley and his wife Maria, Max, Jack and Nan. The story is told in an idiom that is as real as it is picturesque. There is also a paper on insanity, and the methods of incarcerating and treating patients; one on diet, and one story of a little cooking-school carried on by an old Scottish woman in her own kitchen. As the preface says, our poor are so fast becoming our criminal class that it is plain that something beyond preaching will have to bring the remedy, and industrial education seems to be the only solution left. The men and women who are half-fed will drink, and no one need wonder; and out of dirt and disorder come impurity and rascality. As long as the poor live, sleep, work and eat under degraded, unwholesome conditions, so long will they be dangerous, and this little book has a value beyond its excellent literary character, as being a practical, clear-sighted putting of a terrible problem and its possible solution. (Cloth, 90 cts., pp. 244; Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York).

A good work has been done by Rosalie Kaufman in furnishing a new volume of "Young Folks' History" by adapting and abridging from Agnes Strickland's "Queens of England." Those of us who nourished youthful imaginations on her lengthy volumes, will sigh over the loss of much picturesque detail, but this new book will be more frequently read. It covers the main events of the lives of the royal ladies down to and including Katherine Parr, the last Queen of Henry VIII. The spirit of the larger work is admirably retained, though the editor occasionally mistakes in making her style suitable for those too young to be interested. It is freely illustrated. (16mo, pp. 315, $1.25; Estes & Lauriat).

ALPHONSE DAUDET gives an interesting account of his new novel, "L'Evangeliste," which is to appear in the Paris Figaro. He writes to some friends in Vienna: "I narrate this time the story of a Danish family in Paris. There is in Paris, you must know, a Scandinavian colony which has its own churches, coffee-houses, clubs, etc. This is all very characteristic and has never been described. The heroine of my novel is Eline Ebsen. She is engaged to be married. Some prayer-books are sent to her for translation, three sous a prayer. The commission is given by Madame Anthemaui, the wife of a very rich banker, who has a passion for proselytizing people. By degrees the young girl becomes a religious enthusiast. She avoids her family. The marriage project is broken up. One day the girl disappears, leaving only a letter for her mother, who, left entirely alone, a stranger in a strange country, applies successively to a lawyer, to the police, to the judge, but all in vain. The Anthemaui's are too rich. And this every-day experience: the power of gold assumes in this book a cruel and, I think, awful clearness. I have witnessed myself this family drama; I see this mother every day, and shall never forget her tears. The picture of religious fanaticism is relieved by some interesting characters; as in 'Fromont' a good-natured humor, a home-like tone, pervades the whole. In this manner are drawn the Aussandon couple, a clergyman's family, charming, truly religious. I thereby avoid any aggressive tendency of the book. Above all, it is purely human, something like the cry of a despairing heart, to which I would impart as much genuine fervor of feeling as possible. Should it prove a failure I'll have myself locked up in a monastery of Moravian brethren."

THE DRAMA.

THE composer Verdi purposes founding an hospital for the relief of the suffering poor in his native province of Parma, Italy.

MISS FANNY DAVENPORT will tour the United States during next season, opening at the Grand Opera House, New York, in September. She will pass the winter and spring in Italy.

MME. MODJESKA played the title-rôle of Sardou's "Odette" for the first time in this country at Booth's Theatre on January 1st. The version of the play used follows more closely the original than the adaptation made by Mr. Augustin Daly, which has been produced successfully in the principal cities. Mme. Modjeska achieved great reputation and won the highest praise in London during a three months' run of "Odette," about a year ago.

MISS ADA DYAS has been successful thus far in her "starring" tour. Mr. Barton Hill is her principal support, and her repertory embraces "London Assurance," "An Unequal Match" and "Caste." The lady has been forced to do some very rapid traveling. She closed an engagement on a Saturday night in Brooklyn and on Monday opened in St. Louis. On January 29 she appears at the Arch Street Theatre, Philadelphia. Miss Dyas has been engaged for "leading business" for next season by the Madison Square Theatre.

THE Metropolitan Concert Hall, erected in New York, on Broadway, corner of Forty-first street, three years ago, not proving remunerative, the interior was altered slightly, a temporary stage erected for the production of light opera, and its name changed to the Alcazar. This did not bring success, either. It is now being re-altered into a regular theatre, and Mr. Emmet, in "Fritz," will be the first attraction presented. It will be known as the Cosmopolitan Theatre, and will be under the management of Mr. S. M. Hickey.

MR. HENRY E. ABBEY, the leading, as well as the most successful American theatrical manager, is now in addition an operatic impresario of the first rank, having secured the management of the inauguration and first season of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. He announces that the opening will take place in October, and that Mme. Nilsson and Signora Campanini and Del Puente are the shining lights already secured. Mr. Abbey will pass several months of this year in Europe securing artists and attractions, both operatic and theatrical.

THE Walnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia, is the oldest theatre in the United States, having been built in 1808. Of late years it has been somewhat outranked by newer and more elegant houses. Messrs. Hall and Fleishman, who have but lately assumed the reins of management, have determined to reverse this order, and intend to restore the Walnut to a leading place among the theatres of the country. Mr. Charles Wyndham and company will make their initial bow in the Quaker City at this house in February, and the comedies of "Fourteen Days" and "Brighton" will be elaborately staged.

MR. JOHN HOWSON, whose "De Merrimac" in "Olivette" made him very widely and favorably known, possesses in a high degree the rare ability of absolutely sinking his own identity in his impersonations. He set the town talking about his lifelike portrait of the Rev. De Witt Talmage, whose appearance and personal characteristics he copied as the minister in the "Sorcerer" during the long run of the operetta at the Bijou Opera House, New York. In Messrs. Stephens and Solomon's "Virginia" he is cast for "Mephisto," and will make up exactly like Hermann, the conjurer. Mr. Howson adds to his merits as an actor a strong talent with the brush, and is an art critic of no mean order. His apartments are adorned with chef d'œuvres of chisel and palette.

IN LIGHTER VEIN.

At the Fair.

A NEW AND ORIGINAL COMIC OPERA IN ONE ACT.

Written by W. S. GILBERT. About as much as it was Composed by ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

SCENE: A Large Hall.

A Chorus of Wheeling Maidens. A Chorus of Wheeled Visitors.

CHORUS OF WHEELING MAIDENS.

Busily hither and there we fly,
With smiling lip and watchful eye;
We wheedle in the name of charity,
Sweet charity, sweet charity;
We wheedle in the name of charity.

CHORUS OF VISITORS.

We enter with misgivings fearful,
Weak of knee and slightly tearful;
For a band arrayed to plunder,
Strain our pocketbooks asunder,
Put out cash, a captive, under Its high French, French heel,
Meets us face to face
As we near this place.

SOLO: First Maiden (presiding at a stand).

Here's a raffle,
We are careful
That the book of names is ne'er full;
Always place for
In the race for Prizes which this raffle pays for.
People's money,
That's the honey
That we gather. Ain't it funny?

CHORUS OF VISITORS (with a forced smile).

Awful jolly.
(Aside) What beastly folly
To be robbed by Maud or Molly.

DUET: Second Maiden (presiding at another stand).

Cedars of Lebanon,
From City of Solomon,
Made into tables for parlors.
Third Maiden (at another table).
Rocks from Mount Ararat,
To be disposed of at Anything over ten dollars.

QUINTETTE: Fourth Maiden.

To beautiful tidies
Devoted this side is.

Fifth Maiden.

In these little bowers
Are sold dainty flowers.

Sixth Maiden.

If here you walk in
You can fish with a pin.

Seventh Maiden.

Here are letters for all,
Old and young, great and small.

Eighth Maiden.

At a dollar a plate
Cream will cool your palate.

BALLAD: First Maiden.

He buys. My laughing eyes must brighten,
The joy must be reflected in my face,
The load upon my breast doth lighten,
The load within my pocket doth increase.
The vacant spot will tell the story
To every other girl who hies by Unto my stand. Mine is the glory;
My cup is full. He buys.

A SPECIAL PARTNER.

Householder—"Want to clean the snow off, hey? Where's your broom and shovel?"

Contractor—"Goin' to borrow your'n!" (And he gets them and the job too.)

He passes by. With stormy throbbing
My anxious heart goes pit-a-pat,
My parchéd throat is dry with sobbing,
While he looks this way and then that.
My fate is sealed. My pulses madly
Beat a funeral dirge, for I Am left. He gazes toward me sadly,
And then—he passes by.

FINALE: Chorus of Wheedling Maidens.
The things that you will buy of us are singularly reasonable.

CHORUS OF VISITORS (jocosely).

Oh, my! you're telling us a joke.

CHORUS OF MAIDENS (beseechingly).

Here's seal-skin sacques and fur-lined cloaks and other things quite seasonable.

CHORUS OF VISITORS (mockingly).

Too-roo-loo-ral. Too-roo-loo-ral. Too-roo-lay.

CHORUS OF MAIDENS (archly).

You darling men, so kind. But then we ought not speak like that to you,
For if we should we know it would immediately scatter you;
That would, of course, be your resource, if we began to flatter you.

CHORUS OF MEN (laughingly).

Too-roo-loo-ral. Too-roo-loo-ral. Too-roo-lay.

CHORUS OF MAIDENS (resolutely).

Our blandishments and compliments, which certainly must frighten you,
We'll quickly stop, and to our shops and stands, with wiles we'll tighten you,
And of untold sums, bills and gold, we'll in a twinkling lighten you.

CHORUS OF MEN (faintly).

Too-roo-loo-ral. Too-roo-loo-ral. Too-roo-lay.

INVOCATION: Tutti.

Hail Charity! Sweet goddess, thou
To whom the suffering soul appealeth;
Thou causeth Selfishness to bow,
And in each heart some good revealeth.

CHORUS OF MAIDENS.

Come buy of us, brothers,
Come fathers, come mothers;
Come dancing a measure,
Expressing a pleasure

That you're at the fair to-night, to-night.
That you're at the fair to-night.

ENSEMBLE.

1st Maiden.

Here is a beautiful basket.

2d Maiden.

Buy, oh! please buy this sweet vase.

3d Maiden.

Look at this jewelry casket.

4th Maiden.

Gaze at this stand for cigars.

5th Maiden.

I know for this cushion you're dying.

6th Maiden.

You'll buy this for Charity's sake.

7th Maiden.

You want this, I know by your sighing.

8th Maiden.

Oh, please take a chance in this cake!

CHORUS OF VISITORS.

Plague take you. Your brothers,
You fathers, your mothers,
Express their displeasure
In terms without measure

That they're at the fair to-night, to-night,
That they're at the fair to-night.

ENSEMBLE.

Chorus of Maidens.

Chorus of Visitors.

Come, buy of us, brothers, Plague take you, your brothers,
Come, fathers, etc. You fathers, etc.

First Maiden. Busily hither and there we fly,
With smiling lip and watchful eye;
We wheedle in the name of charity.

Chorus of Maidens. Sweet charity, sweet charity,
We wheedle in the name of charity.

Chorus of Visitors. Sadder and wiser homeward we hie, Pockets and pocket-books all empty—
Ruined in the name of charity.
Sweet charity, sweet charity,
Ruined in the name of charity.

ENSEMBLE.

Chorus of Maidens.

Chorus of Visitors.

Busily hither and there we fly,
With smiling lip, etc. Sadder and wiser we homeward hie,
Pockets and pocket-books, etc.

Curtain.

H. C. FAULKNER.

A Winter Landscape.

DARK are the fir trees on the mountain side;
Above them soars the granite gray and hoary,
And there the lettered legends still abide
Which greet the summer tourist in his glory.
"Use Jones's Tonic!" thus the record points—
"Use Jones's Tonic! It is good for joints."

THE LESSON OF THE FLOWERS.

BY C. C. RHYS.

COME hither, little lass, with eyes
Reflecting Heaven's blue,
The while in innocent surprise
Your bouquet here they view.

The color's rich, the scent is sweet,
But all unknown to you
The lesson that the flowers repeat;
Then listen—I'll construe:

They're Old World flowers; and so 'tis well:
Better the old than new;
None that the city florists sell
Speak parable more true.

Laburnum, dahlia, these you twine
With yellow sprays of rue,
And add the tawny columbine,
Still diamonded with dew.

Laburnum's for the beauty which Lives in a quiet place,
Retired, nor seeking to be rich,
And more of mind than face.

The dahlia is for proper pride,
Mark of a noble race,
Whose sires on field and scaffold died,
But never knew disgrace.

Rue's for disdain that you should give Every dishonest case;
Better the rankest herbs that live
Than sweets that sin embrace.

The columbine in all her woe
She wore, who, for a space
Deserted, still was faithful. So,
There constancy we trace.

Dear little maid with turquoise eyes,
Is it not written fair,
The lesson that before you lies?
Early yourself prepare,

And as from flowers sweet perfumes rise,
So let your virtues rare
Ascend like incense to the skies,
And wing your pathway there.

KENTUCKY'S BIRTHPLACE.

HEREVER English is spoken Kentucky and Kentuckians are recognized elements in the motley array that goes to make up the very composite totality known as America. In matters appertaining to the turf; among convivial connoisseurs of the beverage that cheers, and alas! inebriates; in the chronicles of dash and daring, in a strict code of gallantry toward the fairer sex, Kentucky has an established reputation which has augmented with her growth. While a tall, lank individual in homespun raiment and numerous embellishments of pistols and bowie-knives, a devotee to "long-green terbacker," and possessing an extensive vocabulary of oaths of varying degrees of intensity, together with an unquestioned judgment regarding "hoss" and whisky, and bearing the inevitable title of major or colonel, has long been the type of the genuine Kentuckian as accepted abroad, a closer acquaintance with him modifies the picture in several important particulars.

It is only within the last few years that esteemed valuation of antiquity has laid any hold on the American mind at large, and even now its manifestations are of a very modest, unassuming nature when viewed from a foreign standpoint—so modest, in fact, that it may be said to be only in an embryo state of existence at the present day. Even in the most fertile soil, however, the love of the antique is a plant of slow growth, to which each succeeding year adds a scarcely perceptible degree of development; and here, where civilization has not yet claimed the thousands of wild but productive acres, and broad tracts of primeval lands still show no indications of the imprint of advancing progress, imported American antiquity may yet be regarded as an exotic scarcely acclimated. I use the term imported because there is an indigenous article whose origin antedates the Indian traditions of the past, it is so remote, with only scattered tumuli here and there, standing as silent witnesses of a forgotten, mysterious race.

Of our own later history, it behooves us to regard the early developments with due favor and appreciation wherever the opportunity offers, and to preserve its records with especial care, knowing that they constantly enhance in value as time speeds by. To this end I have thought to introduce to my readers a cradle spot in which historical reminiscences abound of those early pioneers whose energy, courage and enduring perseverance have to-day given us a broad and smiling landscape of fertile fields and shady woodlands, fitly called the Eden of Kentucky.

One hundred and seven years ago its site was without a vestige of human habitation or human presence, unless perchance a vigilant party of Cherokees or Shawnees on extensive hunting expeditions penetrated the dense thickets and forests of the surrounding country; for the primeval shades of oak, walnut, ash, maple and hickory gave shelter to the buffalo, elk, deer and bear, while extensive canebrakes and tracts of compact undergrowth afforded ample retreat for smaller game. All was one vast, unbroken wild.

From 1769 to 1774 occasional sorties had been made, both from Virginia and North Carolina, by daring explorers, for whom these prolific hunting-grounds possessed an irresistible charm; but not until the spring of 1774 was any move made toward permanent settlement in the wilderness. During that year a party of some forty men, in roughly-constructed boats came down the Ohio from the Monongahela country, to the mouth of the Kentucky, which they ascended for many miles, and, after disembarking, took a southwesterly course through the pathless forest, when, after several days march, they finally encamped for the summer on the site where the town of Harrodsburg now stands. The exact location was beneath an immense elm, a short distance from a beautiful and never-failing spring, which, to the present day, supplies with water the little creek that divides the town.

To this spring they gave the name of Spouting Spring, doubtless from the fact that, after heavy rains, a considerable volume of water is thrown up to the height of several feet. The sides of this reservoir have the appearance of a vast inverted funnel of unknown depth, and the water is very clear and icy cold.

The elm tree grew on land, afterward owned by my grandfather (a descendant of the Samuel Adams mentioned in early Kentucky history), and I yet recall the friendly shelter of its wide, spreading branches, as in my youth, I indulged in that luxurious pastime so dear to all small boys—wading in the creek; and, as this fa-cinating pursuit was in direct opposition to parental commands, and conducted on strictly secret principles, of course the zest of the performance was proportionately enhanced, despite the frequent afterpieces, in which an avenging Nemesis in the form of wrathful parent or nurse took an active part.

A few years later this interesting tree was struck by lightning, during a thunderstorm, and, taking fire, was burned, despite the efforts made to extinguish it. The storm occurred during the night, when the murky clouds obscured every particle of light, except when the flashing lightning relieved for an instant the Egyptian darkness. The tree caught in the topmost branches, and, as the trunk was hollow, the wind drove the flames tlement was, as the reader will perceive, a most hazardous enterprise. A mere handful of men, inured to hardship though they were, had chosen a dwelling-place remote from all civilization or protection, save their own prowess and the watchful care of Providence. They were in the midst of a wild country, whose trackless depths were only known to the various animals which inhabited it, or to the stealthily prowling Indian, more cruelly savage than bear or catamount, and whose unrelenting vindictiveness rendered the preservation of life or property an exceedingly uncertain thing.

The barest necessities of life were wanting; meat was not attainable unless the rifle or trap were called into requisition, but fruit and small berries which the downward until the interior glowed like a furnace seven times heated. Midway from base to top was a large aperture, where a limb had rotted and fallen away, and through this opening the fierce wind blew myriads of sparks, illumining the scene for yards around, and furnishing a pyrotechnical display, difficult to excel and surpassingly beautiful to behold.

But to return: the leader of the little company, Captain James Harrod, first conceived the idea of establishing a permanent settlement here, and after some debate and a few suggestions in regard to locating on a larger stream, now known as the Chapline, which had been discovered by one of his men, whose name it bears, the point was settled by Captain Harrod proceeding to erect for himself a rude log cabin, of the most primitive description, whereupon several others were similarly constructed, and the nucleus of a future town was formed.

This laying a foundation-stone for a permanent settlement was, as the reader will perceive, a most hazardous enterprise. A mere handful of men, inured to hardship though they were, had chosen a dwelling-place remote from all civilization or protection, save their own prowess and the watchful care of Providence.

Prior to this, dating from 1749, several adventurous parties had made brief excursions into this region, and three miles from the site of Harrodsburg Daniel Boone spent the winter of 1769-70 in a small cave, which afforded him comfortable shelter from the rigorous weather.

Above the mouth of the cave stands a large white oak tree, on the trunk of which the initials "D. B." were once faintly discernible. These were carved by Boone's own hand, and for a long time were protected by a frame and glass fastened on the side of the tree, while above it was nailed a pair of antlers. These letters have recently been cut from the tree and presented to the writer by the owner of the farm on which the cave is situated.

Within the cave a small, clear stream has worn a narrow groove along the rocky floor, and a thrifty housewife now keeps the produce of her dairy in excellent condition by means of its cool waters, which gurgles perpetually from subterranean passages.

The ruling passion of Boone's character was admirably portrayed by this extensive hunting excursion, when for nearly two years he saw no civilized human being except his brother, and once for three months not even him, he having returned home to obtain a supply of ammunition. Nor had he aught to eat save what his skill as a hunter procured. This love for the freedom of the forest caused him, in later years, to leave Kentucky, which was rapidly becoming settled, and seek the less frequented lands of Missouri, in which state he died. In 1845, September 13th, the remains of Boone and his wife were brought to Kentucky, and interred, with public honors at the Capital.

The cemetery is most picturesquely situated on the heights of a tall cliff, at whose base gently flow the waters of the Kentucky, and almost at the verge of the cliff, where the wild vines clamber at will over the loose gray boulders, and the stalks of slender cane start up amid the gnarled roots of ancient tree-trunks, a gleaming marble shaft marks the last resting-place of Kentucky's famous pioneer.

On a commanding hill in Harrodsburg, a few hundred yards west of the first encampment, a fort was erected, and proved a sheltering and protecting friend on many trying occasions. About the year 1777 the fort was occupied the greater portion of the time, as the Indians infested the vicinity and kept the whites in constant apprehension of danger. They lay in ambush, time and again, in close proximity to the fort, and surprised the inhabitants on all possible occasions, rendering it unsafe to venture beyond the palisades.

It was at this juncture that a youth, not yet seventeen, evinced an amount of courage and daring which won the admiration even of old veterans in brave exploits. This was James Ray, whose hairbreadth escapes and cool intrepidity in times of imminent peril won him, in after years, a reputation second only to that of Boone in the annals of Kentucky history.

At the foot of the hill, on the north side of the fort, was a spring, which supplied the small colony with water, and which was connected with the fort by a long, covered passage made of heavy logs. This served to protect the women, who were usually the water-carriers, and also to guard against being cut off from this very necessary supply.

Young Ray would leave the fort before daylight by means of this passage, and wade down the creek to Salt River, some two or three miles beyond, thus leaving no trace of his departure.

When at a sufficient distance, sometimes ten or fifteen miles away, he would kill whatever game presented itself, and, usually heavily-laden, return after nightfall to his hungering and waiting friends. Sometimes these jaunts would be taken upon an old horse, sole survivor of quite a number ridden by these emigrants from Virginia.

Collins' History of Kentucky gives an account of a thrilling adventure of this same young Ray, who, with a friend, was suddenly surprised one day, when a short distance from the fort, by a party of concealed savages. The first intimation he received of their presence was the sight of his friend shot dead by his side. Ray knew that his only chance lay in immediate flight, so ran toward the fort for dear life in its full significance. The Indians were in such close pursuit that those in the fort dared not open the gates, so that Ray was compelled to throw himself flat on the ground behind a small stump, scarcely large enough to shield his body, while those in the fort held the Indians at bay. Here, for several hours young Ray served as a target for Indian bullets, which ploughed up the ground all around, but happily failed to hit him. He at length implored those within the fort to dig under the wall and take him in, which ingenious method was actually accomplished. His mother was in the fort, and an eye-witness of the entire transaction.

On the south side of where the fort stood is located the oldest burying-ground in the state, many who are resting there having met a violent death in encounters with the savages. The older graves are unmarked, while one or two of later date bear the figures of 1800. This spot, doubly sacred for the dust of the brave and intrepid pioneers who rest beneath its sod, has been, I am sorry to state, long neglected and wantonly abused. The stone wall once inclosing it, has, in many places, fallen to the ground, and roaming cattle graze at will among its historic mounds. Even memory fails to note many of the occupants of its graves. They sleep on, as utterly forgotten as the autumn leaves that once rustled beneath their own footsteps in that long ago. What a surprise could they awaken and look forth to-day!

It would be difficult to reconcile the scene with that on which their eyes last closed, the peaceful village, with its church spires piercing the blue of heaven, and its yards and gardens bright with summer blossoms, the rich cultivated fields and tasteful farm-houses stretching out beyond, where all was once a dense canebrake or a tangled thicket, with here and there a small clearing and a rude log hut made by brawny, muscular energy that knew no fear of hardship nor of defeat.

Between the big spring and the site of the first encampment stands another tree which also figured in those early days. From this tree to the foot of Fort Hill was an unbroken canebrake or thicket, and during the long winter of 1779, which was a remarkably severe one, a party of Indians concealed themselves in the brake, while one of their number climbed into this tree and imitated the cry of a wild turkey, hoping to decoy the hunters from the fort, as they were known to be in want of provisions. Several of the white men were completely deceived by the ruse, and at once expressed a determination to discover the flock of turkeys and replenish their scanty larders; but young Ray, with his more acute ear, detected the subterfuge, and pronounced it to be a trap set by their wily foes. He prevailed on the others to remain in the fort on the alert, while he made a detour, avoiding the canebrake, and coming up behind the tree, from which he speedily dislodged the Indian, and then successfully made his way back to the fort.

Both James Ray and his brother passed through many exciting adventures, in one of which the latter was killed near Shawnee Spring in 1877. James lived to an advanced old age, and died in times of peace and prosperity, near the growing village his intrepidity had helped to establish.

In September of the year 1877, the first court ever held in Kentucky convened at the fort in Harrodsburg, the census of which then announced one hundred and ninety-eight men, women and children. All this portion of Kentucky was at that time known as the county of Lincoln, State of Virginia, and numerous old documents in the clerk's office at Harrodsburg bear the seal of Virginia. In the oldest deed book since Mercer county was established, we find a deed from James Harrod and his wife Ann to a Samuel Lawrence for a tract of land sold for three hundred pounds; and in the records of the court a long-continued law suit between Daniel Boone and James Harrod in regard to some land. This and a minor one are the only litigations in which Boone seems to have taken a part. Evidently he was only partially civilized.

A number of familiar historic names appear in these musty papers, among them Simon Kenton, Ray, McAfee, Adams, Wood, Hogue, Christopher Greenup, Hogan and others. We find, after much search among the dusty records, the following judgment:

Among other interesting records found in this office is the divorce of a certain Robbards from his wife, who afterward married Andrew Jackson, the circumstances of which union are sufficiently romantic to warrant a narration: There had been a temporary separation between Mrs. Robbards and her unworthy spouse, and she was staying with some friends in Tennessee when Jackson first saw her. He was a young lawyer just beginning his practice, and at a susceptible age, when a woman of Mrs. Robbards' accomplishments and brilliancy would inevitably produce a deep impression on his mind. So fascinating did she prove that he fell headlong in love with her, notwithstanding the rather serious obstacle of a husband already in possession. A knowledge of these matrimonial infelicities seemed, however, only to fan the flame of Jackson's adoration into a more ardent blaze. When she had returned to Kentucky and was again living with her husband, Jackson, on learning of the unhappy life she led, coolly carried her off behind him one day on his horse, took her to Virginia, placed her with some friends, procured a divorce for her, and they were married.

Afterward, the legality of their marriage having been questioned, the ceremony was again performed and the two were doubly wedded. It was due to insinuations concerning this union that the famous duel between Dickinson and Jackson was fought, in which the former was killed.

The indomitable will of Jackson was apparent in this affair when he stood unmoved after receiving a severe wound, and with unfaltering aim sent a deadly bullet through his adversary's body, remarking to the few who were present, that if Dickinson had shot him through the heart he should still have lived long enough to kill his man.

The base insinuations made by the enemies of Jackson clung to the reputation of his hapless consort throughout her entire life.

In 1807, my grandfather, Archibald Wood, married Miss Annie Adams, and removed from the country to Harrodstown, as it was then called. In 1779, his father had emigrated to Kaintuckee County, as the entire state was known, and settled near McAfee station, having with several other families, made the long, tiresome journey on horseback from Botetourt County, Virginia, by way of Cumberland Gap.

When my grandfather settled in his new home, the town consisted of nine or ten houses, built mostly of logs, and even boasted a store, where wooden and pewter ware and a few other luxuries could be purchased in limited quantities by housekeepers or those contemplating it. Among the effects of my grandmother's dowry on her marriage was a small mirror, which had come from England to Virginia and thence to Kentucky on horseback, and this rare article, probably the first in the new country, lent an elegance and tone to her log establishment that provoked the admiring envy of all neighbors, who regarded it as a marked and highly gracious favor to be permitted to consult it upon special occasions.

A few wooden platters, bowls, delf and pewter dishes comprised her table-ware, while tables, benches, bedsteads and cupboards were all of home manufacture of a very primitive sort of Eastlake squareness of design. Of course bed and table linen were also of home construction. Gradually, as communication with other places became more frequent, and the inhabitants increased in prosperity and general welfare, more elegance began to manifest itself in the household. Manufactured bedsteads, whose turned posts resembled gigantic ninepins, replaced the rougher article of furniture, keeping in countenance the tall chest of drawers with its glass knobs, and diminutive looking-glass on the top, and the thin-legged tables turned to the utmost extent in spiral decorations. Thrifty matrons prided themselves on their well-scoured floors, their dexterity with the spinning-wheel, the product of their busy looms, and the gorgeousness of their bed-quilts; those for the "spare room" generally being marvels in pattern and colors—red, green, yellow and white usually the component parts.

About this time, the nearest place of worship was at Cane Run, situated some five miles east of the town, but as the building was falling somewhat into decay, and the majority of the congregation lived in or near the latter place, it was decided to erect a new church, and the site of the old fort was selected. This was in 1816. Meetings were held alternately here and at Old Providence, eleven miles north of Harrodsburg, Rev. Thomas Cleland presiding over the respective flocks. Three years later, a heavy wind demolished the church built on Fort hill. Fortunately this occurred on a Sunday when services were held at Providence, so that no one was injured. My grandmother witnessed the demolition from her door which she had gone to close on the approach of the storm.

Weddings in those days were occurrences of universal interest to the entire community, and were conducted on a basis quite different from a matrimonial alliance of the present regime. The bride's trousseau was of an order that would now inspire Monsieur Worth with unutterable astonishment and horror—linsey and coarse linen dresses, woolen stockings, homespun under-garments and heavy shoes, the very appearance of which would cause a modern belle to faint outright. The bridegroom sported leather breeches, or leggings, or woolen trousers, unbleached linen shirts, and, if ultra aristocratic, a blue cloth coat, with numerous brass buttons, relics of still older days.

At a highly stylish affair which my grandmother

During this time the town was gradually, yet steadily improving. Several brick houses were built, a stone court-house erected and Main Street somewhat repaired, in which thoroughfare teams had heretofore frequently become stalled in rainy weather.

In 1836 Bacon College was founded, and about the same time the town began to attain notoriety as a watering-place, no less than seven or eight medicinal springs of excellent quality having been discovered in its immediate vicinity; the most famous of these were known as the Harrodsburg Springs, and were owned by Dr. Graham.

The grounds of this noted summer resort were naturally attractive, and by an outlay of some thousands of dollars were rendered exceedingly beautiful and commodious, containing one of the finest hotels in the West, besides numerous cottages and other buildings for the comfort and pleasure of the guests. The grounds attended, where each housekeeper was requested to bring whatever dishes, spoons and cutlery she could conveniently spare, the guests were especially dazzled by the magnitude and embellishments of a pyramidal cake that adorned the festal board; for, in those early days, a very diminutive luxury of this sort was regarded as highly extravagant, consequently this prodigal display occasioned undisguised astonishment. To the chagrin of the expectant guests, however, it was emphatically requested that this cake should not be cut, but reserved for the happy couple to devour at their own sweet leisure; so, after supper, when the table was removed to make room for the inevitable reels and cotillions that always followed the marriage ceremony, the cake was transferred to the milk-house, with other surplus eatables; not, however, until one or two young men, on mischief bent, had noticed its place of storage. Later in the night, a select party of youths silently repaired to the milk-house to indulge surreptitiously in a most unusual and coveted repast. Picture their surprise, disappointment and disgust when, on cutting it, they found it to be only light corn pone, thus skillfully fashioned into a veritable "whited sepulchre."

were finally sold by the owner to the Government, which used them as a home for disabled soldiers, and, later, as a hospital, during the recent "unpleasantness." Since then all of the buildings have been either burned or torn away, and at the present day nothing remains of its former elegance or loveliness save an occasional overgrown avenue of intertwining maples, under whose pleasant shadows the beauty and chivalry of the North and South once leisurely strolled, perchance intent upon a recital of the old, old story, while time flew idly by on butterfly wings.

After the abandonment of the Springs, with their gay and giddy crowds, the town seemed to sink into a comatose state, which lasted for many years. Bacon College, having been destroyed by fire, was re-established in Lexington, and united with Transylvania University, under the name of Kentucky University. The female seminary, which has become widely known as Daughters' College, was established in 1855, and still retains its excellent prestige, its alumni gracing the refined society of nearly every state in the Union.

Prior to the establishment of this school, another, known as Greenville Institute, had flourished for many years, and during one of its sessions an incident occurred in which Cupid played an important part. Among the young ladies was one, both wealthy and beautiful, who had been sent to this fountain-head of knowledge to store her mind with wisdom's lore, and especially to erase from her memory the attractions of a gay young fellow, who had found much greater favor in her eyes than in those of the old people, who fondly hoped that new surroundings would efface the remembrance of this little affaire du cœur from the daughter's thoughts. Special instructions were given to the principal of the institution that he should not only closely watch his lovely charge, but that any suspicious missives or appearances should be immediately reported at headquarters. Nothing of the kind, however, presented itself. The young lady was a model of decorum and submissiveness to all restrictive regulations pertaining to a large and well-conducted school.

There was, after a time, a handsome young stranger in the town, but he manifested no interest in the college or any of its inmates, and only a very acute ob-ing to their appearance had been seen bowling rapidly along the turnpike, bound for parts unknown. Instantly the school was in an uproar. The frenzied principal hastily sought the nearest livery stable to procure a vehicle, in order to overtake the runaway pair. Every moving thing in the stable had been engaged. Another livery stable was sought, but with the same result. Every vehicle was hired. Horses and buggies were there, but they had been previously engaged by a handsome young fellow for the remainder of the day, and on no account could the keeper allow them to go out. In vain the principal explained the urgent state of the case; the livery man was sorry, but inflexible; and when finally a private conveyance was procured the happy pair were well on their way to receive ministerial permit for two hearts to beat as one, while Cupid slyly winked to himself as he drew another arrow from his quiver to sharpen it for future use.

During the town's somnolent state, most of the buildings retained their chronic appearance of invalidism and respectable decay, while the events of succeeding days were uniform to the verge of monotony.

"At morn and at eve" the stager's horn awoke the echoes among the neighboring hills, as the lumbering coach rattled into the town; when, for a brief space a faint excitement manifested itself among the denizens of this veritable "Sleepy Hollow," but the momentary stir as readily subsided as do the wavelets when a pebble is thrown into sluggish water.

The poet says, "All things must suffer change," and, in confirmation of this, a gradual awakening became manifest, while a more energetic spirit prevailed. New and substantial buildings were erected on the site of those swept away by two disastrous fires, the town slowly widened and lengthened, until finally a climax was attained in a branch railroad of four miles in total length, tapping the Cincinnati Southern, which is also but recently completed, and connects its namesake with the southern terminus of Chattanooga.

A single short branch road was an almost incredible step toward progress, and when the first train was expected the town turned out almost en masse, and patiently sat in a most ardent sun hour after hour awaiting server would have perceived that he was on terms of close intimacy with a small boy, who visited a medicinal spring in the college grounds regularly each morning, and brought away a bottle of its healing waters, frequently waiting on the young school-girls, who usually made it an objective point in their morning stroll about the place.

Suddenly, one day, the handsome stranger and the model school-girl were missing, while a couple answer-its coming; and, although the train did not arrive until the following morning, the enthusiasm was still unbounded, and has since been only faintly reproduced on the appearance of the occasional circus, which has always proved an unfailing means of profoundly stirring the community. The village, as it now stands, is not an uncomely one, with its shade trees and comfortable dwellings and its attractive business houses, some thirty in number.

The churches comprise First and Second Presbyterian, Christian, Baptist, First and Second Methodist, Episcopal, Catholic and three churches belonging to colored congregations. Of these the majority may be said to be more useful than ornamental, while with the most picturesque one of the number, St. Philip's, the reverse is the case, services being held in it only semi-monthly.

There are also three hotels, a public hall and courthouse, where the famous Wilkinson trial was held, during which S. S. Prentice made one of his grand speeches. One of the jurors in that case is still living, and expatiates most enthusiastically on the eloquence of that sublime orator, who could move an audience at his will.

The latest census places the population of Harrodsburg at two thousand two hundred and two.

Few of the ancient landmarks now remain. Among them is the old Wingfield corner, once a flourishing tavern, whose hospitality both Prentice and Aaron Burr have enjoyed. Until within the last few years the ancient kitchen stood intact, with its immense cavernous fireplace, in which strong iron cranes were hung for the various pots and kettles considered indispensable in the production of an old-fashioned Kentucky dinner. In the ample dimensions of such a fireplace the yule-log might esteem itself comfortably at home.

There was certainly a genial air hovering about an ancient kitchen that no modern one, with all its improvements, can boast; while its extensive fireplace, with its open countenance, swinging crane and auxiliary array of pots, pans, skillets and kettles, suggested a hospitality to the hungry stranger totally unknown to the stoves and ranges of the present day. There are those, too, who claim that there is a certain indefinable virtue in having the touch of fire on the viands. Scientific theorizers may prate as they will of the uniform effects of heat on food subjected to its action, but you cannot persuade one who has tasted the culinary triumphs of an old-fashioned cook that the same results can be attained over the gaseous fumes of a modern coal range. Be that as it may, however, the cooking-stove is fast coming in even in remote regions of mountain and forest, and the open fire for domestic purposes is rapidly becoming a thing of the past.

REQUIESCAT IN PACE.—LIBERAL TRANSLATION—"REST IN PIECES."

All indications of the fort are entirely obliterated. The hill is being quarried, and some interesting relics may possibly be brought to light. There are numerous caves in and around Harrodsburg; in fact, there is a honeycomb of caverns underneath the greater portion of the place, but, as most of them contain water, they have been but partially explored. They were exceedingly damp, slippery and unattractive as far as examined, and in many places the openings were too narrow to admit of further penetration. In several openings, after heavy rains, the loud rush of water can be heard far below in the gloom and obscurity.

There is abundance of excellent water, and the town is healthfully located at an altitude of nine hundred feet above the sea, and is in many respects a desirable abiding place. The citizens are kind, hospitable and generous, while there is more than the average amount of talent, culture and refinement usually found in towns of its size.

Six miles east is the quiet, delightful village of Pleasant Hill, a community of Shakers, who, in the simplicity and orderliness of their lives, recall the Acadian farmers "who dwell in the basin of Minas."

A mile further east of this village, High Bridge, on the Cincinnati Southern Railroad, spans the Kentucky River at a point that has long been noted for the grandeur and beauty of its scenery, which is not excelled by the famous Palisades of the Hudson. This bridge is remarkable for its height and general construction. The track is nearly three hundred feet from the river bed and the length over eleven hundred feet. The cost of construction was about four hundred thousand dollars. Frequent pleasure excursions are made to this spot from various points, and during the summer picnic parties are of almost daily occurrence.

Once a year a camp-meeting is held on grounds in the immediate vicinity. These grounds are tastefully and comfortably arranged for the purpose.

Those whose acquaintance with the famous blue grass of Kentucky is limited to the bare knowledge that such a species has a botanical existence may be interested to know that it is otherwise classified as June grass (poa pratensis), and is found in various parts of the world. It reaches its most perfect development, however, in this favored belt of Kentucky. Thanks to its kindly influence, the thoroughbred stock of the region, both of horses and cattle, has attained an unrivaled reputation. In the subtle chemistry of nature blue grass is transformed into horse-flesh that is—so Kentuckians affirm—unsurpassed on the face of the earth. Perhaps state loyalty somewhat influences the favorable nature of this verdict, but certain it is that a strain of Kentucky thoroughbreds adds very materially to the value of a horse in professional eyes; and lovers of equestrian exercise are everywhere favorably impressed if it can be shown that the animal under consideration can trace his pedigree back to progenitors who breathed

Mercer, with its adjacent counties of Boyle, Anderson, Jessamine, Fayette, Woodford and Bourbon, comprise the greater portion of this renowned tract, so famous for its fertile soil, thoroughbred stock, lovely women, good whisky, brave men and hospitable entertainment, and all who have visited the locality are fain to hold it in kindest remembrance.

THE ARTISTS OF THE AIR.

THE busy artists of the air,
Unseen, came down the stormy stair,
To carve the wings of cherubs fair
 On crystal flakes of snow.
On the white ladder from aloft,
Ascending and descending oft,
From round to round, their steps so soft,
 Disturbed no sleep below.

So softly fell their wingéd feet
Upon the drifted snow and sleet,
No footprints marked the stainless sheet
 That covered hills and plains;
They graved devices here and there,
And strewed their art-work everywhere,
Their studio the boundless air,
 Their autographs on window-panes.

On stoop and fence and sill and door
Were mottoes never cut before,
In white words of the airy lore
 The skillful artists know;
Eagles of crystal, stars and shields,
And every weapon battle wield,
Were scattered over streets and fields,
 Lined and engraved on snow.

Each artist with a dainty hand
Wrote syllables of snow that stand,
Where falls the snow in every land,
 For memory and love;
And when the cloudless morning came,
Bearing aloft its torch of flame,
We could not trace an artist's name,
 Nor the white stairs above.

CHAPTER IX.

"But for the general award of Love,
The little sweet doth kill much bitterness."

MISS WATSON has at length had her will. The party to Wesenstein is hers; not, indeed, as to the defraying of its expenses, about which she shows no ill-bred empressement, but in the inviting of the guests, arranging for their transport, etc. And as this arranging includes the right to bounce not only into the sitting-rooms, which is a latitude she always allows herself, but into the most secret chambers of the invited guests, they begin to look with some eagerness towards the end of this period of license. It is true that Miss Watson meets with a good many refusals. The older-established among the English residents into whose private affairs her nose had been thrust throughout the winter months, the details of whose butchers' bills, servants' wages, discreditable members of their family, she has mastered with grisly accuracy, combine in one deep and unanimous "No." Not less emphatic is Professor Forth in his negative, based on the plea of ill health. Nor do the very direct questions addressed to him as to the nature and locale of his ailments—whether he has anything wrong inside him?—nor the confident assurance that it is all fancy, and that what he needs is to have his liver well shaken up, by any means avail to change his decision. But with all these deductions, there is still left a considerable residuum of new-comers, who are at the stage—a very brief and early one—of thinking Miss Watson an agreeable woman who has seen a great deal of the world, a stage on which they will hereafter look back with indignant incredulity; of girls greedy for pleasure, and not fastidious as to the source whence it flows, and of handsome, solid German soldiers, ready to follow wherever battle, beer or maidens lead. To these is, of course, added Rivers—Rivers who hitherto has fled through back doors, has squeezed himself through attic windows, has bolted round corners, and run like a leveret whenever his long-sighted eyes have caught the farthest glimpse of a black-and-white plaid gown! For the last week this same Rivers has groveled at the feet of the black plaid, has told her as nearly as he can conjecture the amount of his father's annual commercial gains, his sisters' probable portions, and whatever else—there is a good deal else—she may please to ask him. For does it not rest with her whether, during all the distance that parts Dresden from Wesenstein, he shall sit in glory and bliss in the same carriage with his mistress, opposite to her, so that her lightest movement may be felt thrilling all through him, eye drowned in eye, for ten or twelve delirious miles? or, parted from her, pine and rage in separation, with some senseless, smirking doll-face for a vis-à-vis, and only now and again catch distant frenzied glimpses of his lady, exposed to the coarse homage of insolent hussar or fire-eating Uhlan?

He has attained his object, or he thinks so. The morning has broken in settled summer fairness. He has slept no wink all night. He has not broken his fast. He is long, long first at the rendezvous. It is in the Lüttichau Strasse. For how long he kicks his heels in that gloomy thoroughfare he never knows. He would tell you that many hours passed before—several other unimportant ciphers having in the meanwhile packed themselves into various vehicles and set off—she at length comes stepping down the echoing stone stairs in her lofty, leisurely grace, clad in one of those lawny, lacy summer gowns, whose apparently inexpensive simplicity men innocently admire, and over the bills for which fathers and husbands wag their heads aghast. It is, in fact, her best gown, far too good for such an excursion, and its fellow is being thriftily saved by Sarah for future worthier London occasions. But to Belinda no occasion could ever seem worthier. She has taken her seat, and his one impulse is to spring in after her. It is only just in time that he saves himself from this fatal error.

Seeing that her companion, another young English girl, has preceded her, it follows that unless the Uhlan who is to make a fourth precedes him, the result will be that he, the Uhlan, and not Rivers, will sit knee to knee with Belinda through the long drive. As this idea strikes him, he takes his foot off the step again—as if it had been made of hot iron, and hastily retreating, eagerly motions the other forward. But the innocent soldier, attributing this movement solely to politeness, and in that determined not to be outdone, smilingly waves him on, to which Rivers responds by a more desperate backing. But as in any contest of bows and ceremonies and formal civilities an Englishman must always go to the wall, the dispute ends in the worsting of the person to whom alone it is of any consequence to succeed, who sees himself hopelessly excluded from the post which he had watched and fasted to obtain; and who, pale, empty, and miserable, hurls himself into his corner over against the blooming miss, who has seen, understood, and resented his frantic efforts to avoid her.

They are off; out of the town now; stretching steadily away across the flat country, that is now nothing but one gigantic nosegay. Every look they give rests on new flowers. Every mouthful of air they draw in is the breath of lilacs.

The cherry-snow is indeed gone, melted away as quickly as its cold prototype in thaw. But its crowding successors, the flushed apple-blossoms, the horse-chestnuts tardily breaking into pale spires, forbid them to remember or deplore it. What mood could be high or sweet enough to match the perfumed summer mornings? Certainly not Rivers'. He has exchanged the stunned silence in which he passed the two first miles for a wild garrulity. He talks à tort et à travers. He says foolish things, the sound of which surprises even himself. He insists on buttoning his miss's glove: a task which—certainly from no pleasure in the employment—his trembling fingers are long in accomplishing. In fact, to be exact, he never accomplishes it at all. For the glove being too small, and the hand plump, he succeeds at last in giving the latter such a painful nipping pinch, in the effort to effect a union between starting button and distant button-hole—not by any means "a lover's pinch that hurts and is desired"—that its owner angrily withdraws it.

From his garrulity he sinks back into a feverish dumbness, as apparently causeless as his former loquacity. How can his cruel cold lady look so calm and sunshiny under the hideous misadventure that has parted them? How dare she listen, with that sweet, high smile of hers, to her vis-à-vis's clumsy Teuton compliments? And what does he mean by crowding her so? Surely he could give her a little more room! And is she deaf, pray, that he must approach his ugly face so close to hers in conversation? Would not it be well to give him a hint that these are not the manners to which English gentlewomen are used? Happily his madness falls a little short of the execution of this wise project. And meanwhile, the unconscious Uhlan, sémillant, pleased with himself, with his position, with his plain clothes—rare luxury in which the stiff-buckramed German soldier is permitted to indulge in expeditions of this nature—airs his imperfect English, and slips from it continually back into his guttural mother-tongue, whither Rivers, despite the twelve lessons, cannot follow him, nor ascertain what amorous atrocities he may be committing in it. He is almost past deriving satisfaction from the perception of how ill-cut the plain clothes are, and of how much less comely poor Herr von — looks in them than he did yesterday in his showy uniform.

And Belinda? At first her disappointment, though decently hidden, had gone nigh to equaling his; but by-and-by the reflection that, once at Wesenstein—two short hours off—nothing but his own will can keep him from her side, makes her resign herself peaceably and civilly to the inevitable. Women know how to bide their time better than men do. They would pass but ill and discreditably through life if they did not. By-and-by, being but human and female, she yields herself to the influences around her; the soft and sugared air, the joy-drunk larks, the juicy grass fields thronged with bold dandelions and faint ladies'-smocks. What lady could ever be sweet or fine enough to deserve such a smock?

Past the rape-fields they go—rape so gloriously yellow that it looks like sown sunlight; past the pious-looking little German villages—high red roofs gathered at the church's knees; through the pleasant freundlich country, where everything is waxing in lusty length. And yet she is glad when Wesenstein is reached. Perhaps she would feel more emotion at arriving than she does, did she know the rational and humane intention nourished by Rivers, and which has kept him comparatively calm for the last three miles, to knock down the Uhlan upon the first sign of an intention on his part to help Miss Churchill from the carriage.

But, happily for the peace of the assemblage, the unconscious offender attributing to insular brutality Rivers' unceremonious shouldering of him from the carriage-door, yields gracefully a privilege that he has no particular care to keep, and leaves to the other undisputed possession of Belinda's three fingers. They are the last of the party to arrive, and so have the advantage of finding preliminaries over, and luncheon spread and tempting under the trained linden trees.

Above the lilac-smothered cottages, and the cheerful Gast-hof, beetles up the old white Schloss out of the solid rock on which it is built.

Between the Gast-hof and the garden, where their white table-cloth promisingly glimmers, runs a little river, quickened and discolored by last night's rain. It is spanned by a homely wooden bridge; and on this wooden bridge Sarah is standing, employed in dropping bits of stick—little lilac sprays, anything floatable that comes handy—into the earth-reddened stream on one side, and then rushing headlong over to the other to see them come sailing and whirling through. In this mature pastime she is being helped by two large hussars and a Gardereiter. She is in the best of spirits, and has already told them all about the Professor, and how delighted she is to be rid of him.

The rest of the party are dispersed in summer sauntering about the bowery village, all but Miss Watson, who, following that God-given instinct which prompts the mole to delve, the beetle to scavenge, and the swallow to fly, is ravaging everywhere, red-faced and ruthless, making, marring, meddling. She has had a happy and instructive drive with some quite new comers, and has succeeded, to their dismay and her own satisfaction, in extracting from them that they have a sister in a lunatic asylum. So that it is in high good-humor and content that—the complement of guests being now full—they all sit down to their homely feast.

It is true, that no sooner are they seated—seated as their own choice, or as the lurking inclination of any two for each other prompts, than their hostess bustles officiously round to dislodge them.

"Three men together here, and two ladies there! Come—come! this will never do; we must manage better than this! Mr. Rivers, I must beg you to fly to the rescue: come and part these two ladies!"

In what spirit this request is received may be gathered from the fact that Rivers has at last attained to the one object and goal of all his hot vigils and fasting-days. His wooden chair is drawn up as closely as the legs of both will permit to Belinda's, and on her other hand he has successfully arranged an ugly ravenously fledgling boy, of whom not even he can be jealous.

Though such is the quality of Miss Watson's voice, that nothing short of an utterly broken drum could prevent its finding entrance into any ear, he adopts the desperate feint of not having heard, not even when she repeats her order in a sensibly louder key.

"Had not you better try some one else?" says Sarah dryly, coming to the rescue; "it is odd, but he does not seem to hear!"

"I cannot have spoken loud enough," rejoins the other, with unconscious irony. "Mr. Rivers!"

"You will have to put up with Herr von Breidenbach!" says Sarah, this third appeal having met with the fate of its predecessors, glancing up at her spare hussar, who—no lady having more than two sides, and his brother soldiers having been too quick for him—is hanging lingeringly over her chair-back, reluctant altogether to abandon her even for beer and Schinken, and having just overtaken her last joke and begun to roar at it. Under these circumstances, neither is he particularly keen about obeying Miss Watson's command. However, a wily look from his maiden, promissory of far better things after luncheon, sends him off fairly contented, and the storm is averted.

"It is sad for a young man, being so deaf, is not it?" says Sarah, with her innocent air.

"Is it in his family?" asks Miss Watson eagerly. "It is in some families, you know. In some families every member is deaf from childhood. All the Champneys of Nether-Stoney are deaf. I must ask him whether it is in his family!"

And this little squall—after all only the threat, not the reality of one—is the sole break in the golden halcyon sunshine of what Rivers, though he ate next to nothing—and that next to nothing may have been horse, or hippopotamus, for all he knew to the contrary—now looks back upon as the most regal banquet of his life.

What banqueting-hall, indeed, painted with goddesses and fair sea-women, could equal the low linden-roof above their heads? What hall-hangings could come nigh the soft little red vine-leaves, and the tiny tendrils just beginning to twist their airy fingers round the wooden trellis? What chamber-music could surpass that of the full brook and the larks?

By-and-by, it is true, both are drowned in the noise of the ever-waxing talk and laughter. They are almost all young; they are out on a spree; they have been hungry and now are full; is it any wonder that it needs but a very little jest to set them all off in clamorous mirth?

There is presently a Babel of tongues. The end of Miss Watson's story of how she sent in her card, and finally forced her way in, to the Great Llama of Thibet—a tale which strangers regard as a bad and glaring lie, but which her acquaintances feel to be not only probable, but true—is lost in the general din.

Sarah is in her glory. She has been nibbling marrons glacés, and teaching her soldiers to play bob-cherry with some fine forced fruit contributed by Rivers, regardless of the famine price he paid for them, to tempt his lady's palate.

Rewarded by the succès fou of this accomplishment, she proceeds to exhibit several others, not included in the curriculum of an ordinary education; the most admired among which is that one—not so widely known as its simple ingenuity deserves—of crossing the fore and middle fingers, and slowly passing them down the bridge of the nose, thereby discovering a chasm of great depth, apparently parting the nose into two. Before long there is not a soul at the table whose fingers are not traveling eagerly down his or her nose, some to verify the discovery as new, some to enjoy it as old. Hussars, Gardereiters, Uhlands, combine to cry "Famos!" "Kolossal!" and when at length chairs are pushed back, and the cherries and the revel are together ended, Sarah finds her court swelled by the admirers of almost all the other girls, unable to resist the attractions of a maiden who, to such Veilchen Augen and such a figure, adds talents of so varied and unusual an order.

They are so occupied in thronging round her, and she is so obliging in promising to teach them, one and all, many more tricks by-and-by, that Miss Watson's bawling command that they are now all to go over the Schloss, passes for some time unregarded.

In time, however, she collects them, the unwilling as well as the willing—the former greatly preponderate—and sweeping them off out of the sunshine and the merry summer air, gives them into the charge of a surly, high-flavored, and grasping-minded Verwalter, who leads them through an endless enfilade of bare rooms, cold and dank even on this warmly-honeyed May-day, and fleeces them at the end.

CHAPTER X.

"He tells her something That makes her blood look out."

MISS WATSON'S tyranny, however, one pair succeeds in evading. By a cautious and judicious loitering until the tail of the plaid gown has been seen safely to whisk round the corner, they find themselves free, absolutely at their own disposition, for as long as the Verwalter's windy narrative may last, and with all the Schloss garden for their own—all its sunshine, all its shelter, all its old-world grace.

Sun-petted, defended from each one of Heaven's rough winds, it lies at the Schloss foot. Around it rise the woody hills, the humble low hills of a flat country, but now with their humility made proud, with their insignificance rendered significant, by the inexpressible magnificence of spring.

Into the very core of Belinda's and Rivers' happy hearts has the spring spirit passed. Too happy for common speech, they sit on a time-worn stone bench, with their young and radiant eyes pasturing on the sweet, still prospect; the high and ancient Schloss, clock-towered and red-roofed, soaring out of the plentiful new leafage; and seen down a vista of thick and venerable hedges, so accurately and squarely clipped that not a leaf projects from the verdurous primness, an old stone Flora, with her lap full of garden flowers. On the prospect, I say, their eyes pasture; but from it they continually turn to each other's faces, as being yet lovelier and more joyful.

"Try to be a little depressed!" Crossing her secure bliss, Sarah's worldly-wise precept flashes, only to be contemptuously dismissed. What needs she any mean ruse to gain him?

For the moment, doubt and fear have vanished from her heart, cast out and slain by an exultant certainty of joy. How dare she, looking in his face, have any mean and unworthy misgivings as to his being wholly hers, body and soul, through all time, and through whatever may follow time? How could she, even if she wished it, feign to be low-spirited? she, in comparison with whose high and passionate content even the larks are melancholy and the river dull? What need have they for coarse and clumsy words? But after all, words, though coarse and clumsy, are the coin in which human creatures must pay each other, and failing in which, they are often bankrupt for life.

It is doubtful whether Sarah would give much approval to a conversation—if such it can be called—of so highly impractical a cast—a conversation made up of hot sighs, and torrid looks, and broken syllables of ecstasy; but in which there is no most distant allusion to either priest or altar.

It is broken in upon before it has reached a more articulate stage by the voices of the Schloss seers, who, their task happily accomplished, every cold room and bad daub faithfully seen, are now let loose, like school-boys at noon, upon the silent garden.

"Like to a moving vintage down they came,
Crown'd with green leaves, and faces all on flame;
All madly dancing through the pleasant valley,
To scare thee, melancholy."

In a moment there is not a trim walk or finely-graveled alley that is not alive and noisy with jokes and merriment. They intercept the view of the Flora. They steel the cowslips and little white saxifrage that grow on the sternly-prohibited grass. It is impossible to escape their laughter and their eyes. They are everywhere. More universally pervasive than any one else, more turbulent, more wildly hilarious are Sarah and her little court. But yet there is a method in her madness, as her sister has soon occasion to discover; for, protected by the noise of voices round her, she presently draws Belinda aside, to whisper in the hardest, soberest, common-sense voice, "Has he spoken?"

Belinda, thus suddenly dragged down from the empyrean, shrinks wincingly away without answering; but in vain. "Has he?" repeats the other resolutely, taking hold of her wrist in detention; and as a faint unwilling head-shake confirms the suspicion she already nourishes, "More shame for him!" she says quickly; "try the wood."

There is no time for more. Next moment she is off—a frolicking madcap—with her hussars. If Rivers had overheard her—for one dreadful moment the thought flashes across Belinda, “Is it possible?”—he could hardly have worded his next sentence differently.

“What a bedlam they have made of this!” he says, casting an irritated glance round on the Bacchic crew; “shall we try the wood?”

Five minutes ago she would have assented gladly, not less thankful than he to escape from the empty din; but now the consciousness of the coarse and business-like intent with which, did she comply, she would be seeking those innocent shades, makes her answer with almost all her old coldness:

“I think we do very well here!”

He does not press his request; only that look of blank disappointment that she knows, comes like a creeping, chilly fog across his passionate fair face. He, too, is precipitated from the heights. They walk stupidly along, side by side, for a space. Afterwards they re-rect, in bitter looking back, that they must have wasted quite a quarter of an hour of their one high holiday. Not more than a quarter, however. By the end of that time they have twice met Miss Watson, and been closely questioned by her as to what they were talking about. Once, indeed, the better to investigate this, she has joined them for several paces, and would probably have remained with them, had not the sight of another tête-à-tête that looked even more absorbing than theirs, ravished her away to disturb it.

No sooner is her broad back averted, than “You were right,” says Belinda, turning to the young man with a humorous yet trembling smile, “the wood is best.”

“Then, for God’s sake, come there at once, or she will be after us!” he cries, with a hot and tragic eagerness ludicrously disproportioned to the occasion that has called it forth.

She does not now need to be twice bidden, and away they speed, casting apprehensive glances over their shoulders, glances that see black plaid gowns in every harmless bush, until the safe covert of the wood is reached.

That is not long. It is only a few paces off, just beyond the garden. And yet, near and accessible as it is, none of the revelers have as yet divined it. It has, indeed, a too-much-frequented air, of which the well-beaten pathway tells; but, for the time, it is silent and safe.

She has sat down, a little quick-breathed from her run—they had even descended to running—on the pathside grass, and he has flung all his supple long length at her feet.

“So we are alone again,” he says, drawing a heavy sighing breath. “My life is now one long maneuver to be alone with you; and how seldom I succeed!”

She laughs nervously. With whom but himself does it lie to command her company while life lasts? She has no longer the heavenly confident certainty that blessed her in the garden. She has changed it for a hot and doubting unrest; for an avoiding, and yet at the same time for a contradictory craving to meet and answer those madly asking eyes. Why is it that the eyes alone ask?

“Perhaps it is as well for you,” she says, with a tremulous brusqueness.

“What do you mean?” he asks, speaking hardly above a whisper; already the dread that he has advanced too far, and that for the hundredth time she is going to freeze him back again beginning to stay the beating of his leaping heart.

“I mean,” she says, forming the words with immense difficulty, and in a tone that to herself sounds dry and forbidding, “that perhaps you would not find the charm of tête-à-têtes with me increase in the same proportion as their frequency.”

“Will you try me?” He cannot speak above a whisper now. How is it likely that he should, when his burning heart has sprung up into his throat and is choking him? Has not he thrown the die, upon which his universe turns?

But to her, his four words have an ambiguous sound that may mean all or nothing. How, then, can she answer them?

There is a silence. So hushed and sleeping are all the winds that not even any one of the young leaves above their heads rubs, slightly rustling, against another. If those leaves, or the flowers on which they lean, or the birds of heaven could but have been interpreters between him and her! She has taken off her gloves, the better to pull the fresh grasses near her, and her right hand now lies palm upwards on her knee. Upon it his eyes, sinking for a moment from her face, have greedily fixed themselves. What could not those five slight fingers give him, if they would?

“Why are you looking at my hand?” she asks, laughing unsteadily. “Can you tell me whether I have a good line of life? do I live long? am I happy? do I?”—“marry,” she is going to say, but she stops herself—“is there any great misfortune or dangerous illness in store for me?” She is talking rapidly and à bâtons rompus, feeling that she must find words of some kind, no matter what, to fill up that too pregnant silence; feeling that the cool-breathed wood is stifling, and that if she pause for one moment her tears will have way and forever disgrace her.

For all answer, his heart-hunger mastering him, the poor boy fastens on the hand of which she speaks. There is a singing in his ears and a fog before his eyes; but he has it. In his own shaking fingers he holds that sacred palm, that never before, save in meaningless comings and goings, has he touched. In all its satin warmth and smoothness, it lies in his. Will he ever let man or devil rob him of it? He would tell her “No.” So the supreme moment has come, and she recognizes it.

“Do you see that I am to take a long journey?” she says, stooping her quivering face over their two locked hands.

What more propitious moment could even Sarah choose in which to tell him of their departure? But she does not think of Sarah.

For a moment he seems not to take in the meaning of her words. Is there room in all his seeing, hearing, understanding, for aught but the one surpassing fact that his lady has deigned at last to lay her hand in his, and that her starry eyes, soft, merciful, passionate, are, through a splendid curtain of tears, bent on his own.

After a while, “Are you going away?” he says mistily. Even yet words come but strangely to him, and his head swims.

“Yes,” she answers, she, too, scarce knowing what she speaks; “the cherry-blossoms are gone, and the lilacs will soon go, and so must we!” Often beforehand has she rehearsed the scene in which she is to tell him of her going. Imagination has tricked it out in various shapes and colors, but the reality is unlike them all.

He expresses neither regret nor surprise—he expresses nothing. He only lifts the long lily band that he holds, and laying its palm against his burning mouth, softly passes his lips to and fro over the little fair lines in which her history is written.

Where is his timidity now? It was only her displeasure that had ever made him afraid; and even he can see that there is no displeasure here. She is pale, indeed, but it is with the pallor of conquering passion; and very still, but it is the stillness of one who, looking up in awful joy, sees the dawn of a superb new world breaking upon her.

"Are you sorry?" she says, with a half-sob. "You do not tell me whether you are sorry."

He is no longer lying at her feet. He is kneeling in his beautiful glad manhood at her knee.

"Sorry!" he repeats, with a sort of ecstatic scorn. "Why should I be sorry? It is only you who can ever make me sorry again!"

So it has come. For a moment she closes her eyes, as one faint with a bliss whose keenness makes it cross the border-land and become pain, and so is gathered into his strenuous embrace.

For one second she lies on his heart. For one second the breath of her sweet sigh stirs his hair. Their faces are nearing each other slowly, in the luxury of a passionate delay, to make yet more poignant the pleasure of their supreme meeting at last, when—

"Mr. Rivers! Mr. Rivers!"

What horrid sound is this that is breaking into and murdering the divine quiet of the wood? that is breaking into and murdering their diviner union? That sound once silenced, the wood will return to its stillness; but when to them will that moment ever return? When will that begun embrace be ended?

For one instant they remain paralyzed and uncomprehending in each other's arms; then, as the voice comes again—the unmistakable brazen voice, from which, in less crucial moments, they have so often fled in panic aversion—comes nearer and louder, in obviously quick approach to them, they spring apart, and stand dazed and panting in wild-eyed consternation that the cruel work-a-day world has so early thrust itself again upon them, and that their heavenly trance is broken.

Belinda is the first to recover the full use of her senses.

"It is she!" says the girl, breathing quick and short, and putting up her trembling hands to her bonnet and hair to insure that all is neat and tight and unbetraying. "We might have known that she would have hunted us down!"

He does not answer. Perhaps his intoxication was deeper than hers, and that he has more ado thus suddenly to shake it off. Perhaps the rage of that lost kiss—of his arms emptied of, as soon as filled with, his heart's desire—makes sight and hearing still thick.

"Mr. Rivers! Miss Churchill! Mr. Rivers!"

How loud the voice is now! It must be only just round the next corner; and a heavy foot is audible, accompanying it.

"We had better go and meet her," says Belinda desperately; and they go.

"So here you are!" cries Miss Watson cheerfully, coming into view, evidently en nage from the speed of her chase. "What a hunt I have had for you! Did not you hear me calling? I called quite loud. Where have you been hiding?"

"Do you want us?" asks Belinda, modulating her trembling voice with excessive care; and, after all her pains, wondering whether it sounds as extraordinary to her interlocutor as it does to herself.

"I have been collecting everybody," cries the other, fanning herself. "I think," smiling, "that I have collected everybody now. I want us all to keep together."

"Why should we herd together in a drove? Are we Cook's tourists?" asks Rivers, speaking for the first time, and in a tone of dogged brutality, looking murder-ously at her. In his face is clearly expressed the sentiment of Balaam: "I would I had a sword in my hand, for then would I slay thee!"

"I always keep my parties together!" replies Miss Watson, still smiling. "It is so much more sociable! It spoils a party to break it up. When I was in the Holy Land, we went a picnic to Bethabara, twenty-five of us on donkeys, and we all kept together. If we all keep together there will be no difficulty about collecting at starting."

"We are not going yet?" cries the young man, for a moment forgetting himself, and betrayed into a tone of passionate apprehension.

"Well, not immediately, of course. There will be plenty of time to explore this wood a little, if you feel inclined. Whose wood is it? The King's, eh? Not much in the way of timber; but then there never is much in the way of timber in a German wood. Where does this path lead to—have you any idea? What do you say to following this path a little, to see where it leads to?"

They have fallen into a stupid silence. That paralysis of the will which overtakes all upon whom Miss Watson bestows her company, has seized them with a numbing force proportioned to their frenzied inward revolt. She drives them before her, unresisting, through the wood.

"Well?" says Sarah, in a tone of the keenest and most urgent interrogation. It is night, and they are at home again. The long twilight still lies on the city, but the hour is latish. The two girls have been deposited at their house in the Lüttichau Strasse, and are climbing the cold stone stairs to their apartment. "Well?"

Belinda's answer is to quicken her pace and race up the remaining steps.

"Two can play at that game," says Sarah, springing after her, active as a cat, and facing her again on the landing. "Well?"

But before she has extracted any more answer than before, Tommy has opened the door of the étage and admitted them.

"Well, granny," cries Sarah, marching briskly into the salon, blinking a little from the sudden light, taking the old lady's smooth face in both hands, and giving it a sounding kiss, "here we are! We have had a very happy day, and I am engaged, more or less, to three people. By-the-by, they are all going to call to-morrow."

"I am delighted to hear it, I am sure, my dear, if it amuses you," replies Mrs. Churchill, placidly rearranging the dainty tulles and laces that her granddaughter's embrace had ruffled; "but I think I have heard something like it once or twice before."

"And Belinda is not engaged at all!" continues Sarah indignantly, looking eagerly toward her sister to see whether this direct statement does not call forth any disclaimer. But none comes.

"You do not say so?" rejoins Mrs. Churchill, in a tone of civil but tepid interest, stifling a slight yawn. She does not care much about Belinda, who does not amuse her, while the "Daudet," from whose pages her grandchildren's entrance has roused her, does.

"Is it possible," says Sarah, advancing with a threatening gesture to her sister—"do you dare to look me in the face and tell me that you have not brought him up to the point after all?"

Still silence, and a look toward the door suggestive of meditated evasion by it. But this move the other anticipates by placing herself between Belinda and all means of exit.

"Did you take him to the wood?"

"Yes."

"Did you tell him we were going?"

"Yes."

"And nothing came of it?" cries Sarah in a tone of such profound and unfeigned stupefaction that Belinda, though certainly at this moment not mirthfully minded, breaks into a laugh. "Bless my soul, what stuff can you both be made of? Granny, what stuff can they be made of?"

But granny has gone back, true as the needle to the Pole, to her novel, and declines to take any further part beyond a slight shrug in her granddaughter's affairs.

"Well, you know our agreement," continues Sarah, beginning to walk up and down in a fervid excitement, that contrasts with the elder woman's phlegm; "you know our agreement: to-morrow—you may think I am joking, but I assure you that I never was more in earnest in my life—to-morrow I ask him his intentions."

A charming flickering smile breaks like moonlight on water over Belinda's face.

"I give you leave!" she says in a voice that though low and tremulous is distinct.

Then, vanquishing all her junior's efforts to detain her, pushing indeed impetuously past her, she flies to her own room and double-locks herself in; nor do all Sarah's plaintive pipings through the key-hole and angry rattlings of the lock avail to dislodge her.

A STATUTE OF LIMITATION.

I HAVE received various letters asking me to discuss in your columns certain questions connected with love and marriage of which I have not yet spoken. One of these letters, in particular, refers to so important a possibility that I cannot pass it by in silence. The advice already given, the writer is kind enough to say, is just what is wanted for the happy people, whose marriages have been made in Heaven, and who need only such tender care as I have suggested to preserve the heavenly atmosphere amid the chances and changes of earthly life; but,—and I will quote the words of the letter, since they put the writer's point very forcibly,—“there are cases, and alas they are not rare, in which the twain, instead of becoming one flesh, remain most decidedly and distinctly two, and in which the only possibility of their becoming one must consist in the debasement of the nobler character to something like the grade of the lower. How far, then, should this yielding up of one's best self for the sake of peace and union with one's nearest and most constant companion be carried? I yield,” the letter-writer continues, “to no one in my ideal of what married life should be; but I know too sadly well what too often it really is. I have seen instances in which a naturally noble, generous, upright nature has been warped by an overbearing, grasping, selfish and jealous one until its native characteristics seemed almost extinguished. Should there not be a limit to a self-devotion and self-sacrifice which would result in spiritual, moral, mental and social degeneracy? Those who are inclined to demand the utmost yielding up of another's temporal and intellectual interests and pleasures, who require as their right the subjugation, in that other, of every native impulse and desire, who claim every thought, and would sit in judgment on every act, are the very ones who, on their own side, abuse and debase the relation whose rights they are so strenuous to maintain. For such cases as these should there not be a Statute of Limitation?”

It seems to me that the foregoing letter has set forth one of the most perplexing problems of married life. As I have said before, if people married rightly—if all marriages were founded, as they should be, on mutual fitness and that perfect love which many waters cannot quench, neither can the floods drown—there would be no such discordant unions as those to which my correspondent refers. But to answer her question by saying that such marriages ought not to exist would be as idle as it would be for a physician, summoned to the bedside of a suffering patient, to say, “Yes, but you should not be ill—health, not sickness, is the true law of life.” Unfortunately a large part of the human race is ill, in one way or another, and a large number of the married people in the world are certainly not mated.

—“Thou shalt lower to his level day by day,
What is fine within thee growing coarse to sympathize with clay,” predicts Tennyson, in “Locksley Hall,” of pretty Cousin Amy, prudently “married to a clown;” and surely spiritual and mental deterioration is the worst fate that can befall a human being, and to avert it by whatever honest means is a duty to one's own soul.

There is a higher law than the obedience that one promises in marriage, and that is obedience to the eternal commands of Right. If a husband requires his wife to steal or to lie, though the civil law may condone her offense because of her subjection to her legal lord, is there an honest man or woman who will not admit that she ought to have disobeyed and defied him? And so, if he would influence her to be unkind, harsh, suspicious, ungenerous, it seems to me equally to be her duty to live up—not defiantly, but quietly and resolutely—to her own standard of right; and I believe, since God and one human soul must always be a majority, that nine times out of ten the result of such a quiet, resolute, fearless life would be to raise the husband, and not debase the wife.

But it is not always by any means, the wife who is in danger of being lowered to her husband's level—the opposite case is by no means infrequent. Alas! have we not all seen men who were naturally chivalrous and high-minded become gossiping, censorious and ungenerous through constant association with narrow-brained, shallow-natured, yet strong-willed women whom they, for some reason, have loved? It is because this influence of constant association in marriage is at once so subtle and so potent that such infinite care is necessary to marry well. Do you suppose that Lydgate, in “Middlemarch,” could ever be the same man he might have been had he married a woman like Dorothea, instead of a woman like Rosamond? Could one be associated daily and nightly with Becky Sharpe and escape her influence if, in any sense, however unworthy, one loved her?

But grant that the mistake has been made—that Lydgate has married Rosamond, or that some white-souled lily of a woman has blindly married a man who is of the earth earthy, and to whom what she calls honor is a jest—what then?

The one only character which any of us can surely calculate on controlling or affecting is our own; and since the most important thing on earth is character—not reputation, but character; not what is said of us, but what we are—we have no right to throw down its defenses for whatever cause.

—“To thine own self be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.”

Peace is dear indeed; and one would fain sit tranquilly among the household gods, whatever wild winds may blow outside—but there is something still better and higher than peace. If, as I believe, the life we live here is but one chapter in the soul's history, what peace or pleasantness, even of marriage, can make up for the degradation of this immortal part of us, whose highest aspiration is to “go on, and not to die”? No gain, in marriage or out of it, can compensate the soul for being false to its own ideal, disobedient to that high call with which it has been called upward.

But in this view of things there is one danger of which we should take account. Let us beware of mental or spiritual self-conceit—of thinking ourselves better than another, because we are different—fancying ourselves higher and purer than we really are. Before we persuade ourselves that wife or husband is a clod of the valley, “the grossness of whose nature shall have weight to drag us down,” would it not be well to be quite sure where we ourselves stand—whether the divergence which seems to us so formidable is really of principle or only of taste—whether the selfishness we condemn has not been detected through the alchemy of a corresponding selfishness in ourselves—whether our real desire is that Right should triumph, or that we should have our own way?

Sacrifice of justice and honor and loyalty—of what is highest and best in us—can never be right; but there is scarcely any form of mere self-sacrifice which may not be blest abundantly; nor is the human soul degraded by truly loving even the unworthy. To love Evil itself is one thing—to love the victims of Evil is quite another. One of the best women I ever knew once said to me: “What a poor thing it is that we, so full of imperfection ourselves, should feel injured and resentful when we find imperfections in those we love; as if love itself were not its own exceeding great reward, and as if the human soul were not ennobled and enriched by its own love, however needy and deficient might be the object on whom this love is bestowed.”

While the sun of God shines as warmly on the just as on the unjust, shall we venture to shut our hearts against the housemate who has possibly not struggled quite so far as ourselves on the upward-climbing path toward whose far heights we still so vaguely aspire?

THE HAPPY ISLANDS.

HE roams about the town from dawn till dark,
An old man with bent form and whitened hair,
Who dreams the earth he treads on is a bark
That sails to find a shore forever fair,
The shore so many seek and do not find.
Among the busy crowd, he heeds it not,
But goes and comes to all our pleasure blind;
The world he lives in seems by him forgot.

Sometimes he stops one in the crowded throng
And questions thus: “Why do we sail so far?
I know full well the vessel's course is wrong,
For farther south the Happy Islands are,
And we are near them, for last night I heard
The sound of music coming from their shores,
And caught the scent of flowers, and one bright bird
Flew homeward, over us, to roam no more.

“I almost thought I saw them in the dawn,
Fair as the rosy peaks of Paradise;
But when the day broke fully they were gone.
Far, farther south the shore we search for lies!
Pray God they turn the vessel ere too late!
Must we sail by, as many times before?
They make mistakes, and lay it all to Fate
That we have never reached the longed-for shore.”

And as he talks the old man's eager eyes
Are looking southward, where he hopes to see
The purple peaks, crowned with strange glory, rise
'Neath fairer skies than those of Italy.
No sight of land breaks on his hopeful eyes.
“Ah, we have missed them, as so oft before!
And we were near, so near to them,” he cries.
“Must we sail on and on forevermore?”

Where are our Happy Islands? Must we sail
Forever past them when so near they seem?
Blow from the shores we left, O favoring gale,
And waft us to the shores that haunt each dream!
O fellow voyagers, pray God we find
The land we seek and do not pass it by!
Oh, blow us to the south, inconstant wind!
For there, we think, the Happy Islands lie.

CHAPTER XXXI.

ON THE DIVIDE.

SKENDOAH was not in ashes, but a black, smouldering gap in the row of factories along the bank of the stream greeted the eyes of its people on the morning succeeding the events of our last chapter. The rush of water along the tortuous channel had subsided. The prisoned lake had escaped from thralldom. Only a sparkling rivulet ran along the muddy bottom of the great reservoir, bustled through the open jaws of the huge waste-gate, and foamed and flashed in the long-unused channel below. Flood and fire had both despoiled the little town, but the former had put an end to the ravages of the latter. By what means the gate had been opened, and whether as an act of good or evil purpose, no one knew. At any other time, the flood would have been an absolute misfortune. Coming as it did, it was an inestimable blessing. Yet it had left rueful marks as well as the flame it quenched. The street across which the battle with the flames had been fought had been submerged a few moments afterwards. The water pouring through the gate, impelled by the weight of the accumulated store behind the dam, would have soon overflowed the channel had it been straight and unobstructed. But it was neither. Little by little factories and bridges had encroached upon the domain of the mountain torrent, until, when it suddenly burst loose, it was to find its way choked and impeded at every turn. It tore away one obstruction after another, only to heap up in a bend just below the village the debris of its fury, until its tumultuous rage was, for the time, effectually checked. Then the waters began to rise in the town, sullenly and silently heaping up behind this temporary barrier, until they crept into the lower windows of the factories, caught the hissing cinders that fell from the flaming buildings, passed beyond the farther walls, stole across the street, and choked in rising vapor the conflagration that raged above its dark and angry surface. Lake Memnona was empty once more. The fire was extinguished. The flood had subsided. Dawson Fox was dead. Harrison Kortright was chained to his bed with the shackles of his old enemy newly fastened on his overwrought system. On the hillside beyond, a black smouldering mass lay among the scorched and blighted trees where the prettiest and richest of the mansions of Skendoah had stood.

"Who did it?" was the inquiry which each one asked of himself and his neighbor. The idlers who gazed at the ruins, loitered about the streets and met in the doorways, talked of nothing else. The water being turned off, the remaining mills were shut down, some of them that the damages by the flood might be repaired, and the others because there was no inclination on the part of any one to labor. The boys played up and down the stream, clambered in and out of the broken windows of the mills, burrowed among the debris of the overflow for flotsam, or waded about upon the slimy bottom of the pond in search of finny prey which had been left among the ooze by the sudden decadence of the waters. But all the time they were wondering, like their elders, as to the cause of the calamity.

In the town-hall, on a plainly-draped bier, lay the body of Dawson Fox. At that time the people of the little country town, despite its sudden dash at prosperity, had not learned to decorate the place of the dead. Flowers at a funeral would have been regarded almost as a sacrilege, and no one even thought of draping the banner that hung listlessly above the platform, across the coffin. All was cold, dull black, save the fixed white face, with its framework of white satin, that lay within. Solemn-faced and noiselessly the people passed in and out. A jury of inquest was impaneled in the room below, and came up in a body to view the corpse. There needed to be no autopsy. A thousand knew the cause of death. The real inquiry was as to the cause of the fire.

The examination was a profitless one. Many witnesses were called, many questions asked and very little learned. A few facts were made plain:

1. The gate which supplied the common race by which all the mills received their supply of water, had been closed at four o'clock on the day previous, by general consent of the owners and operatives.
2. The water had been turned off the wheel in Kortright's mill and the machinery stopped, by express order of the owner, an hour earlier than the time mentioned.
3. When the fire was discovered, at about a quarter to ten o'clock in the evening, the wheel was running and the machinery of the mill in motion.
4. The waste-gate was not opened until more than an hour after the breaking out of the fire. It had never been opened before since the building of the dam. It was reached by a frame of timbers that extended above the dam some forty feet or more, into the deepest part of the original channel. It was worked by a large iron screw, which itself was operated by means of a wooden lever which passed through its head. To open these gates to their fullest extent, as they were found the next morning, with a head of forty feet of water or thereabouts resting against them, was a task requiring no little time and strength for its accomplishment.

5. Paradise Bay was discovered to be on fire something more than half an hour after the rush of water through the waste-gate was first noted.

From these facts the jury concluded that Kortright's mill and Kortright's house were set on fire by some person desirous of doing him an injury, and utterly reckless as to those who might share in the calamity. There were some other incidents which served more to confuse the jury than to aid them in prosecuting the inquiry beyond this point. Just here two very troublesome questions arose :

1. Why was the machinery of the mill put in motion ?
2. Why were the waste-gates opened ?

To the first, the most evident and general response was that it was done through sheer wantonness of malice. To the second, there was an inclination to reply that the incendiary, terrified at the result of his work, had hit upon this plan to extinguish the flames, and repair, to some extent, the evil he had done.

In seeming contradiction of this theory, however, was the fact that the wooden lever used to open the gates was found in the road half way to Kortright's residence. If the two fires were regarded as the work of one incendiary, it was evident that after kindling the first he had passed along the top of the dam, opened the sluice and then lighted the second. This was the general belief. Some dwellers in the upper part of the town testified to having seen a dark form pass and repass along the crest of the dam while the fire was at its height. A boy who had come from a farm-house upon the east side of the stream to witness the conflagration that was raging beyond, had been terrified by a strange shape that rushed at him with an uplifted bludgeon not far from where the gate-lever was found. He had not waited for further inquiry, but fled homeward across the fields and fences, inspired by a terror that took little heed of obstacles. His story was so confused and absurd that little heed was paid to it. As to two points all were agreed :

1. The fire was the work of an incendiary.
2. The said incendiary was moved and instigated by a particular malice toward Harrison Kortright.

Whether this malice was based upon a more general antipathy to the cause of human freedom, which Kortright at that time especially represented, was a question in regard to which there was great difference of opinion. The majority—and it was a turbulent and loud-speaking majority—believed this to be the case. The minority—a subdued and apologetic one—pointed to the opening of the sluice-gates and the firing only of Kortright's property in support of a contrary view. The majority sneered at this as absurd. To them the acts referred to were only part of a preconcerted plan to escape detection.

So the jury returned a verdict which was true in one sense no doubt, though hardly reasonable in a legal sense, that Dawson Fox came to his death by the unlawful and incendiary act of a certain person or persons to them unknown. The people of Skendoah and of the country round, by a large majority, had already decided, however, that the burning of Kortright's mill, the destruction of his house, and the death of Dawson Fox, were all of them acts of the opponents of personal liberty—outrages of the pro-slavery propagandists. Of those who entertained this belief Harrison Kortright was among the most undoubting and sincere. His love for Skendoah and his desire for wealth and success were at once swallowed up in a burning zeal for justice and revenge. He saw little prospect of detecting the actual perpetrator of the crime, but he was sure that he knew its motive. So he lay upon his sick bed, silent but alert, and planned with firm-set lips and flashing eyes how he would strike back at that hated institution whose minions he never once doubted had given his property to the flame and shed the blood of his friend. He had been a firm but quiet opponent of slavery up to this time. The dead man who rested upon his bier in the town-hall, the "flaming apostle of liberty in Kansas," had been dull and mild when compared with what this calm, gray-haired man of business resolved that he would be thereafter.

Jared Clarkson, who had come to sympathize with one friend and bury another, fierce as was his hatred of the "institution", shrank in something of terror from the burning zeal of this man who seemed inspired to avenge the death of his friend, not upon its immediate perpetrators, but on what he deemed the remote cause. Martin, summoned by news of the disaster, was devoted in the very moment of his arrival to the purpose that filled his father's heart. Instead of five, it had been decided that Skendoah should send ten men to uphold the right in Kansas; that they should leave upon the morrow, and that Martin should go with them. They should be bona fide settlers, too, sworn to make the virgin territory free soil. He himself would be answerable for one-half their expenses for the first year. The mother sobbed placidly and helplessly. The crippled magnate was a king whose imperious will brooked no denial. The son, fired by the events which had occurred, took his father's command as a consecration. Already his heart was eager for the conflict. He was impatient of the days that must intervene before he should stand upon the prairie and enter the camp of "Old Brown." He saw, with his father's eyes, that slavery must be destroyed. No matter what it might cost—war, blood, death—anything were better than the one thing he was called upon to aid in sweeping from the earth. In his zeal he forgot his promise to Hargrove. He even forgot for the moment that sweet presence in the New England seminary, who was to be his other-self—dimidium mee, he had already begun to call her in the stilted Latin phrase of the college.

The funeral was in the afternoon. Jared Clarkson stood by the open bier, and in noble words and fervid accents told the story of his life and death. Happy the dead who had such an eulogist! The people listened quietly but sternly to his words. When the funeral was over there was a meeting in the town hall. Only men attended it, and they were stern-faced and angry-eyed. The women stayed at home and wondered beneath their breaths what would be done. There was very little speaking. They adopted resolutions which seemed tame to them, but were regarded as incendiary and revolutionary by all the world which saw not the charred ruins, and the cold, dead face. Jared Clarkson wrote them. While his life was full of charity his pen seemed always tipped with venom. The people of Skendoah declared thereby that Dawson Fox died a victim of political hate; that the hand that held the torch which had disfigured and all but devastated their beautiful village, was that of the great enemy of man and liberty, the slave-power of the South. This was recited at great length, and with sundry ingenious rhetorical flourishes. It will be noted that there was not a particle of evidence to support this conclusion, yet upon it the popular heart rested with the most undisturbed confidence. Of the ultimate cause there was not a doubt; of the immediate instrument, not a suspicion. There was not a human being to whom any inhabitant pointed in his thought even and said, "I believe that his hand did this deed." There were a few of whom all men said, "They are responsible for this evil." They were those who had sneered at his enterprises, and carped at the political faith of Harrison Kortright—the stubborn, irreconcilable minority which is to be found in every community, men born in the opposition and condemned by temperament to be envious, if not malignant. A committee of public safety was also organized, whose duty it was to take every possible means to ferret out the crime. This was needless. From his sick bed a far more potent spirit was already at work. Silently and coolly, but with a determination that never faltered, Harrison Kortright set himself to discover the hand that had smitten him in the darkness. Like the populace, he was without suspicion of any one. Like them, too, he was affected with distrust of many. He was actuated not less by a desire for public safety than by a sense of personal wrong, but most of all by an intense desire to bring to punishment the malefactors whose act had resulted in the death of his friend. Mrs. Kortright alone did not believe that the accepted theory of the crime was the true one. Without opposing his plans, she insensibly modified her husband's resentment and disarmed his distrust. She had no pet hypothesis. To her the events of that night were only a sad, insoluble mystery. She cared little for the loss of property. The death of the man who had been her lover and had come back after many years in the guise of so sweet a friend, while sorrowful enough, was not without its consolation. His death had been worthy of himself at his best estate. If there had been a shade of weakness in his life, it was removed by the manner of his death. The hint of failure, the flavor of ill-success, could never pass this crowning act of self-sacrifice. His was a memory to be cherished, not only with affection, but with pride. The loss of her home had cut her to the heart. She reproached herself with the thought that it brought more sorrow than the death of her friend. It was natural that it should. The home upon the hillside had bounded her whole life. Whatever change had come in their condition, while it left its marks upon their surroundings, expanding and enriching the homestead from time to time, until to the eye of the stranger its identity seemed destroyed, yet to her it had always remained the same. It was her home. Her personality fitted into every niche along with that of her husband. In losing it she seemed to have lost a part of her very being. It was the background on which all her existence had been projected. These feelings, however, were swallowed up in two all-absorbing sources of gratification—her husband lived, and the town had been saved from destruction. She did not believe, she would not believe, that any hand within its limits had been lifted to strike at him. She could not believe that any political animosity would induce any one to peril the safety of the town, and especially to aim a blow at her. So she smiled at the resolutions that went far and wide throughout the land. The letters of condolence which poured in upon her husband, all assuming that he was a martyr to a great cause, both amused and annoyed her. Once he had laughed at her hostility to slavery; now he was almost angry that she would not account it the sole cause of their misfortunes. They had yet to learn the lesson which Time so often teaches to those who disagree, that both were right and both were wrong.

It was because of this conviction that Mrs. Kort-right, for perhaps the first time in her life, offered a serious objection to any project on which her husband had decided. She did oppose the sending of her son to Kansas. Five good men and true had readily been found among those thrown out of employment, for a time at least, by the fire, to go with the other five, as Free State settlers, to Kansas. Their departure had necessarily been delayed beyond the time which the impetuous sufferer had fixed upon at first. There had been a subscription started to rebuild a little frontier church in which Dawson Fox had ministered, and which had been destroyed by a gang of Missouri raiders, as a memorial to his memory. During this period of delay Mrs. Kortright did not fail to urge as gently as she could upon her husband's attention that their son had given his word to Hargrove, which it would be bad faith to ignore, except in case of some great public crisis.

"And is it not a great crisis," the sick man confidently asked, "when slavery, not content with having invaded our homes to search for the fugitive, and compelled us by law to return him into bondage, comes also and applies its favorite methods for repressing free speech here in the midst of us?"

"Admitting this," his wife would say, "you cannot deny that we are not only bound to regard Mr. Hargrove's wishes ourselves, but that Martin is under especial obligation to do so. Can you claim that there is any more need for him to forego his preparation for life's duties and engage in the conflict going on in Kansas now than when you gratefully thanked Captain Hargrove for preventing his departure?"

To this view no answer could be given, but it is probable that his wife's importunities would have been of little avail to restrain the exasperated father and hold back the son, whose martial ardor was at fever heat, had it not been for certain items of intelligence which arrived while they waited for the day fixed upon for their departure.

The first of these was a letter from Hilda, to whom Martin had found leisure, even amid the excitements of the time, to write a full account of all that had occurred, including the fact that his father had determined that he should go to Kansas with the others. Upon this topic he had dilated with much earnestness and enthusiasm. The young girl, dwelling in the quiet of the Blankshire hills, knowing nothing of the mental atmosphere of Skendoah, save from his letter, and withal influenced not a little by the selfishness of love, took a view of the situation which effectually dampened the ardor of the would-be knight-errant of liberty, and staggered the positiveness of the father's conviction. She wrote:

"MY DEAR MARTIN: I was glad to get your long letter, though it made me very sad indeed. I would come to you at once, for I am sure you need me, but a letter which I have just received from Papa—the first after so many months—says that he will follow in a few days, and will take me home for a vacation that is not set down in the catalogue. As this is the last year, and the principal is sure of her pay anyhow, she does not care so very much about absences as she otherwise would. I look for him every day, and may be with you as soon as my letter. I may even get there in time to read it to you. That would be nice, wouldn't it? Just think of a young gentleman getting a letter from his lady-love by word of mouth—her mouth, too! I think it would be capital sport, only you would have to promise very solemnly not to—to—interrupt, you know.

"Oh, my dear Martin, you must forgive me for seeming to be gay when you are in such serious trouble at Skendoah."

doah. I am sure I am sorry—very sorry for poor Mr. Fox, whom I did not know at all, you know (and whom I am sure I should not have liked if I had known), and for your papa, who suffers so much, and your dear mamma, who has lost her beautiful home. Poor dear Aunt Mattie (I shall never learn to call her anything else), she must feel as if her life had been cut right in twain and the best part of it thrown away, leaving her only the evening years to call her own."

"And that is just the way I do feel," sobbed Mrs. Kortright, interrupting the reading of the letter, "but who would have thought she would have understood it? I wish she were here, the dear child; I do indeed."

"But then I am so glad that you are safe, your father alive, your mother well, and my papa coming home, that I cannot be sad a bit and hardly manage to be serious. I am just as happy as a bird, and wish I were one to just fly to you for one little minute and then back here before Papa could have a chance to come and find me gone. That would be awful. I do think it would break his heart if he should come and not find me watching for him. I know I should never get over crying about it. I am sure you need me there very much, too. What in the world are you all stopping at that little hotel for? I hope you don't mean to stay there while dear old Sturmhold stands vacant and just aching for a population. What difference does it make that it is ten miles away? Your father ought to get as far from business as he can, and you are going to Kansas. So you say at least. Now, you know that Papa would not allow you to stay there an hour, nor would I if I could have my way. I have written to the servants at Sturmhold to put everything in order and send the carriage to you at Skendoah. You did not tell me whether the barn and horses were burned or not—which was very careless of you. Now, if you are going to Kansas—which I do not at all believe—"

Martin smiled and Mr. Kortright frowned at this.

"—the very first thing you should do is to put your father and mother where they will be perfectly comfortable while you are away, and Sturmhold is just the place. Besides, Papa and I will be there in a few days, and you know we shall all want to be together, except you, who will, of course, prefer to be—in Kansas. I am sure your father would like to go there, because he will want me to nurse him. He knows what a capital nurse I am, because he has tried it. I remember being left alone with him when he was sick before. I suppose he was busy thinking of what he would do when he got out again, for he answered my questions at first absently, and then with more and more of irritation, until finally your mother came in and he exclaimed: 'Good Heaven, Mattie, can't you think of something that this child can ask a few questions about?' I don't need any help now. So if he will come to Sturmhold I will ask questions enough to keep his mind off his business, and then he will get well, only just taking a rest now and then while Papa tells his adventures. He has been away so long that I am sure they will be many and well worth listening to. However, if you will not go at my invitation, I will leave Papa to settle all that when he comes.

"By the way, Martin—you will excuse me for saying so, but speaking of your father's business brings it to my mind—I remember hearing Papa say that the work Harrison Kortright did every day was enough to kill two or three ordinary men. Even such a little dunce as I am can see that it must be enormous. Why, even my little business matters almost bring on a collapse when I undertake to straighten them out. Once a month or so we girls always get leave to go into the town shopping, and I am sure to be laid up for a day or two afterwards. Miss Hunniwell says it is caramels and the like, but I know it is the cares of business. Then, too, Papa gave me a bank-book and a check-book before he went away, and you have no idea of the trouble I have trying to find out how much cash I have in the bank. I know there must be a good deal though, for I haven't used up more than half the checks in my book yet.

"Now Marty, dear, don't laugh at me. I know I am nothing but a silly little girl; but it does seem to me that instead of going out to Kansas 'to help on the good cause,' as you say, you would help on a great deal better cause, and the one you mean a great deal faster, too, by staying at home and taking that great business off from your poor father's shoulders just as fast as you can. You know I want you to do right, and I would not have you shirk your duty, or what you think to be your duty, for anything in the world. When you first thought of going you know I was half sorry that Papa discouraged you from doing so. Now, it seems as if he must have been a prophet and have foreseen this very day. I have just read over your letter where you tell me what he told you—that Kansas was at best only an outpost, and if there was to be a great conflict between freedom and slavery it would not be fought out by little squads of partisan rangers fighting and plundering on the prairie. Cannot you recall his language and see if it is not as true now as then? If you think you ought to go, and your father desires it, of course you must pay no heed to what I say. I am only a weak-hearted school-girl. Besides that you know I—I am in love, and don't want you to go away just when I am coming home. It has been an age since I saw you, and nothing less.

"I hate to speak of it, Marty, dear, but—you won't be angry, will you? Didn't you—it seems as if you wrote that you did—or maybe it was he—didn't you give Papa your word of honor that you would not engage in this Kansas mélée, or trouble, whatever it is? You know he is a Southerner, though he does hate slavery so awfully, and is very punctilious about any agreement made on honor. What shall I tell him, Martin, dear, if he says to me, 'Hilda, your betrothed promised me on his honor not to do this thing, and yet has done it, and done it in my absence, too?' You must tell me how to answer him, because my father even must not impeach in my hearing the honor of my husband that is to be. I will uphold his honor as I would have him defend mine—even with life itself.

"Good-by, my dearly beloved. Give my love and duty to your parents and implore them to grant my requests so far as they may count it right to do so, and no farther. May Heaven bless and guide you is the constant prayer of your HILDA.

"P. S.—Do not think I pity the slave or hate slavery any less than I always have done; but it seems to me that—that it is hard to tell just what is being done or ought to be done in Kansas. They tell horrible stories about 'Old Brown,' as he is called. I don't believe they can be true; but it seems to me very hard to tell how many patriots there are and how many freebooters, even among the 'Free State men.' Some of those we call the best men in Kansas say that John Brown is hardly any better than the worst. They say that he burns and pillages and even kills unarmed people in the night-time. I do not expect that men placed as they are—fighting against the law for what they believe to be right—can always be blameless; but it would hurt me terribly, Martin—I think, indeed, it would kill me—if there should be any doubt about the righteousness and honorableness of any act that might be attributed to you either directly or indirectly. H."

Harrison Kortright was lying on a couch in the best room of the tidy little hotel that had succeeded the Drovers' Wayside Home which once stood at the Skendoah cross-roads. Mrs. Kortright sat at the head of the couch, and Martin sat near the fireplace opposite the foot. He still held the letter in his hand, and his flushed face showed that its contents had touched him deeply. The early winter evening had come suddenly on, and the wood-fire lighted up the group.

"Well, father," said Mrs. Kortright anxiously, "what do you think of what Hilda writes?"

Mr. Kortright turned his eyes from the fire, on which they had rested, to his son's face.

"She is a brave girl," he said.

"And a good one," added his wife.

Martin's face flushed with pleasure.

"A brave girl and a good girl," repeated the father slowly, "and has a way of thinking for herself that isn't altogether common. I'm glad of it, too, and glad she is going to be Martin's wife. She'll make a daughter you'll always be proud of, Mattie."

Tears sprang to the son's eyes, and the mother leaned over and kissed the pale brow of her husband. There was a suppressed moan as he shifted his position a trifle, and continued, not noticing the caress:

"She shows the right spirit. Any one can see that she is just as honest as the day. Marriage won't make a particle of difference with her. She has begun to be a wife already, and no more thinks of separating her interest or her life from Martin's than if they had lived together for ten years."

"Well, so they have, pretty nearly," said Mrs. Kortright, smiling.

"That is so," responded he, "and we have almost forgotten that they were growing up. I am afraid I was a little hasty in urging Martin to go, but it's just as well. I've been so given to having my own way that it's time I learned that Martin is not a boy any longer, but a man, who must act for himself. We are right betwixt two generations—on the divide as you may say. We haven't finished our work exactly, and he hasn't begun his. We must go on in the old way, but he must take his own way and cut out the channel in which his life must flow. As it was our duty to keep him with us up to this point, so it is now our duty to let him go. You must decide this matter for yourself, my son," he added, reaching forth his hand, "and write Hilda what you will do. Let me know your decision in the morning."

The son shook his father's hand, and was about to withdraw from the room, when the landlord rapped at the door, and said that Mr. Clarkson wished to know if Mr. Kortright was able to see him on a matter of importance.

"Of course—of course; let him come in," said Kortright, resuming at once his usual alert and eager manner.

"I must beg pardon for troubling you at such an unseemly hour," said Clarkson, entering at once, "but—"

"No excuses," said Kortright, with brusque courtesy. "Jared Clarkson can never come where Harrison Kortright is, at a wrong time."

"Thanks," said Clarkson, taking his hand with a tender heartiness that testified better than words could have done his thoughtful remembrance of his friend's affliction. "I would not have come at this time, but the business that brings me will not admit delay."

"Something about our Kansas boys, I suppose," said Kortright.

"No; it affects especially you and me," was the reply.

"Is it anything private?" asked Mrs. Kortright, rising as if to retire.

"No, no," said Clarkson hastily. "Pray be seated, ma'am. It affects us all. I am only doubtful as to whether I ought to tell you, in your present condition, Kortright."

"It is bad news, then."

"Very sad news, indeed."

"Brown? Has he—?" asked Kortright, with a look of quick intelligence.

"It has nothing to do with Brown," said Clarkson, smiling in spite of his grave mission. "I have not heard from him in a long time. But I received a telegram to-day which—well, read it for yourself."

He drew a dispatch from his pocket and handed it to Kortright as he spoke.

"Let me light the lamp," said Mrs. Kortright, rising as she spoke, and taking from the mantel a glass lamp filled with camphene, which she placed upon the table, and, removing the extinguishers from the wicks, lighted with a match. Meantime Kortright had held the telegram up to the firelight and read:

"JARED CLARKSON, Esq., Rockboro:

"Deliver testament. Executor must act at once. Testator dead. M. B."

It bore date from a southern city.

"Well," said he, with a puzzled look, "what does it mean?"

"It means that I must deliver this into your hands," said Clarkson, handing him a folded document.

"And this—?" asked Kortright, beginning to open it confusedly.

"That is the will of Merwyn Hargrove, in which you are named executor," said Clarkson impressively.

"And Captain Hargrove?" queried the sick man anxiously.

"Is dead!" responded Clarkson.

A STUDIO IN FLORENCE.

ENTER! your step will not disturb him now.

The cheerful studio still rings as of old

With busy toil; but alien fingers hold

The chisel that is shaping that white brow.

O beautiful young "Dreamer!" well mayest thou

Be beautiful, who proudly couldst behold

Pygmalion give thy beauty, else so cold,

Not only life, but his life! . . . To endow

A waiting world with gift so rare as this—

It may be he held not the cost too dear.

God pity us, whose human passions cling

To what is human! who must learn to miss

His smile, and give up, for the beauty here,

The mind that could create so fair a thing!

ALICE WELLINGTON ROLLINS.

ROSES DE GUERRE.

BY ELIZABETH P. ALLAN.

LAUDERDALE, a little Virginia town, lying between the Blue Ridge and the Alleghany Mountains, was astir early one June day of 1864, for the soldier boys were coming—the ones in gray—and they would of course be very hungry, a condition that had become chronic with Confederate soldiers by that time! They were to march rapidly through the town, and whatever hospitality was to be shown them must be in a sort of passover form. So the town-folk were making busy preparation to waylay the regiments on the street with bread, and meat, and coffee—rye coffee!—and buttermilk, and sorghum molasses ginger cakes, and blackberry wine, and home-brewed ale.

You would have taken it for market day in some Old World village, so animated was the thronged street, and with people in such queer costumes. The dignified matron and the doucest maid wore complacently furniture calico of the most startling patterns; gray and blue "domestic" was made to fit slender waists, whose ante-bellum silk and velvet had given out; hats and bonnets were of all shapes and no shapes, all home-plaited of wheat straw; old silk stocking legs figured as well-fitting gauntlets, and the more stylish wore shapely gloves of chamois skin, which had known the good effects of soap and water, since it used to rub the family silver. Trim feet were covered with hand-knit stockings, the cotton having been spun in the winter evenings, when reading was scarce for want of new books, and letter-writing scanty because of ten-cent stamps, and sociabilities few because there were no beaux and no refreshments to be had; stout leather shoes, of village manufacture, were laced over these primitive hose, with heels the farthest possible remove from French. Men were conspicuously absent, only old men and boys representing the sex, except where some sleek publican managed to put a government office between himself and hot bullets.

This was the picture presented by the long straggling main street, as Lauderdale awaited the soldiers, that bright summer day.

Cary Brook, however, was not lending herself to this good work of catering; she seemed to be devoting herself to the esthetic instincts of the soldiers, for the adornment of her dainty self occupied an unusual time. And yet Colonel Bird, of the 101st Mississippi, was not in the division which was to pass through Lauderdale that day; but when does not a pretty girl think that her lover may "happen along." Oh, if you knew what funny clothes we wore in those days! And if you could believe how serenely fine we felt in the queer duds! Cary's dress on that particular morning was of homespun cotton—that is, woven in the county, fifteen dollars a yard, ten yards to a dress; total, one hundred and fifty dollars. It was new and fresh, fitting her "slim elegance," as Howells says, "as the sheath of the flower fits the flower." Brown lengths of hair ornamented her shapely head with lavish beauty, but no girl is satisfied with Nature's adorning, and the long blockade had brought Cary's stock of pretty things to the lowest ebb. The white frills were freshly crimped, and throat and wrists responded to their becoming effect; "but oh for a touch of color!" sighed the girl with true instinct, for the somberish dress needed it.

Why there, to be sure, were the Greville roses, climbing right against her window. Long clusters of small flowers, white, shaded with many varieties of pink, all in one bunch, and so sweet.

Half an hour later Cary stood at the front gate, with the Greville roses in her hair and at her throat, as intent upon rationing those dear, dirty fellows as a chief of commissary. But they were tremendously hungry, and after the last bite that could be found in the house had been given out, a straggler came up and asked for breakfast.

"Oh, I'm so sorry," said the girl. "We shall have to keep a fast-day as it is, but I would keep two at a time if I only had a nice breakfast for you."

The soldier took off his old slouch hat, and made such a low bow that Cary turned again to look at him.

"To what regiment do you belong?" she asked.

"I am just from the Lynchburg Hospital," he replied, "and am on my way to join the 101st Mississippi."

The roses suddenly bloomed in Cary Brook's cheeks, and she came out into the road.

"Then I must shake hands with you," she said. "I love every man in the 101st Mississippi!"

"Ah!" said the soldier, with a quick perception of the facts of the case, "so much the better for the 101st Mississippi!"

"And I'm sorer than ever not to have a breakfast for you," cried the girl.

"If you would give me your roses," he said, with a gallant grace, "I should not miss the breakfast."

She unfastened them quickly, both clusters, saying archly, "With one condition—that when you reach the regiment, you will take them to Colonel Bird with my compliments."

"On my honor as a rebel," replied the soldier, again bowing low, and carrying off Cary's bright flowers.

"Now, I call that a skillful dodge," he chuckled, as he hastened after the troops. "It will not be perjury to break an oath sworn on a non est, and having no 'honor as a rebel,' I may keep the roses and a clean conscience. May the kind fates give me a chance to tell that pretty rebel some day that she gave her roses to a Yankee spy."

The next two weeks witnessed many a rapid march and countermarch, and Lauderdale held its breath while the dust of its streets blew first upon gray coats and then upon blue. Meantime our ravisher of the roses had gotten safely back to his own place and his own coat, and early in July entered the little mountain town with Hunter's army. The gala look it had worn two weeks before was gone, and a sullen expression marked its countenance. No women were to be seen, boys were kept carefully in-doors by anxious mothers, and the old men had a sudden access of feebleness, leaning on canes and halting in their gait, in a way very comical to one who remembered their alertness two weeks before.

Two hours after his arrival our quondam Mississippi man rang Mrs. Brook's door-bell, and was answered by that matron herself, with an air of dignified defiance. After a great deal of trouble in persuading her to allow him to see her daughter for a moment only, and in her presence, Cary was summoned. Again the soldier bowed low before her, this time removing a blue cap instead of the old slouch, and returned her withered but carefully-preserved roses.

"I beg leave to restore unlawful gains," he said; "I did not reach the 101st Mississippi, but I have never doubted that it has the ablest commander in the Confederate army—and the most fortunate!" Whereupon the soldier showed that he had practiced retreating.

There came a time when it was Colonel Bird's luck to reach Lauderdale with his Mississippi regiment.

The Greville roses had faded, and Cary could only find October leaves with which to crown her radiance. Colonel Bird was more than satisfied with the result; he claimed a kiss for every smile or favor given to others during his long absence, and this brought out the story of the Greville roses and the so-called Mississippi soldier.

"But there is one comfort, 'Edmund,'" said pretty Cary, tired of her lover's uproarious laughter, "I didn't give the rascal any breakfast!"

THE HOUSEHOLD—DOMESTIC SERVICE.

IN nearly all civilized lands there are two unfailing resources for conversation. The political results of the last election and the prospects of the next always fire the manly heart, while the womanly pulse beats equally responsive to the mere mention of the domestic servant. This ubiquitous arbiter of the household happiness serves to increase the anxieties and cares which she is employed to help diminish. She moves on her way with the serenity of a sovereign who knows she can dictate terms to her subjects with but little fear of revolt. And the endless discussions of housewives, having for their aim the mitigation of evils which are prevalent under her reign, seem to cast little light upon ways and means for relief.

There must be something "rotten in Denmark," very rotten indeed to cause a blight so widespread and deep-seated. The subject is so great, it involves so many collaterals, that it is impossible to do more than glance at its most salient points before discussing remedies. But, to begin with, is it not possible that the popular treatment of the question may be superficial?

That assumes that our separate roofs must always cover those multifarious kinds of labor which require skill and nicety in the laborer, and which can only be well done by experts trained in their several avocations. It assumes that the baking of bread and biscuit, of pastry and cake, the preparation of side-dishes and vegetables, the laundry work, the lighting and replenishing of fires, in addition to the inevitable sweeping and dusting and keeping daintily neat the dining-room, chambers, sitting-rooms and verandas, shall be done under each separate roof, no matter how small the family may be. Because we want the isolated household, we take it, as a matter of course, that all the work must be isolated also. Sometimes the curious spectacle is presented of the number of servitors being in excess, in some cases double or treble, of those whom they serve. But we are now writing of average housekeepers, who can employ but one, two or three persons to do all the work, indoors and out. They most need relief from the perplexities under consideration, and to them the burdens of life are daily growing heavier.

In regard to these burdens, many say, as with one voice: "We are more and more at the mercy of an alien and ignorant population, who, by the very oppression to which they have been subject, are only rendered unreasonable and overbearing when removed to a condition of unaccustomed freedom. They overrun our homes like the plagues of Egypt, marring all they touch. They demand prerogatives and dictate terms in an offensive way, and their waste and extravagance increase in proportion to their wages. They can only live under your roof by your making them feel your constant watchfulness and exaction. They must not be left to forget that an iron hand is over them."

This, in effect, is the feeling of many employers, outside as well as inside the house.

But there is an obverse as well as reverse side to the shield. If one is not all golden the other is surely leaden. But little can be expected of those whose inheritance has been so meagre and circumscribed. They have never had enough of anything to learn by the care of it the lessons of thrift, skill and economy. They cannot resist the tendencies and limitations of their forefathers. As Emerson has said: "You may as well ask a loom which weaves huckaback why it does not make cashmere, as expect poetry from this engineer—or a chemical discovery from that jobber. Ask the digger in the ditch to explain Newton's laws—the fine organs of his brain have been pinched by overwork and squalid poverty from father to son for more than a hundred years." And this inherited aptitude for rough toil is the best we have to rely upon in houses which contain inventions and implements almost as fine and subtle as the thought which constructed them.

And now let us look at the domestic with eyes soft with a recognition of a common humanity, a kindred immortality. Our maid-servant is not only the stranger within our gates, but within our very walls. We are compelled to invite her to invade the sanctity of our homes. She breathes the common air, she shares our food, she mixes the bread that nourishes us. In fact, she is made of the same kind of clay, moulded by the same Spirit, the Father of us all. "Of one blood hath he made all nations of the earth." We can ignore neither the relationship nor its claims and duties. We are compelled to stand in awe before the truth that there is no impenetrable barrier between the highest and the lowest. Vice, ignorance, misery react on the most refined and exclusive. Disease is liable to scatter its seeds in the very air we breathe. The beggar whom our little darling meets in the street may communicate to her in passing a noisome and mortal malady. The festering pestilence caused by foul air, over-crowding and uncleanness, breeds a fever which laughs at the rich man's bars and bolts, and jibbers and jeers as it writes his death-warrant at the head of the damask-lung couch. The cook in our kitchen may unconsciously mix a poison with the viands she prepares, which shall be as potent in destroying our energies, if not our lives, as though we drained it from the chalice of Lucretia Borgia. For there is a chain leading from each one to every other, which passes through the very throne of Eternal Law itself, and not one of its links can ever break.

Therefore, in our dealings with this, as every other class, justice, humanity and fraternity are coincident with self-protection, the improvement of society, and the increase of happiness. And that is only a temporizing method of dealing which does not consider the causes of the troubles under discussion, as well as their cure, in the eyes of the social economist and the humanitarian.

HESTER M. POOLE.

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

"We are anxious to make a cologne at home, which will have the delicate qualities of Jean Marie's Farinas, '4711.' Can the Household editor give any form to an admiring Reader.

NEWARK, N. J., Nov. 2, 1882."

Ans.—Two rules, both well tested and both satisfactory, have lately been given in New Remedies, and are not difficult to prepare:

Oil of orange flowers (neroli)	4 parts.
" lavender (Mitcham)	4 "
" rosemary	8 "
" lemon	8 "
" bergamot	16 "
Tincture of musk	1 part.
Acetic ether	1 "
Water	158 parts.
Alcohol	800 "

Add the oils, tincture of musk, and acetic ether to the alcohol; then add the water, and set the mixture aside, in glass-stoppered bottles, until it has become perfectly clear and limpid. Draw off the clear liquid, or filter it through paper.

A very superior cologne may also be prepared thus:

Oil of orange flowers (neroli), petale	3 oz.
" " " " bigarade	1 "
" rosemary	2 "
" orange, bitter	5 "
" lemon	5 "
" bergamot	2 "
Alcohol, deodorized	6 gal.
Water, distilled	2 qts.

Dissolve the oils in the alcohol; to five gallons of the mixture add slowly, and while stirring, enough distilled water to render the liquid very slightly opaque. Then add the reserved gallon, which should render the liquid clear again, and set the mixture aside for several weeks. Finally filter.

This ammonia might be made, the expense and mixture being both divided among a number in a neighborhood.

"I have used beef-tea for years with the feeling that it meant real nutrition and strength. Now I am told it is worthless, save as a temporary stimulant. Is this the general opinion? Do answer and oblige a troubled mother.

M. B., NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y."

Ans.—Many physicians have decided that it has less virtue than supposed, and they are right, though recent researches indicate more value than was for a time admitted. "According to the researches of Kobert, which have been conducted in the laboratory of Schmiedeberg, at Strasburg, the kreatin which exists abundantly in all extracts of beef has a remarkable effect on the muscular system, inasmuch as it increases its actual power, and greatly extends its capability of continuous work. His experiments were made on frogs, and of many substances tested, besides kreatin, only hypoxanthin and caffeine possessed a similar action; and hypoxanthin is likewise a constituent of beef-tea. Beef-tea, therefore, while not so highly nutritious as it is generally assumed to be, is yet not so entirely useless as some observers would have us believe. The feeling of strength which its employment gives must, apart from its actual value as a nutrient, be of great service in the treatment of the sick and convalescent."

"I want to ask the 'Household Department' if the stain for floors, recommended in the issue of December 27, will penetrate the wood at all and wear longer than ordinary floor paint? It is discouraging to have to renew the latter so often as I have found necessary.

W. M. P., HARTFORD, Dec. 28, 1882."

Ans.—The stain penetrates deeper, but wears off of course where in constant use. An occasional coat of the varnish will be needed and with this the color lasts far better than paint.

"Please tell an interested reader whether fish has much nutritive power, and how far it can take the place of meat.—F. C., SEARSDALE, N. Y."

Ans.—The London Lancet has answered this question very thoroughly in a recent article. There is some danger, says the Lancet, of the fish question falling out of memory. This is not to be tolerated after the interest which has been excited, and for some time maintained, in connection with this important phase of the food problem. Whatever may be the nutritious value of fish as food—and we believe it to be very great—it must be evident that a full and cheap supply of fish would react so as to produce a lowering of the price of butcher's meat. The "purveyors," as they like to be called, are encouraged and, in truth, enabled, to keep up the price of flesh because there is nothing to compete with it as a staple of the common food of the people. A revival of the old and healthy habit of living largely on fish would place the meat supply on an entirely new footing. This is manifest on the face of the facts; but what may not be equally apparent, though it is scarcely less noteworthy, is the consideration that nervous diseases and weaknesses increase in a country as the population comes to live on the flesh of the warm-blooded animals. This is a point to which attention has not been adequately directed. "Meat"—using that term in its popular sense—is highly stimulating, and supplies proportionally more exciting than actually nourishing pabulum to the nervous system. The meat-eater lives at high pressure, and is, or ought to be, a peculiarly active organism, like a predatory animal, always on the alert, walking rapidly, and consuming large quantities of oxygen, which are imperatively necessary for the safe disposal of his dissimilated material. In practice we find that the meat-eater does not live up to the level of his food, and as a consequence he cannot, or does not, take in enough oxygen to satisfy the exigencies of his mode of life. Thereupon follow many, if not most of the ills to which highly civilized and luxurious meat-eating classes are liable. This is a physiological view of the food question, and it has bearings on the question of fish supply which ought not to be neglected.

"Is ammonia as dirty and unwholesome an article to use in food for leavening purposes as we are told, and is it true that it can be made from the air? Do tell an ANXIOUS HOUSEKEEPER."

Ans.—"No" to the first and "yes" to the second question. The process has lately been given for the latter operation, and here it is: Numerous methods have from time to time been devised to utilize the atmospheric nitrogen for making ammonia, with more or less success. Since its discovery by Kunckel in 1677, and the determination of its relative parts by Dr. Black a century later, it has been produced from several organic substances. At present, the ammonia used in commerce in this country is principally the product of mineral distillation. Its presence in large quantities in the vegetable kingdom has led to the establishment of works which will also produce it in large quantities from the juices of various plants, more particularly the sugar-beet. By the recent French process referred to in the Scientific American, the nitrogen of the air and the hydrogen of water are liberated by the simultaneous action of calorically liquefied metal, and by further manipulation caused to combine in proper proportions to form ammonia. This newly-formed ammonia, combined with carbonic acid by employment of charcoal, forms the carbonate of ammonia of commerce. The carbonate of ammonia has become of such general and popular use, more particularly as a leavening agent for baking and cooking purposes, and its employment in quantities in all the more carefully-compounded and wholesome baking powders, as well as by bakers and professional cooks, has become so universal that this discovery is of much importance as tending to enlarge and cheapen its production.

HELEN CAMPBELL.

EVERY day we meet with new and old illustrations of the truth of the old saw that "extremes meet." Only a few years ago and China was regarded as the especial antipode of the United States in manners, customs and polity, as well as in location. We have already adopted two of the most distinctive features of its national life. We have built a wall to prevent foreigners from entering our territories, and have adopted the principle of scholastic examination and life-tenure in office. On the other hand, the Chinese have opened their ports, and have a navy capable of blowing ours out of the water. In another decade there is no doubt that almost the entire carrying trade of the Pacific will be in Chinese bottoms, manned by Chinese sailors, and commanded by Chinese officers. At this rate, what the next Centennial will witness no man knoweth.

It is said that Mr. Dorman B. Eaton expresses himself as entirely satisfied with the Civil Service act, to secure the passage of which he has labored so long and so earnestly. The pay of a commissioner is $3000 a year, with traveling expenses, etc. The act establishes the principle of life-tenure, and the commissionership is a life-office.

A CORRESPONDENT from Memphis asks us to send THE CONTINENT to the place "Bob" Ingersoll says he don't believe in. He evidently disagrees with "Bob," as he wants it sent for a term of years, and suggests that it be put in fire-proof wrappers. We should be glad to accommodate our correspondent, but owing to defective mail facilities, we are unable just at present to do so. Whether the Democratic party, should it come into power, will establish a Star Route connection with the locality indicated we are, of course, unable to say. From its well-known inclination to play into the devil's hands, whenever it gets a chance, we should not be surprised if it did. At any rate, we will keep our Memphis friend in mind, and if we have any chance to send to his next address he may look to hear from us. We are not above doing a good turn even to a man in limbo, and from all we can learn of the place he expects to inhabit, something cool and breezy like THE CONTINENT will be very welcome, even if it does come from Philadelphia.

HER most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria has seen fit to mark the completion of the new Law Courts in London by conferring the honor of knighthood upon five barristers, who, no doubt, in her royal opinion, or that of her advisers, merited the distinction. Fancy the five lawyers in their wigs and robes kneeling to receive the accolade under the groined arches of the stately building. Passages in the play of "Iolanthe" are irresistibly suggested by the situation. Picture the blank amazement with which Richard of the Lion Heart or Launcelot would have beheld such a ceremony! Was it Angus of Scotland who thanked heaven that "No son of mine save Edward e'er could write a line"? We quote from memory, and may not be exact. This benighting of lawyers that prevails nowadays is surely a curious instance of the survival and perversion of this ancient rite.

WE are not given to boasting, but we fully believe that our second volume, now just bound and ready for delivery, is an irrefutable demonstration of the soundness of our basis principle, that a Weekly Magazine, as a Boston contemporary has well said, "is nearer the trend and pulse of the age than any other."

IN this connection we desire to express our hearty thanks to our brethren of the press for their courtesy and kindness. While THE CONTINENT has received more than its full share of encomium, it has hardly known a breath of disparagement. Occupying a field peculiarly our own—a niche which no forerunner has attempted to fill—this is perhaps not surprising. It is, however, none the less gratifying, and our obligations to the press in all parts of the country are none the less sincere because of this fact.

LABELL SEMINARY, at Auburndale, Mass., has been one of the chief pioneers in many departments of practical education for girls. Its latest, and in some points most desirable one is in the securing a course of lectures on common law, of which all women are most extraordinarily ignorant. Hilda's naive remark in this week's installment of "Hot Plowshares" is not altogether imaginary. "Papa gave me," she says, "a bank account and a check-book before he went away, and you have no idea of the trouble I have trying to find out how much cash I have in the bank. I know there must be a good deal though, for I haven't used up more than half the checks in my book yet." The principal of the Seminary writes: "The practical ignorance of many women of the simplest elements of financial security and of ordinary business forms was not unusually illustrated by one who, having been seen to destroy the receipt after paying a bill, was questioned as to her reason. 'I always like to feel sure that it can't come up again,' she replied gravely. We can well accept the assurance that the lady was 'very intelligent and highly educated,' since the so-called higher education, and much of the public-school education, as well, is so often found wanting in adaptation to the needs of practical life. The legal rights and independence lately given to women bring responsibilities for which there has often been no corresponding preparation. The principles of wise management of property, the permanent truths in social organization which make women especially the conservators of social and domestic order, in a country where they have the greatest freedom and influence, are matters about which girls need to think intelligently, since the duties are already theirs. The law is often a vague terror to the inexperienced. Only an understanding of its certainties, and of the limitations, in the long run, of injustice, brings confidence and self-possession." The lectures are to be given by a well-known Boston lawyer, and the course is to be followed by one on sanitary plumbing, so that the "sweet girl graduates" are likely to have some forms of knowledge not usually the portion of even our best trained women. It is to be hoped that the lecturer is good-looking and an entertaining speaker. else he may find it a difficult task to command the undivided attention of his audience.

AUTHORS offering contributions to THE CONTINENT are requested to enclose postage stamps for the return of the manuscript, should it be unavailable, or to insure such answer as may be necessary for personal information. If desired, the manuscript may be returned by express at the sender's cost. When no postage stamps are enclosed the manuscript (if not found available) will be retained for six months only, subject to the author's order, as specified, and will then be destroyed without further notice. IT is in one sense a misfortune that Mr. Crawford's novel¹ should have been heralded in precisely the way it has been. When we hear—though the rumor is now denied—that the composition, from title page to finish, has occupied precisely three weeks, and that such celerity is due to the fact that the writer is the nephew of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, and thus endowed with a set of qualifications, mental and social, which set him above ordinary people and ordinary laws, a certain antagonism rises, and the critic determines to riddle a book which begins in presumption and ends in the same spirit. The title also stirs up the combative element. We bore with Daniel Deronda because George Eliot loved him, and because he represented to her a positive life in which her readers had less faith than she, but another Semitic novel seemed needless. For a time, as one reads on, Mr. Crawford seems to have said, "Go to!—I will write a novel after the Bulwer pattern! I will choose a name for my hero that should be owned solely by an old Jew pawnbroker! My mouthpiece shall be Grigg, and one of my subordinates Currie Gherkins! With these names from a roaring farce, and with a plot as improbable as a Japanese fairy tale, I will yet make the whole a thing as real as if we were side by side with every one!"

And this he has done. One inch below the level he has reached, Mr. Isaacs would be ridiculous, but when the opening pages are passed, and we find that this name is the East-Anglicism for Abdul Hafiz-ben-Isak, a Persian of the Persians, we fall into the spirit of the narrator, and very shortly are too thoroughly under the spell of the brilliant tale to remember criticism or protest. The characters are all sharply outlined. From the hero, with his wonderful ideal beauty of person, and his keen and subtle Eastern mind, through the circle of Anglo-Indians, each one, from the Bombay millionaire to the beautiful English girl, with hardly more "real intelligence than a sheep," who yet has power to convince the skeptical Persian that women have souls, not a person can be spared. The life is minute as a photograph, yet brilliant with color, as changing and elusive as the sheen on the tropical birds that flutter about the bungalows. The tiger hunt and its consequences, the rescue and ransom of Shere Ali; the transformations and juggleries of Ram Lal—and through all the power of a faith we have learned through "The Light of Asia" to recognize as something more pervading and inspiring than we had dreamed—all blend in a whole as absorbing as a story from the "Arabian Nights," yet with a harmoniousness which makes the whole natural and possible. But one incongruity discovers itself, and that is in the English of Mr. Isaacs. That it should be pure all know who know what power of assimilation an East Indian possesses, but this is the English of Boston, with an American flavor not only in the use of words but in the putting of ideas. Aside from this there are few criticizable points. Mr. Crawford has lived the life he describes, studied Sanscrit, and fathomed some of the mysteries of Buddhism, and he knows how to give not only the color and flavor of this life, but the subtle and questioning spirit of the nineteenth century. The catastrophe of Miss Weston's death lifts her forever into the ideal where her lover's faith had placed her, but from which she might, if living on have fallen. That she loved him shows the utmost her soul could do. His abnegation at the last is as pathetic and well-nigh as powerful as Gautama's own, and the novel takes place at once as beyond question, in many points, the most powerful one the season has produced.

OF a very different but quite as absorbing order of interest is this which many indications give us the right to believe is the final romance² from the pen of Nathaniel Hawthorne. So many insinuations have darkened the air, and so many have been convinced that the work was a mere ruse on the part of the younger Hawthorne, who had chosen this method of testing his own power, that it is most satisfactory to have the proof before us of neither error nor experiment. Artistically the romance must be said to be incomplete, lacking the minute revision and elaboration of Hawthorne's final draft, yet the most practiced and painstaking author may envy the wonderful diction, no less than the strange and powerful conception of the tale. Mr. Julian Hawthorne's preface gives every detail the public has a right to ask; more, indeed, for only accident and misunderstanding could have rendered as much detail necessary, but the puzzled public will welcome every word. Many suggestions and descriptions embodied or elaborated in the story are to be found in the "English Note-Books," in many cases almost word for word, and the spirit and temper of both New and Old England have never been more perfectly rendered in any work of his hand. Analysis is always there, for analysis was the keynote of all thought, but the human element seems stronger and the story has not only power but pathos, being, as a whole, the most notable literary event of the year just ended.

AMONG all the varied collections of religious poetry dear to many souls, from "Lyra Germanica" or "Hymns of the Ages" to the later ones in "The Changed Cross" and its many successors, the lovers of this form of literature have always missed some favorites. Individual tastes differ so widely that to secure any large range the ownership of many small volumes became necessary, the disadvantage of this lying in the fact that there was little difference between them. In the present collection³ the editors have both special and unusual qualifications for their work, and the bulky volume is one of the most catholic yet best chosen compilations ever made. The best among ancient religious poems are there, but the modern singer, obscure, save for some one rare expression of a deep religious emotion, has also full place. The form of division chosen is a happy one, and it would hardly be possible to suggest an improvement in the bulky volume, which represents not only an enormous amount of labor, but a discrimination and delicacy of taste and judgment on the part of both editors which must insure the welcome deserved. The page is printed in double columns lined, and the workmanship is what one expects naturally from this long-established house.

A. C. ARMSTRONG & SON are soon to issue the late Professor Henry B. Smith's "Introduction to Christian Theology," an elaborate argument on theology as a science and on the sources of theology.

PERIODICALS in London are changing owners and names in a very kaleidoscopic fashion, it being now rumored that The Academy is to be suspended, and The Athenæum consolidated with another well-known weekly.

It will be a matter of regret to all admirers of Professor George Ebers' remarkable novels to know that he is now partially paralyzed. He writes still, but less than usual, and takes a partial share in university work, but is unequal to sustained effort.

DR. G. L. AUSTIN has prepared a little book, entitled "Water Analysis; a Handbook for Water-Drinkers," which will be of great service to all who desire some simple methods of testing their water supply. The directions are plain, and the tests given are all practical and easily used by all who are willing to take a little trouble for the sake of better knowledge. (50 cents, pp. 48; Lee & Shepard, Boston).

THE Illustrated Christian Weekly, which has had a somewhat checkered career, but which has always been noted for its elegant typographical appearance, appears in an even more carefully appointed dress, simply as The Illustrated Weekly. We trust that the spirit of the dropped adjective remains, even if the letter has passed away, and that the near approach in title to the New York Weekly will not include a too intimate knowledge of that shady side of city life expounded by one of its former editors.

BERGER'S "New Method to Learn French" has just been issued by D. Appleton & Co., New York. As in the "natural system" of Sauveur and others, the language is learned first and the grammar afterward. The system of pronunciation is given in a single sentence, which forms a unique design on the cover. Any information regarding the system, which has been very successful abroad, may be had of Mr. A. F. Charles, No. 105 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York City. ($1.00, pp. 138).

AMERICAN readers and admirers of Mr. Ruskin may thank his publishers here for a reproduction of the poems which have long been practically inaccessible. Appearing first in annuals, they were privately printed in 1850, but in so limited an edition that it was almost immediately exhausted. Time has given it a special value, and a copy lately sold in London for forty-one guineas; but save for this fact, and the added and more important one that the book gives the early moods and fancies of a man regarding whom every detail is of interest, it has little intrinsic value. (12mo, pp. 234, $1.50; John Wiley & Sons, New York).

D. C. GILMAN, President of the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, has just been elected president of the Science Company, a corporation just established to publish a first-class illustrated weekly scientific journal to be called Science. The vice-president chosen was A. Graham Bell, the inventor of the telephone, who is the promoter and chief financial backer of the new enterprise. The editor is to be Samuel H. Scudder, a well-known entomologist, a graduate of Williams College, and the late assistant librarian of Harvard University. The publisher is to be Moses

King, of Cambridge. In shape and style the paper will be very much like Nature, published in London by Macmillan & Co.

A HANDSOME book for the young, fresh from the press of Appleton & Co., is "Boys in the Mountains and on the Plains," by William H. Rideing, member of the geographical survey under Lieutenant Wheeler. It is a narrative of the experiences of three young men who went West to explore the plains and mountains toward which all real boys longingly turn. They had thrilling adventures in getting lost, in falling down cañons, and in being buried under avalanches, but of course came out all right. Much valuable information is given in the story in a picturesque form, illustrated by over a hundred woodcuts. The reader feels sure that every foot of the ground has been trodden by the writer, whose style is always vivid and refined. (Square 8vo, pp. 345, $2.50).

THE latest "No Name" novel, "Little Sister," is far in advance of "Her Crime," with its sensational and improbable plot. The story is of the simplest, the little sister being a young widow, with two children and a step-daughter, all of whom leave New England to make a home in Philadelphia for a brother-in-law. The quiet life, the development of character, and the charm of the young widow's beautiful nature make an atmosphere refreshingly in contrast to the morbid, analytical fiction we have been surfeited with. The Scotch doctor and his troublesome courtship are very naturally given. In fact, the people are all very much alive, the story is so charmingly told, and the whole feeling so quiet and delicate, that we part with them at last with real regret. ($1.00, pp. 286; Roberts Brothers).

"ST. NICHOLAS" is so steadily declared at the head of all work for children, that the old story of Aristides the Just occasionally occurs, and some slight flaw would be a relief. It may be counted as treason to hint that the flaw exists, but the fact is that Wide Awake, while never equaling it in the character or quality of its illustrations, is most certainly in advance of it in several practical features, as well as in a certain gentleness and sweetness of tone. The Christmas and New Year numbers are of especial beauty and value. Mrs. Pratt, better known as Ella Farman, has gained steadily in her capacity of dealing with the varied elements that go to make up the ideal magazine. The sentimental and goody-goody phase seems past, and Wide Awake represents some of the best and highest life and work for children that the nineteenth century holds.

THE announcements of G. P. Putnam's Sons for 1883 are full of interest. The second volume of Col. Williams' "History of the Negro Race in America," one of the most notable issues of 1882, will be published, and a volume of almost equal significance on "The Woman Question in Europe," made up of essays from representative European women on the status and progress of woman's work abroad in all directions. The second part of the simple but very able "American Citizen's Manual," by Worthington C. Ford, will also appear; "The American Girl's Home Book of Work and Play," by Helen Campbell, a volume which will give suggestions and instructions for in-door and out-door amusements, and for occupations for play or for profit, and another book from Miss Bird, the author of "Unbeaten Tracks in Japan," entitled "The Golden Chersonese."

THE local feuilleton is one of the modern developments of newspaperdom, which has found a seemingly permanent lodgment in many of the smaller cities of the country. The inhabitants of a great city are too much strangers to one another to find interest in the weekly or monthly summary of personal intelligence, with literary, art and dramatic news and criticism, which make up the contents of these publications. But with the smaller communities, which are yet large enough to have a social history of sufficient importance to tell, and are practically interested in culture and the arts, these periodical brochures find much welcome. A recent and creditable example of this class is "Bohemia," published in Buffalo, N. Y., and edited by Harold W. Raymond. Its literary matter shows more originality than is commonly found in similar publications, and it is not too local to be read with interest by the general public. The editor has published in an extra number a curious "Goblin Tale of the New Year," entitled "Kryme," well illustrated, and a good example of the quaint and tender qualities that belong to holiday literature. (4to, pp. 24; W. S. Bigelow, Buffalo, N. Y.).

THE Overland Monthly, a friend whose decease was mourned with a good deal of sincerity, and in which Bret Harte's career began, proves now to have been simply a case of suspended animation. At a dinner given recently to the contributors, Mr. Carmany, the publisher, made a pleasant speech, in which he said: "It has been often asserted that I did not appreciate Mr. Harte, and that I, more than any one, was the cause of his leaving. When the wave of popularity was mounting higher and higher, I suggested to him that we take a trip East on a lecture tour, the financial management to be in my hands. He was quite pleased with the idea, and I have no doubt we would have returned with increased fame for him and greater prosperity for the magazine. I would have given but one opportunity to each community to see and hear him, thus undoubtedly making a grand success. But it of course failed, and, as a final proposition, being so well assured of the success of the publication under his editorial care, I offered him a salary of $5000 per annum, payable monthly; $100 for every story, and $100 for every poem he contributed, together with a quarter interest in the magazine."

In recent times great ingenuity has been expended in the invention of instruments for the automatic record of earthquake movements, and a variety of devices is now employed by which the time, direction and force of earthquake shocks are indicated. It is therefore curious to find that the Chinese have anticipated us by many centuries, as the following passage from a Chinese history called "Go Kanjo" will show: "In the first year of Yoka, a Chinese named Chioko invented a seismometer. This instrument consists of a spherically-formed copper vessel, its diameter being eight 'shaku.' It is covered at its top. Its form resembles a wine-bottle. Its outer part is ornamented with the figures of different kinds of birds and animals and old, peculiar-looking letters. In the inner part of this instrument a pillar is so placed that it can move in eight directions. Also, in the inside of this bottle there is an arrangement by which some record of an earthquake is made according to the movement of the pillar. On the outside of the bottle there are eight dragon-heads, each of which contains a ball. Underneath these heads there are eight frogs, so placed that they appear to watch the dragon's face, so that they are ready to receive the ball if it should be dropped. All the arrangements which cause the pillar when it moves to knock the ball out of the dragon's mouth are well hidden in the bottle. When an earthquake occurs and the bottle is shaken, the dragon instantly drops the ball and the frog which receives it vibrates vigorously. Any one watching this instrument can easily observe earthquakes. With this arrangement, although one dragon may drop a ball, it is not necessary for the other seven dragons to drop their balls unless the movement has been in all directions. Thus one can easily tell the direction of an earthquake. Once upon a time a dragon dropped its ball without any earthquake, and the people, therefore, thought that this instrument was of no use; but after two or three days a notice came saying that an earthquake had taken place at Rosei. Hearing of this, those who did not believe about the use of this instrument began to believe in it again. After this ingenious instrument had been invented by Chioko, the Chinese government wisely appointed a secretary to make observations on earthquakes." We have here not only an account of an earthquake instrument which, in principle, is identical with many of our modern inventions, but the science has been conjoined with art. The record of the Chinese government establishing a seismological bureau, at a time when America was unknown and half of Western Europe were living in the woods, is exceedingly interesting.

DR. TYNDALL offers an explanation of the facts observed by General Duane in connection with the use of fog-whistles on the coast of Maine, viz., that "the signal often appears to be surrounded by a belt, varying in radius from one to one and a half miles, from which the sound appears to be entirely absent; thus, in moving directly from a station the sound is audible for the distance of a mile, is then lost for about the same distance, after which it is again distinctly heard for a long time." Dr. Tyndall says: "For a long time past I have thought that this disappearance of the sound was due to the interference with the direct waves, of waves reflected from the surface of the sea. This explanation is capable of very accurate experimental illustration. Placing, for instance, a sensitive flame at a distance of three or four feet from a sounding reed, the flame exhibits the usual agitation. Lifting a light plank between the flame and reed, a position is easily attained where the sound, reflected from the plank, increases the flame's agitation. Lifting the plank cautiously still higher, a level is attained, reflection from which completely stills the flame. By slightly raising or lowering the plank, or by its entire removal, the flame is once more agitated. In these experiments a high-pitched reed was used, so that it was easy to produce, by the motion of the plank, the retardation of half a wave-length requisite for interference."

It is already well known that recent archæological researches in the vicinity of Deir-el-Bahari, in Egypt, have brought to light, among other astonishing discoveries, the mummies of several of the most illustrious Pharaohs. One case contained the mummy of Amenoph I, the celebrated monarch who rendered famous the eighteenth dynasty. It was enveloped from head to foot in chaplets of red, yellow and blue flowers, according to the constant usage of the Egyptians of the Theban epoch. A wasp, attracted doubtless by the flowers, having entered the case at the moment when it was being closed, was thus entrapped and preserved untouched, and furnishes us with the unique example of a mummified wasp. De Rhoni, in his chronology of Egyptian history, places the ascension of Thothmes I, the successor of Amenoph I, in the year 1668 B. C. We have, therefore, here an insect whose death must have occurred thirty-five hundred and fifty years ago. It is certainly the only insect of so great antiquity having a certain date. Unfortunately the author omits to give the species to which this individual wasp belongs.

An intense excitement was recently experienced among the diamond merchants of Paris. A magnificent stone, sold at an enormous price because of its fine quality, suddenly lost five-sixths of its value in consequence of a simple washing in soapy water. Purchased as a Brazilian gem, it was thus discovered to be only a Cape diamond, of a honey-yellow color. Legal proceedings are likely to follow this revelation of a novel species of fraud, which we may regard, however, with composure, since the means of its detection are so simple. If the unhappy purchaser has lost his money, science has gained an interesting observation. The process of making a yellow diamond colorless consists in plunging the stone for a few moments into an aqueous solution of aniline violet. After drying, every trace of color has vanished, while the diamond lustre remains unobscured. This singular result is due to the mixture of two colors—that of the diamond and that of the violet—which are complementaries. This fact constitutes a most striking confirmation of Chevreul's doctrines of chromatic contrast.

THE DRAMA.

MR. EDWIN BOOTH commences his German engagement at Berlin, playing "Hamlet." The supporting company will speak German. Mr. Booth now announces that at the conclusion of his engagements abroad he will return to America and rest for a year.

MME. NILSSON says that her audience in Denver, Colorado, was the coldest and most unmusical of any she had ever sang to, though, in point of numbers, it was the second largest that has yet greeted her during her present tour. Nearly $3,000 was received.

MISS MARGARET MATHER, since her début in Chicago, in August last, has been moderately successful in an artistic sense, and highly successful financially. She has already played in the principal cities outside of New York and Boston, and is now inviting Philadelphia opinion at the Chestnut Street Opera House in that city.

AFTER the rehearsal of "Redemption" at Birmingham, Gounod kissed Sir Michael Costa, aged seventy-two, on one cheek, saying, "C'est mon devoir," and kissed Marie Roze, aged—say over sixteen, on both cheeks, with the words, "C'est mon récompense." Mrs. Weldon, his ancient persecutrix, was not at the rehearsal, fortunately for the peace of the town.

THE production of "The Corsican Brothers" at Booth's Theatre, New York, with Mr. C. R. Thorne, Jr., in the dual leading part, was received with great favor. The scenery was expressly prepared for this revival, a strong company engaged, and the presentation of the famous drama proved the great success anticipated. This was Mr. Thorne's first engagement in ten years, otherwise than with the Union Square Theatre Company, and it is a pity that it should have been interrupted by the actor's serious illness.

ON a recent Saturday evening, one of the Madison Square Theatre companies, of which Mr. Charles Wheatleigh, Mr. Archer, and Miss Belle Archer were the leading members, had arranged to appear at Rahway, N. J., in Mr. Steele Mackaye's famous play of "Hazel Kirke." The company arrived in town during the day, arrangements having been made that the baggage containing their costumes would follow by a later train. At seven o'clock a telegram was received, informing the manager that the train containing the baggage had been wrecked near Philadelphia, and that the trunks could not be forwarded in time for the performance. An audience of fifteen hundred people had assembled. The manager appeared before the curtain and, having announced their predicament, said that the performance would begin without costumes, but that all who desired should leave and have their money refunded. But one stirred. Prolonged applause ensued, each one feeling proud of the other. The play was then given, every member of the company appearing in their traveling suits. The effect was novel, but all were satisfied.

The Countess of Lunn.

"I won't deny that I love you, Ned,—
Had you asked me sooner, you might have won;
I had another offer to-day,
And now—I think I'll be Countess of Lunn.

"I always was fond of titles, you know;
And oh, Ned, won't it be jolly fun,
When away off yonder on British shores,
To know you are loved by the Countess of Lunn?"

"'Tis hard to lose you, my only love,"
He sadly whispered and gently sighed;
"When the London season recalled us home
I had hoped to make you my bonny bride."

For a moment silence reigned supreme
On the moonlit slopes of the "castled Rhine;"
And two hearts 'neath the silv'ry starry beam
With the flow of the restless waves kept time.

Said he: "For a nobleman's title I'm spurned,
But I swear I'll not live a bachelor's life;
Now tell me, of all your 'dear girl friends,'
Which think you will make me the fittest wife?"

"Now, there's Mabel Rand, with her coal-black eyes,
And hair like the glint of a raven's wing;
'Twould be nice at the theatre, opera, ball,
To call her my own—the darling thing.

"What's that you're saying? 'A saucy flirt'?"
I always thought you admired her style!
Ah! now I have it—your dearest friend,
That sweet little fairy, Bessie Lisle.

'Twill be sweet through the leafy woods to roam
When the sunlight dies in the crimson west;
Her soft gold ringlets my cheeks shall fan,
And her rosebud lips to my own be prest."

"No, no," she cried, with a startled look,
As in wild despair to his arm she clung;
Then softly whispered, "Oh, dearest Ned,
I think—I won't be Countess of Lunn!"

CORA A. TELLER.

True Love.

HER golden head lay nestling on my shoulder
That night I told her of my love so true;
Her eyes looked love in mine, and growing bolder,
From her red lips I took what was my due.

She raised her head, crowned with its golden glory,
And blushing, told me all of Love's sweet tale;
And vowed, by all the gods of ancient story,
Her love for me should never, never fail.

I little thought, that fair night in September,
That at my love this maiden soon would scoff:
Alas! she jilted me the very next November;
The reason why: I'd shaved my mustache off!

LA DELLA ROBBIA.

TERRA COTTA IN ARCHITECTURE.

THE traveler going westward in New Jersey, from Woodbridge or Perth Amboy to New Brunswick, will find his road bordered by frequent hollows, which stretch irregularly on either hand. The color of the soil, denuded and exposed, varies from a soft buff to that deep red which owes its richness to the presence of iron, a trace of which is found in all the circumjacent region. For a long distance his way will be marked by these excavations, which are sometimes scores of feet in depth. At the bottom, sinuous wagon-roads lead around banks of clay, where large gangs of laborers are constantly at work.

The undulating surface of the country, sparsely settled and frequently covered with a thick growth of young pines, birches and maples, gives no indication of the riches concealed below, for underlying it all is one vast bed of the best and finest of that clay which is used in the manufacture of fire-brick and terra cotta.

This clay is practically exhaustless. Though its presence has been known to the geologist ever since the settlement of New Jersey, it is only about five years since the first attempt was made to use it in the shape of terra cotta. Even now, few of the denizens of our metropolitan centres are aware to what extent this noble American industry has been carried, or what it promises to become; and as this immense clay-field, contiguous to the seaboard and situated between New York and Philadelphia, is the most important and characteristic of all that lie within our states, so the architectural decorations which have been modeled from its plastic substance, as well as the magnificent buildings they adorn, are among the most noteworthy of modern construction.

As our traveler proceeds he finds himself in a curious and interesting spot. Within a few miles from either of the busy little towns from which he started, and which owe their prosperity to their manufactories of tiles, fire-brick and terra cotta, he overlooks a territory that has been settled for more than two hundred years. The land on the south trends toward the Raritan River—distant from half a mile to a mile as the crow flies—hastening to lose itself in the bay of the same name a little farther to the southeast. It broadens there to a great width, and the railway running from New York to Long Branch leaps lightly from pier to pier over its swift tide, like a bar of music, across which the locomotive hourly chants its refrain of travel and of traffic.

The scene here is singularly full of natural charm and historic association. An embroidered mantle in many shades of green, through which show mottled patches of the ground beneath, stretches away to the glistening river and beyond are the wooded heights of the farther shore. Still more to the left, the eye rests on the beautiful banks of Staten Island, separated from the salt meadows fringing the Jersey shore by the narrower stream of the Kill-von-Kull. And that silvery gap between, bounded on three sides by Tottenville and South and Perth Amboy, widens out on its fourth side into the Lower New York Bay, and that into the ocean itself.

The point stretching out at its lower edge rises into the highlands of the Navesink, ending in Sandy Hook, and melting almost imperceptibly into the blue of the sea and sky, through both of which drift back and forth, cloud and sail, like the panorama of dreamland. But it is no dream; through that brief space the traveler beholds the argosies of the great city of the New World flitting to and from the ports of every country, inter-shaped by a guiding intelligence, it becomes one of the most perfect and enduring of building materials. Fire cannot burn it nor water destroy; it triumphantly survives frost and mocks at decay. In the ruins of Assyria, Babylon and Nineveh, débris have been found which bear still, in ineffaceable characters, records of those strange people who are so remote from the present that they seem to have lived on some other planet. Nothing changing merchandise and bringing back a population fitted to develop the resources of just such a spot as this.

And this highway, whence can be seen a picture so full of beauty and suggestiveness, is the same over which large detachments of the Revolutionary army marched and countermarched, weary and footsore, between Perth Amboy and Trenton or Princeton, in those trying days when history wrote itself in toil and hunger and cold. This soil, precious with the cost of so much effort and courage, has been of little worth to the farmer. Now it has a value as substantial as, if less brilliant than, the mines of California. When tortured, ground, and in the British Museum is more choicely guarded than those clay tablets whose inscriptions learned professors have spent years in deciphering, and from which we know what manner of civilization they commemorate; nay, further still, the antiquarian goes back to ruins which antedate all that is yet known of the history of man, although upon them are clearly traced the records of four thousand years.

The Assyrians, Phenicians and Babylonians, as well as the Egyptians, employed terra cotta in various ways, for both in and out-door use, as well as in architecture. Votive-offerings, sarcophagi, utensils for the house and garden ornaments were among them. But to all these offices was added the preservation of records by means of slabs or cylinders of the same material. On these were stamped by the stylus, hieroglyphic signs, indicating all that remain to the moderns of those personal events, wars and dynasties which give data for chronology. The most distinguished archæologists of this age—one of them an American—have been sent by the French Government on one of its steamers up the Nile, and at this very hour are doubtless critically superintending groups of swart, half-clad Mussulmans as they upturn the old dust of temples, palaces and mausoleums to find still further records, laboriously traced in the world's earlier youth, upon a substance which outlasts pillars of iron or of granite.

coarse terra cotta, thin, large and oblong, in a shape peculiar to that date. The walls of temples, palaces, arches, monuments and mausoleums are of the same substance, and were generally faced with marble. Of this they have long since been despoiled, not only by invading hordes from the North, but by the cupidity of later rulers of the Eternal City, while the more enduring material yet remains, quaint reminder of a former glory.

As an interior decoration, the wall as well as the vase or the panel was frequently traced with leaves, vines and flowers, as the lotus, conventionalized, running about the rim or border. Many of these designs have been changed and adapted to modern ornamentation, accord-

TERRA COTTA FRIEZE.

In Chaldea, also, terra cotta was employed for interior and exterior work, in all kinds of buildings. Colored bricks were arranged in simple but effective patterns, making a pleasing effect. They were easily cleansed, inexpensive and durable. The Etruscans produced statues in terra cotta very creditable to their knowledge of art.

The Greeks must have used terra cotta from time immemorial. Homer mentions sun-dried brick, and life-sized statues have been found formed from native clay. Figurines, grotesque and beautiful, were frequently deposited in sepulchres even as late as the second century. As an architectural material, the marble of Pentelicus was so accessible to the Greek that he wanted no other.

The Romans, however, freely employed brick and terra cotta. The arch of the Cloaca Maxima, the oldest piece of masonry extant in Rome, is made of tile or ing to the current esthetic fashion; for the principles of art are still more enduring than the materials whereby they are represented. On the body of the vase or the centre of the slab may be found allegorical pictures, typifying, under the forms of animals or men, the gods whom they revered, and who were forces or appetites incarnated by an archaic imagination.

During a long period afterward, this industry suffered a decline. It was reserved for the fertile plains of Lombardy, which are almost destitute of stone, to carry forward the manufacture of terra cotta to its greatest measure of success, during the four centuries from the twelfth to the sixteenth. It was then used in construction and decoration, in a manner at once so original and exquisite that Madame de Staël's epithet of "frozen music" justifies itself when applied to the architecture it embellishes. Some of the church fronts, spires and campaniles of Pavia, the Hospital and Castiglione Palace of Milan, and the beautiful Certosa, so admired by all students and travelers, and even villas and private houses, were built during the latter portion of that period, which may be called the golden age of terra cotta. They are models of elegance and dignity. Some fine reproductions of these may be found in Gruner's "Terra Cotta Architecture of North Italy." Among them all that of Certosa stands eminent. This monastic building was the most superb ever erected by any order, and served to shelter only thirty monks; yet since its foundation, four hundred and eighty years ago, the rich decorations of its matchless cloisters have served a higher use—that of typifying that poesy may exist in stone and clay.

After the sixteenth century, the ornaments of this material became unsuited to those more elaborate structures which marked the florid style that had then come into vogue.

But the father of real artistic work in terra cotta was Luca della Robbia, who was born in Florence in 1400 (according to Vasari twelve years earlier), and who died in the year 1481. He is not regarded as the equal of his contemporaries Ghiberti and Donatello, but his name is even more widely known through his experiments and discoveries in ceramics. To breathe that soft Tuscan air, was to breathe in a love of art that permeated even the pores of those who lived in an era capable of producing a Michael Angelo, a Raphael Sanzio and a Leonardo da Vinci; an age in which Julius II and Leo X threw the magic of pontifical favor around the painter, the sculptor and the architect; an age which witnessed the laying the foundations of St. Peter's and many another temple dedicated by the genius of man to the glory of God.

While yet a boy, Luca, following the fashion of many art students of the time, became the apprentice of the best goldsmith of his native city. For the boy did not then disdain to climb, by patient, toilsome steps, to the height of his career, through minute details to be acquired by cunning workmanship in gold, silver or even brass. Here, Luca della Robbia acquired his delicate touch and high finish, and began the compositions for which he was afterward celebrated. In these, his faces were evidently taken from nature and not too much idealized, since the descendants of their originals can be met upon the streets of his native city by the traveler to-day.

Of the first twenty-five years of his life, only a few bas-reliefs remain. They are "Grammar," "Philosophy," "Music," "Astronomy," "Plato and Aristotle," "A Man playing on the Lute," and two more that were left unfinished. Twenty years later, he began the beautiful series of alto-relievs for the balustrade of one of the organs in the Duomo of Florence which gave him rank as one of the most charming of Italian sculptors. These represent a band of youths dancing, playing upon musical instruments and singing, with the expression in each face so true to the quality of his voice, that, to use the expression of an admirer, we can hear the shrill treble, the rich contralto, the clear tenor and sonorous bass of their quartette. The figures are so skillfully grouped and so graceful in attitude, that no impression of monotony is conveyed to the beholder.

His first known essays in the so-called "Robbia ware" were made about the year 1436, after that long study and those repeated experiments which usher in all inventions of genuine merit, from the nebulous beginning of civilization down to the time of Edison. His purpose was to discover some method of coating clay with an opaque, hard, stanniferous enamel, which could be more easily reproduced than by the slow process of carving marble or casting bronze. In this, he attained results which have not been superseded by later students of the ceramic art. This covering or glaze is made of lead, borax, feldspar and tin; sometimes the ingredients are changed, according to the kind of product desired.

TERRA COTTA BUST BY ANDREA VERROCHIO,—FLORENTINE, FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

Ten years later Luca's first painted tiles in the ware which bears his name were made for the tomb of Benozzi Frederighi, bishop of Fiesole, in the church of San Francesco è Paolo. This tomb was among the finest of the cinque-cento monuments in Tuscany. From that time his skill gave him a fame which has survived all minute knowledge of his life, save as it is known by his works. By comparing all other pottery of the time with that made by him, the greater degree of opacity and solidity of the works of our inventor are made manifest. Indeed, the secrets of Luca were so well kept that for a quarter of a century no other artisan in clay manufactured a piece surfaced with stanniferous enamel. Those ascribed to the Caffaggiolo pottery date seventy years later than the first recorded articles of Luca della Robbia. The assertion of Vasari, then, seems true, that Luca was the discoverer for Italy of this important improvement of glazing earthenware vessels. What he may have learned of the Moorish potters from Spain we have no means of knowing. It is a matter of fact that they had attained great skill in the manufacture of what we now call terra cotta.

During two generations the family of Luca guarded their precious secret. But Nature is a tell-tale to energetic workers, and gradually a knowledge of the composition became known and adopted in the potteries of Italy and France. Meanwhile the nephew, Andrea, with his four sons, carried on the work. The name relative, Luca the Younger, may be really the author of reliefs attributed to the Elder. They had many distinguishing marks in common. Under the other relatives, however, art-work in terra cotta began to decline. It gradually spread into other countries, even in its decadence. One of the Lucas introduced it into France, where the Chateau de Madrid was decorated by him under the patronage of Francis I. Yet its use has never been abandoned. In the south of France, north of Germany and along the Baltic it is found in all kinds of buildings—in balustrades, balconies, turrets, spires, and in mural decorations of various kinds. It makes, in its soft shades and diverse forms, a pleasing and varied effect, as different from the gingerbread work of cheap wooden villa decoration as its substance is more substantial.

A few years since, Andrea Boni, of Milan, established a pottery for the making of terra cotta in that city, thus renewing the taste for it in Italy. In England it is barely two hundred years since only coarse earthenware was produced, yet, when Wedgwood concentrated his energies upon refining the quality of terra cotta, its improvement was marked and rapid. Within the last few years Messrs. Doulton have attained a widespread reputation through the production of their potteries at Lambeth. Visitors at the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia will remember the admiration of the work from the large crowd which always surrounded their exhibit.

In the New World, the manufacture of terra cotta is newer still; in a succeeding article will be a review of some important buildings in which it is decoratively employed. In the Metropolitan Museum of New York are to be seen a collection of photographs of Italian terra cotta, including some of the period of Luca della Robbia. The last chief addition to the Museum, by gift of Mr. Marquand, is a composition by the old master himself—a "Virgin and Child," with six saints—taken from a mortuary chapel.

This piece is one of his later and mannered productions; it lacks the easy grace and spontaneity of his earlier creations, though full of happy touches and technical skill.

CENTRAL AMERICAN WOMEN.

JUST within the courtyard of a white marble palace, in the leafy shade of a mango grove, hangs a silken hammock lined with the brilliant plumage of tropical birds. In it reclines a creature whom to call divine would be base flattery to the gods. Note the classical features, the delicate, very light olive tint of her skin; see the long black silken tresses, in which an immense diamond-headed pin holds a rose; see the long lashes, half shading those lustrous orbs, which give forth all the varieties of expression of refined thought as she listens to her maid's reading from Espronceda's poems. Her shoulders, arms and bust are covered, but not concealed, by the finest of lace, and a long white skirt trails the ground, but allows one microscopical foot to peer forth, just enough to show the point of a gold-embroidered slipper. The gentle breeze gives ever so slight a motion to the hammock, and each little movement of its ravishingly beautiful occupant reveals thousands of new charms. What wonder that men, especially those possessed by a tropically inflammable temperament, become inspired with the divine afflatus—sing of her, rave about her—aye, kill for her?

The traveler from the cold North who has visited the tropics, upon reading the preceding lines, will continue the perusal of this sketch, to ascertain how outrageously

I can disregard truth, for the foregoing imagery can be found only in ideal descriptions of Central American women: the real ones are of a far different type. But they certainly merit a description, for the status of woman is the unequivocal key to the social status of a country.

I may be pardoned if I adopt the trick of many describers—that of classification—under the pretext of making the subject-matter more clearly comprehensible; while, in reality, it frequently is only a convenience for the writer. Yet, as I purpose to spare the reader the invention of erudite terms, she or he will not be inconvenienced thereby. If I require a justification for this course, it will be found in the fact that Central American society divides itself into los Indios, the Indians who are not savages; la gente del pueblo, composed of artisans and petty traders, and gente decente, or society people.

The lowest type of the Central American human female, "la India," a bare-footed drudge, wrapped from her waist to a little below her knees in a coarse native cloth in lieu of a skirt,* and a sort of short sheet, with a large hole cut in it, through which the head is passed, and then it is folded down the front and back of the body and held fast at the waist by a belt of similar material. Not even a pin is added to these garments. As simple as her vestment is her mind. She is barren of ideas—knows nothing except how to make tortillas (which will be described farther on), and to practice a sort of idolatry which she mistakes for religious observance. She has numerous children, and no hopes or aspirations save to see her family increase. She rarely smiles and never dances. Her only diversions consist of occasional visits to the nearest town, and if she is at all susceptible to agreeable impressions, then she manifests a little less of her placid stoicism, especially when on her way home, for then her pack is lighter and her system has been stimulated by the flowing bowl—probably “chicha” in her case.

* Several tribes distinguish the married women from the single ones by means of this garment. The unmarried ones wear it short, covering only the upper half of the thighs, while upon marriage it is lengthened to reach half-way between the knees and the feet or down to the feet.

At home in her “choza” (generally a tumble-down reed hut, indifferently thatched with palm-leaves) she is, as everywhere else, her husband’s slave, making his tortillas, toasting his bananas while he basks in the sunlight, or lies in the shade if the day be warm. Still more frequently he is found sleeping off a debauch, the liquor for which he bought with the fruits of her labor, and in gratitude for which he recompensed her with cruel blows.

It is only when on the road that a semblance to humanity spreads over her ugly face, as heavily-laden with a bag of corn and a sort of wooden cage (called “ke-késhke”), which contains live chickens, turkeys and eggs, all the result of her care and labor, she trots at the side of her husband, who, empty-handed, is mounted on a horse or mule, and vouchsafes her no look or word. When their wares are sold, and he begins to feel the enlivening effects of the first few drinks of “chicha” (a fermented drink, composed of spoiled fruit, apple, potato, pineapple and mango-peelings, with water and pieces of sugar-cane), he gives her a drink also, which perhaps obtunds her senses in a measure by the time her lord and master gets thoroughly drunk. Then he beats her unmercifully. This is the only exertion he ever makes.

These delicate attentions, like her prolificacy, she seems to consider the natural consequences of marriage. Coupled with her lack of ideas, religion and hopes, she has not the remotest comprehension of virtue. She will readily sell her daughter for a trifle to any stranger, and will part with her without a tear. She will give her husband the blood-money thus obtained, which he will spend for liquor, except the few coins which she will steal back from him. These she invests in a candle and burns it before some saint, to be rid of some present or future bodily ill.

And yet she is not absolutely the lowest type of Central American humanity. Her sister of the Lacandonese, or Lacantunes, as partly described by Professor Edwin Rockstroh, limits her garments to a breech-clout at most, and practices polyandry—that is to say, she will have as many husbands as she can support in idleness.

A higher type of the Indian woman is found among the tribes which have come in contact with civilization. She speaks a little Spanish; she is sometimes quite bright intellectually; her “guipil” (skirt) is clean and in good repair, and she attempts some personal ornamentation; yet her general habiliments are similar to those of her lower sister, except that her sheet-like bodice has wide sleeves, her hair has a vari-colored strip of cloth braided into it, and she aspires to jewelry, generally not less than eight or nine finger-rings, huge earrings, and a shell or coral necklace is used to suspend an immense cross of copper, and among the rich tribes sometimes silver, or even gold. She has no vices, and rises to the dignity of being her husband’s helpmeet. He is to her a sort of deity, and, no matter how badly he treats her morally and physically, she saves the best morsels of their food for him, and the lighter tasks are his.

Another step upward, and we have the female servant in towns and cities. As her duties, mode of life and other special characteristics form an essential part of Central American existence, she is entitled to a detailed discussion in a paper on servants. For the present it will suffice to say that the female servant of Central America is rarely of pure Indian blood, and, if her origin is doubtful, so too is her moral position. She is almost invariably a good, loving mother, but very, very rarely a wife. Seldom can two children of a servant boast that they are full brothers or sisters, and the majority of servants feel no shame in speaking of the different surnames of their ten or twelve children. Worse than all—because in it lies the cause of this sad state of affairs—the men upon whom the charge should rest incur no moral, and barely a financial responsibility, unless they take the trouble to legally adopt their offspring. This is done by a limited number of men, who vaunt their morality, but they are either laughed at as fools or admired as shining examples of virtue. In adopting his own flesh and blood, a man takes care so to arrange matters that the child shall henceforth be removed from the corrupting influences which surround the mother, who then becomes a stranger to her child, except when her extraordinary good conduct is such as to merit respect. She is then permitted to visit her child occasionally, and is treated with the grateful kindness which we in the North are apt to bestow upon the nurse of our childhood, whose kindness has caused us to bear her a sort of affection through which with time she has assumed a petty authority over us. This never inconveniences, because it is not obtrusive; nor does it ever become disagreeable, because she knows her station, and does not go beyond its limits.

AN UPPER-CLASS INDIAN WOMAN.

GOING INTO TOWN.

A case in point will serve to illustrate this: The first female servant I employed in Central America was Jesús (pronounced Hay-soos in Spanish, and then does not sound sacrilegious); a not ugly half-breed, perhaps thirty-five years of age, a most able cook, and an extraordinarily well-behaved and intelligent woman for one of her class.

Shortly after she had assumed authority in my bachelor household I was invited to a party at the house of one of the wealthiest and most prominent men in the town and state. As I was about to go to the entertainment my cook wished that I would enjoy myself very much, and requested that I should not neglect to dance with her daughter. I did not heed the remark, as I considered it one of those little impudences which in these countries employers allow their servants.

Early in the evening my host introduced me to his daughter, just arrived from Paris, where she had been educated. She consented to waltz with me, and after a few general remarks, she asked me, in excellent French, to repeat my name, "as papa is so indistinct in his introductions." Upon my telling her she said: "Why certainly, Don Fernando, I should have known you by my mother's description of you and her many praises of your kindness to her."

"Madame votre mère, mademoiselle?" I asked in surprise; "I have not the honor—"

"Of course you know her. Monsieur le Docteur, she is your cook."

To confound me still more, my entertainer interrupted us, and before I could employ the least tact to cover my confusion, the young lady said: "Just think, papa, is it not odd that the first gentleman who asked me to dance is my mother's patrón (employer)!"

"Indeed?" said Don Juan de Dios, with nothing more expressed in his tone than in his words: "You can rely upon it, Doctor, she is a very good woman.

But pray pardon me: I have neglected to introduce you to my wife."

During the general conversation that followed, the accomplished young girl again referred to the matter, and her step-mother showed not the least annoyance. While I felt ever safe in asking about one's father afterward, I thought it wise to refrain from speaking of mothers. Was not I right?

The cause of this state of affairs can be partly explained by the poverty in which, formerly, continued political revolutions kept the country, and the great expense then attendant upon ecclesiastical marriages; but it seems as if the main explanation lies in the almost entire lack of education under which women were allowed to grow up. Let a veil be drawn over the proximate past, and let us console ourselves with the reflection that the public schools, which are extending their usefulness even to the female sex, will eventually reach women and elevate them above their present position.

The seamstresses may be next considered. A large number of these can write their names; some can even indite a letter which would fall far below the efforts of a child of six years in the United States when viewed from an epistolary or chirographical aspect; yet the ability to write at all, and the financial justification which this class finds for indulging in the luxury of wearing shoes, form their distinctive characteristics. I have never met a married seamstress, yet all of their children bear the same surname, and are all adopted in legal form by one man as soon as they are old enough no longer to require a mother's care.

The market-women, female street peddlers, keepers of small stores and bar-rooms occupy an intermediate position between the two preceding classes, except that their morality is perhaps superior to that of the former, while their education and intelligence are inferior to that of the latter.

We now have to consider a type of woman whose characteristics can be discussed with greater freedom. This is the wife of the mechanic and smaller tradesman. She is invariably a wife and often a shrew. A model mother, a careful housekeeper, she is wofully ignorant, but she is inflexibly virtuous. A study of the home revelations of this, which might be called the middle class, would show that the husband's conduct is not such as would be an incentive to his wife's good traits; yet when such a woman marries she views her husband, with all his faults, as a sort of demi-god, whom it is her duty to follow and care for uncomplainingly, even if his steps lead into crime or he requires care as the result of his debaucheries. She certainly manifests the purest, most disinterested love for her lord and master—for this the Central American husband always is—and pardons his occasional digressions, although her forgiveness is never asked.

Among these women, no matter how white they may be, the peculiar Indian expression is habitual. However, to guard myself against the charge of excessive sentimentality, I will modify this by calling their usual expression an appearance of sadness. They are patient sufferers, and usually, as age creeps on, they become fat, but never jolly. The only song I heard among this class was a monotonous lullaby, which I dare say was as satisfactory to the babe as could be any civilized air.

Their education is limited to an ability to read, or, perhaps, recite from memory, their only book, the well-thumbed missal. Some can sign their names mechanically. Their sole amusements consist in witnessing an occasional Sunday afternoon bull-fight, and their daily meetings at the "News Exchange"—early mass.

Their characteristic dress—and in no republican country are garments as distinctive of "caste" as in this—is usually a very stiffly-starched, highly-colored, plainly-cut calico, with an immense train. A sacque of a dull, dark color, with large buttons, the buttonholes as a rule well frayed. The sleeves of this sacque are generally long and very wide. No cuffs or collars set off this upper garment. Bracelets are extremely rare, but earrings, breastpins and seldom less than fourteen finger-rings, all of them of a colossal size and of antique and tawdry type, are the rule. The sacque is usually cut very low, and whenever the large, highly-colored silk kerchief which covers the neck and chest is thrown aside, the inevitable rosary and scapulary, variously soiled from long wear are brought to view.

The women never wear hats except when they work in the sun, and then they cover the head with a man's hat. Their home-dress, when they leave their homes, is amplified by covering themselves entirely with highly-colored, and sometimes quite expensive, silk shawls, the heavy fringes of which trail on the ground.

Their names also are peculiar. The ordinary designations are frequently masculine; thus, she who was baptized Juana (Joan), calls herself Juan; Pedrona (female Peter), mentions her name as Pedro; Tomasa (Thomasine) says she is called Tomás; Jorja (Georgine) speaks of herself as Jorge, etc., etc. Still more frequent are names, which to the Anglo-

Saxon ear would, if translated, sound extremely ridiculous and even sacrilegious: some are Eucarista, Tránsito, Dolores, Redención, Concepción, Trinidad, Candelária, Cruz, Circuncisión, Jesús, etc.

Men of this middle class grandiloquently speak of their wives as "mi Señora," while the women address each other by prefixing Señora (Mrs.) to their baptismal names. Among the higher classes, the custom is to address a lady, no matter what her age or social condition, as "Niña" (a female child, colloquially Miss), except in cases where the person spoken to is one of great importance, or merits marked respect, then the term used is Doña. Señora and Señorita (Miss) are only used in addressing letters or when at all in a conversation, only to emphasize, or when the name is not expressed. Gentlemen of the higher classes rarely speak of "mi esposa" (my wife), but say "la Teresa," "la Epifanía," "la Antonia," etc.

The highest social grade of women in Central America affords far more pleasant food for discussion than their humbler sisters, yet in many ways suffers much by the contrast when compared with women of other countries.

Those who take a delight in railing against modern institutions (I beg pardon, ladies, for classing all of you among them) assert that the women of to-day indulge only in "twaddle" in lieu of conversation. This "twaddle," if such it be purely, is interlarded with bright and sometimes brilliant repartee, with classical quotations, with citations from the fair "twaddler's" reading and references to a clear insight in life. Would the railer, forsooth, have his fair partner in the "lancers" delight him with a dissertation on precession of the equinox so as to bridge over the intervals of rest in a manner suitable to his high taste and culture?

The society woman of Central America is quite a different being. At a "sociable" or any other reunion for amusement, she says—nothing, simply nothing. She does not even disparage her dearest friend's dress. She does not smile until several glasses of wine have asserted their influence, and then she becomes almost hilarious.

It has often afforded me amusement to hear recent arrivals of the "stronger" sex speak of the conquests made at a ball. They soon learned that they had only conquered wine. The free use of wine at all entertainments has its result on the weak little heads. They flirt mildly at other times, but when "the wit's out," and they dance, they cling to their partners, almost embrace them, and whisper protestations of affection, which may be summed up in, "Oh, why did we not meet before I married?" (Note: There are no divorce laws in Central America) or "God forgive me for loving you, knowing that you are not a Christian!" In these, as in most Latin countries, only communicants of the Roman Catholic Church are called Christians.

The following day Romeo seeks his Juliet at the place appointed by her, but she appears not. If, some time later, they should meet, his very marked bow is answered by a cold, expressionless, yet graceful courtesy and a very calm and undemonstrative "Adios, caballero," (good-day, sir).

Her erratic conduct at the ball can be explained by the fact that it is when a woman is dancing that she enjoys her only liberty. At all other times her every glance and gesture are watched with a suspicion which, to the purest and best, is almost an incitement to abuse of privilege when the opportunity occurs. Unfortunately, nearly every Central American will confess that he trusts no woman. What a sad commentary upon Central American education!

The lot of a young woman of to-day is hardly an enviable one. From earliest childhood she has daily been told that life in a cloister is vastly preferable to matrimony. Her education is limited, though superficially it is of an exquisite polish. Her gestures and general behavior are extremely courteous, but her grammar is often woful, and her few epistles, though frequently chirographically beautiful, are labored and hideously unorthographical. She sometimes becomes a brilliant but unfeeling performer on the piano, and her song "before company" is, as a rule, but a poor performance.

They, withal, make most excellent wives for selfish men, and if suspicion were removed from them, and they were treated with confidence and respect, they could be trusted.

Sanitary statistics are not kept in Central America, and therefore I cannot quote figures any further than those furnished by my own "case-book," and from what other physicians have told me. Suicide by women is extremely rare, and then only provoked by religious mania, while in men felo de se is common, and "because of unrequited love" occupies the first place numerically.

Men and women agree that the latter are socially and intellectually inferior, and thus it is that until recently the girl's education has been more limited than that of her brother's. This idea of inferiority finds one good exemplification in their post-nuptial designations. Anita Plumas, when she marries Pantaleon Tintero, does not become Mrs. Anita or Mrs. Pantaleon Tintero, but henceforth she is known as Anita Plumas de Tintero, that is, Anita Plumas (the property) of Tintero! And when he speaks of her as "la Anita," he means his Annie, as he would say his plantation, his horse, his umbrella or any other chattel.

Courtship—all the world over a mark for the shafts of wit—is certainly most amusing in Central America, except to the parties interested, and they follow out their ridiculous method, as did their forefathers, apparently unconscious that they are at all observed.

A young gentleman never visits young ladies, but manages to pass the residence of the object of his affections shortly after nightfall. She, by intuition, appointment or a smuggled letter conveyed by a suborned servant or other intermediary, is "watching the southern cross," although she has but a faint idea of astronomy, as she leans from her heavily-barred window, which looks like a small balcony, and there is no light in her room. In the finest summer nights, as in the seen to press their faces. During this period, which undoubtedly is fraught with interest and catarrhs to the young people, the parents do not hesitate to insult their daughter by double-locking, barring and chaining up all possible entrances to their house. Is it not almost natural that a girl whose contact with the men has ever been suspiciously watched should sometimes become a party to the manufacture of false keys, which burglars in Central America as yet rarely use? This most severe winter rains, Juan stretches his little body so that he may hold Margarita's not unwilling hand, or finger, if the bars be too inconveniently close together; and as he whispers sweet nothings the hours slip away, and only the chanticler's early crow, which she assures him is the nightingale, warns him that he should be gone.

Although the parents of the young lady and gentleman cordially approve of the match, he is never admitted to the house, except on rare occasions, and then only with a large number of other guests, to whom all attention must be shown. The feint of surreptitiousness is kept up, although all the town knows of the courtship. Foreigners call this the "iron-chewing period," perhaps because of the bars against which lovers may have been lack of confidence goes even to the extent of opening the lover's letters, if, during courtship, he should be called away. Only the least lover-like ones are given the young lady. Yet, if it be remembered that in most parts of Central America it is nothing unusual to open a suspected person's correspondence, this is not so surprising, especially when the suspicion with which lovers are viewed is considered. The adored one rarely if ever answers her future husband's letters.

A week, or at most a month before marriage, all romance ceases. The friends of the family receive cards in which the parents announce that their daughter is soon to marry Mr. ——. After this he visits his affianced bride, but never is left alone with her for an instant.

In due time marriage, with all possible and frequently bankrupting pomp, occurs, and henceforth real marital happiness is the exception. A peculiar feature in Central American marriages is that the groom provides the entire trousseau, even to the minor details. Marriage for a woman means that she has only her husband to watch her suspiciously, and the consoling consciousness that as soon as age and ugliness relieve her of attractiveness she is her own mistress. Her independence comes early, as these tropical flowers fade very soon.

And this brings me to speak to young ladies of other lands in response to the natural question, What do our Central American sisters wear?

Ma chere (pardon the familiarity of an old physician of not yet forty), have you a sister or friend who is somewhat taller than you, yet whose waist is shorter? Has she preserved a dress which was fashionable two years ago, when it was made by a wholesale modiste in Paris? Have you stays (the English word sounds nicer) which you dislike because they do not fit you comfortably? Have you gilt, bronzed, red or blue slippers, with immense heels which project downwards and forwards toward the toes, and are they cut so very low as to fully display embroidered or highly-colored silk stockings? Then dress yourself in these things, put on slightly-specked kid gloves, which neither match your dress nor fit you well, partly cover your badly-arranged hair with a large, flaring hat, and then in the mirror you may have the Central American señorita in her promenade and visiting costume. 'The hat is an innovation which has become universal during the last three years. The first few who cast off the pañolón (shawl) on dress occasions were superciliously designated as "extrangeras hechizas," which cannot be translated otherwise than by the slang term, "snide foreigners."

But, as you value your good name, do not go out unaccompanied by a female servant—better yet, persuade mamma to go with you, and she, too, must dress for the occasion. Braid her hair into one or two switches, which you must tie with a string or dark ribbon; with bandoline remove any suspicion of those curls which it may yet possess, and which, before you were born, drove papa into writing silly verses and singing ridiculous songs, in which he accompanied himself with a guitar; remove all restraints with which she would modify her emboupoint; put on her a dark dress—preferably of a dull black, with a very long train. By the way, neither mamma nor you must lift the trains of your dresses, but must drag them through the muddiest streets if you walk. A large shawl with a long fringe must be worn by mamma, in somewhat of the manner in which she draped herself when she was as young and graceful as you are now. Comfortable but shapeless slippers or gaiters, several large rings on her fingers, jewels in her ears, and a painted miniature of papa in her huge breastpin, and then both of you are ready for your promenade or visit.

Yet one thing I forgot. Unless your complexion is very good, you must thoroughly kalsomine your face, but mamma must not, under any circumstance, "improve" hers, be it ever so blotched and freckled. Your picture of "Style in Central America in 1882" is now complete.

Is it not odd that when you are in the street, or are listening to really excellent music in the park, he will be there? And, stranger still, if, when mamma is profoundly interested in some local gossip, you should accidentally happen to drop your handkerchief, he will pick it up and hand it to you with inimitable grace and such a melting look? But what change has occurred in the fabric? When it slipped from your hand it was soft and pliable—now it seems to have been stiffly and awkwardly starched. Do not examine it now, but, when you are secure from observation, take it forth and remove from it a piece of paper. Let us read it, for it contains no address nor signature, yet you have seen that writing before. "Divine idol of my soul! Have you no pity, sweet angel of my existence? Why must I suffer the torture of not being allowed to embrace you? Oh, cruel, cruel fate! I will pass your house at half-past seven. If I cannot see you then, my cold corpse will, before morning, cry to Heaven for the life you have ruined of him who adores you!"

"What a remarkable document!" you say, and you wonder how it came among the folds of your handkerchief!

In the preceding lines I may appear unjust to some, and lest all of the women of Central America be classed alike by those of my readers who do not know them, I must add that there, as in all other lands, women are found who combine intelligence, education and brilliancy with all of those charms which make women the link that binds man to the angels, yet are human enough to dress in exquisite taste in the style of to-day, as well and as elegantly as their American and European sisters of the highest social ranks.

OLD MUSIC.

O'ER a world's orchestral changes
We can hear those silver lays—
Hear the old tunes ringing, ringing,
Set to words of by-gone days.

There are strains of tender beauty
That our hearts may not repeat;
There are stirring, wild bramuras,
And adagios sad and sweet.

Not a discord grates the softness
Of those spirit-echoes fair;
Not a false note ever wavers
On the golden, hazy air.

Life may sweep in grandest chorals
Onward through the realm of song,
But the purest tones must reach us
Through the distance, dim and long.

CHAPTER XI.

"The flower that smiles to-day,
To-morrow dies;
All that we wish to stay
Tempt, and then flies.
What is this world's delight?
Lightning that mocks the night,
Brief even as bright."

HAD Miss Watson's eye been glued to her spy-glass, as for six or eight out of the twenty-four hours it invariably is, and as, strange to say, it is not about four o'clock in the ensuing afternoon, she would have seen Belinda Churchill setting off for a walk alone. Humanly speaking, not thirty seconds would have elapsed before that lady would have been across the street and down it to ask why alone? why not with her sister? why not with the dogs? The dogs ask the same question. A Dresden walk, indeed, with their poor little snouts imbedded in muzzles, is by not any means the same thing as an English one—free to dogs and men as English air; but such as it is, it is better than nothing. With a muzzle one can still scamper, and even give mutilated sniffs here and there. The prospect of a walk is the one thing that restores to its pristine hyacinthine curl Sluttty's tail, which ever since the arrival of Punch has limply drooped in envy and dejection; and as for Punch, there is no number of times that he would not bark for the Queen, for Mr. Gladstone, for the devil if required, in order to attain it. To-day they both meet with an abstracted yet peremptory refusal.

"I am going to the Grosse Garten, Sarah," says Belinda, giving this piece of information in a not very assured voice, and apparently grateful to the numberless buttons of her gloves for giving her an excuse for bending her head over them.

"Are you?" answers the other carelessly; then, as something in her sister's manner reveals to her how pregnant with import is the walk of which she speaks, adds in quite another tone, and with an accent of the liveliest sympathy: "My blessing go with you. How I wish I could be behind a tree to hear how he does it! But, after all," with a shrug, "in these cases there is never much variety; they all say pretty much the same thing; they have no imagination."

As Belinda reaches the door it is opened by Tommy, for whom Sarah has just rung.

"Now, Tommy," says she, addressing the boy with an extremely admonitory air, "if three German gentlemen come to call this afternoon, mind that you do not admit them all at once. If a second comes before the first is gone, you must tell him that I am engaged, and that he must call again later. Do you understand?—one at a time."

She is still impressing upon the page's ductile mind the all-importance of letting in her admirers singly, when Belinda passes out of hearing.

Along the street she goes. One side of it is in burning sunshine, the other in deep shadow. It seems to her an emblem of the difference between her life before and after yesterday. Why did not she bring the dogs? So royally rich in happiness herself, why should not she toss what crumbs she can to any such of God's poor creatures as ask her?

The memory of Sluttty's eyes imploringly bulging, and of Punch's disappointed back as he trotted tamely away to his cushion, returns to her with a sort of remorse. She is glad when she has passed through the town and reached the Grosse Garten; glad to see the long, broad, green drives quietly stretching away; glad to have left the city noises behind her. And yet even they have sounded melodiously to her to-day. There is perhaps only one sound in the whole world that would not now echo agreeably on her ear—viz., Miss Watson's voice; and even toward Miss Watson how faint and lessening is her ill-will! It is true that she continued to bestow her company upon them yesterday for the remainder of the afternoon; it is true that by her tyrannic overruling they were sent home in different vehicles; but could even she prevent their one moment snatched at parting, with time for but a sentence in it—and that sentence such a prayer to her to meet him here to-day? After to-day she will give Miss Watson leave to thrust herself and her importunities between them if she can. As she makes this reflection she smiles. I think she walks along smiling.

The Grosse Garten is not very frequented; but now and then she passes a couple of loiterers, a single man or woman, a nurse and child. She pities them all from the bottom of her heart: not one of them is going to a tryst with Rivers. She has reached the rendezvous now, a bench beside the Teich; the dull and stagnant pool where the swans are royally riding in the sunshine. He is not here—he has not come yet. She is the first at the tryst. A slight pang of disappointment shoots across her; but in a moment is stilled again. Probably in her eagerness she has walked more quickly than is usual with her. Probably she has taken less time than she calculated for. She looks at her watch. It still wants five minutes to the appointed hour. She sits down on the bench to wait, and her eyes fall on the pool. How crowded with green reflections it is; how different from the weak and pinched leafage of three weeks ago, when she and Sarah last sat here! It has gathered all the horse-chestnuts into its bosom; fans and bloom-spikes, you can see them all again as plainly as, sometimes more plainly than in the reality; wherever, that is to say, the swans' webs' oaring have not broken up the mirror into bright shivers. The remembrance of her last walk here with Sarah, brings back also the remembrance of their talk; of Sarah's advice to her to hurry the pace. The recollection brings a smile of happiness, and of pride, too, over her face. She has used no maneuvers, she has descended to no tricky coquetries; and yet could even Sarah have won him more wholly than she?

It must be half-past four now. Again she takes out her watch. Yes, it is now five minutes over the half-hour; but then probably her watch is fast. It always gains. Reassured afresh, she patiently resumes her waiting. The bench on which she is sitting is almost exactly opposite the spot where on the first of May he had thrown her his intercepted nosegay. At the thought she smiles again; and this time it must be broadly, for a stranger passing by looks hard and inquiringly at her, as though imagining that her smile was a recognition of and greeting to himself.

In a second she is grave again. This place is too public; when he comes they will seek one of the more quiet paths. When he comes? But he is not come yet! Why does not he come?

She turns her head anxiously in the direction whence she expects him to appear, a creeping disquietude beginning, despite herself, to invade her heart. Is it possible that she can have mistaken his directions? Is it possible that, as she is waiting expectantly for him here, so may he be waiting expectantly for her in some other corner of the large pleasure-gardens? But she dismisses the idea. Did not his few words drop, distinct and clear as articulate words could do, into her ear? Has not she been saying them over to herself ever since? There is nothing for it but patience.

Again she fixes her eyes, not so untroubled as at first, upon the Teich, the swan-house, the swans. To the latter a child is throwing bread; a homely burgher couple have stopped to applaud. In the fostering sunshine the horse-chestnut leaves seem to grow momentarily larger and greener as she looks. Why does not he come? A sense of hurt maiden dignity, of hot and cruel shame at being thus made to appear so far the more eager of the two; at being kept thus long and unworthily waiting at her first love-rendezvous, has come to complicate and intensify her anxiety. In all the mental pictures that through her disturbed and tossing night she has drawn of this meeting, the one contingency that has never crossed her mind as most distantly possible, is that he should be a defaulter from it; he, whose mad over-eagerness to fulfill any engagement in which she is to have a part, has over and over again kept him raging up and down the Lüttichau Strasse for hours and hours in rain and shine, in fervid waiting, until the time has come when he may decently make his appearance. And to-day he is already half an hour late! It is impossible—incredible! And yet if any untoward accident had occurred to prevent him, surely he would have written! Perhaps even now there is a note awaiting her at home. Goaded by this thought, she takes two feverish steps in the direction of a return; then, arrested by the reflection that he may arrive in her absence and find her gone, she stops in painful irresolution. To sit still and look at the swans any longer is at all events impossible.

She walks—but with how different a tread to that with which she had at first approached the spot!—she walks a little away; not so far as to lose the bench, to which her hopes still cling, from sight, but far enough to get a good view down the great main drive. With her trembling hand lifted to shield her eyes, she strains her gaze eagerly down it. Oh, if she could but catch the most distant glimpse of him! Under the trees spreads in glory the dazzling strong spring grass, with its brightness toned down here and there by the shadows of the dark tree-trunks, that in their afternoon quiet lie stilly on it. There is nothing.

With a sort-of sob in her throat that shocks herself, she is turning away, when, at the very other end of the avenue, she becomes aware of a man's figure that has suddenly come within eye-range. It is so distant that it is no taller than a pin; but surely it has something of his walk and gait.

Catching at this new hope, she advances quickly to meet the figure. Yes; it certainly has a look of him. Well, she will not upbraid him. No hurt self-love nor petty sulks shall be permitted to mar the heavenly harmony of the first outpouring of their hearts into each other. She will not even ask him why he is late. No doubt he has some good reason, which in his own time he will tell her. But alas! she may keep her high resolve for another occasion. She will not need them now. It requires no very near approach to the stranger to reveal that he is not Rivers; that he is not even, when you come close to him, in the very least like him.

It is such a bitter disappointment that she turns into a side alley to hide her tears; but quickly drying them again, hastily returns to the meeting-place, in the panic fear that he may have appeared there from some unexpected point of the compass. But he is not there; and as she ascertains this, with a blank heart-sinking, the city clocks strike the half-hour. It is half-past five! For a whole hour she has been dancing attendance on his pleasure; waiting here, ridiculous and befooled.

With a movement of strong indignation she begins to walk swiftly homewards; but before she has gone five yards, her purpose slacks. She cannot yet bear to face the fact that this is what her day's splendid and apparently so sure promises are to end in—this humiliated, balked, back-coming! She will give him five minutes more. Possibly, not very improbably even, he may have mistaken the appointed hour, and have thought that it was half-past five instead of half-past four. In that case he would be scarcely at all late, even now.

A little recovered by this new flicker of hope, she sits down. Yes; she will give him five minutes more, and during all these five she will not look round once, or send her eyes in search of him. Perhaps that will bring her luck. But it does not. The five minutes are gone, and he is not here. She gives him ten more, and then five again. Twice she repeats her little feverish excursion to the head of the main avenue; these times she is not even deluded by the will-of-the-wisp of a possible resemblance in any of the few saunterers that occupy it, to him whom she, with a now so evident hopelessness, seeks.

It is only the clocks striking six that at length make her really and desperately turn homewards. Each one of their tranquil strokes seems to her the beat of a cruel hammer on her heart. But putting out of the question the bootlessness of any further delay, self-respect, at length aroused, forbids her any more moments to the humiliating and miserable hour and a half she has already spent.

"If I had had any proper pride, I should have gone home an hour ago," she says to herself in bitterest dejection, as she passes along. She holds her head, usually carried a little loftily, well down. It seems to her as if everybody who meets her must read in her face her deep discomfiture, and the fool's errand on which she has been. She quickens her pace to get away from them; to be safe out of the streets so full of gaudy light, where at any time she may meet an acquaintance—worse still, one of their yesterday's party; worst of all, Miss Watson.

As she nears the Lüttichau Strasse her distress lightens a little; the hope of finding there a note, a message, some solving of this most inhuman riddle, buoys up her steps and gives life again to her looks. It cannot be but that there must be some clearing up of this wretched contretemps. It will have, as she says to herself, to be a very bright clearing up indeed, to indemnify her for the sufferings of the afternoon—that very afternoon whose anticipated joys she had pitied every chance-passer-by that she met, for not being about to share.

"Well," cries Sarah, standing in the open salon door, and looking expectantly beyond her sister's figure for another, "where is he? what have you done with him? I want to fall on his neck and kiss him. I have long," laughing, "been wishing for an excuse to do it, and now I have an excellent one."

Belinda had not meant to have entered the salon. She had hoped to have slunk unperceived to her room; for has not Tommy, in answer to her fevered questions, philosophically assured her that there has been neither note nor message left for her in her absence.

"Do not," she says hoarsely, "do not laugh. I cannot bear it. He was not there; he never came!"

"Never came!" echoes Sarah in a tone of bottomless wonder, her pretty eyes and mouth opening with a stare and a gape. "Then," gradually recovering the power of speech, "then where have you been, may I ask—what have you been doing all this time?"

"I have been waiting for him," answers Belinda, trying to speak steadily, though at that humiliating confession such a tide of crimson rushes over her poor proud face as one would think must leave all the rest of her body bloodless.

"But it is monstrous!" cries the other in a tone of the wildest excitement; "ça n'a pas de nom; there is some mistake. He is a man, he is a gentleman; of course he has written—he has sent?"

Belinda shakes her head.

"No; I asked Tommy."

"Tommy!" repeats Sarah in a tone of the most contemptuous indignation. "Tommy, indeed! That boy is ripening for the tread-mill or the gallows, or both, as fast as he can. You will hardly believe that after what I said to him—you heard me—he showed them up all at once."

Then, ringing the bell violently, "Tommy," she says very sharply, "how dare you say that there is not a note for Miss Churchill? Of course there is a note. Go this moment to look for it, and do not come back without it!"

Paying no attention whatever to his asseverations, she waves him from the room; and then follow a few moments of painful waiting. At the end of them Tommy returns with, sure enough, a missive of some kind on a salver.

"I told you how it would be!" exclaims Sarah, triumphantly pouncing upon it and the unlucky child at once. "How dare you tell such a story, you naughty boy? Do you know where liars go to?"

And he may pour into her unheeding ear his faltering attempt to lay the blame on Gustel, who answers the bell when he is out; she does not hear a word he says. In a fury of impatient anxiety, she is stooping over Belinda's shoulder: Belinda, whose shaking fingers can scarcely tear the envelope asunder.

A thin blue paper falls out. It is the bill from a Porzellan Handlung for a couple of Meissen figures purchased there a week ago. In an uncontrollable spasm of misery, she throws it on the floor and bursts into tears.

CHAPTER XII.

"STILL at dinner, are they? I shall not detain them a moment; I am sure they will admit me; they always admit me. No, I will not wait in the salon; I will join them in the dining-room."

Such are the sentences uttered by Miss Watson's voice, and plainly audible through the door on that same evening, as addressed to Tommy, who is opposing his puny infant strength to the forcible breaking in upon his mistresses at their dessert by the before-mentioned lady. With what result may readily be guessed.

"Have you heard about young Rivers?" cries she, thrusting the boy aside and bursting in upon them.

They are sitting, as they have sat upon so many happier evenings, the one old woman and the two young ones, in their pretty soigné evening dresses. For the last three-quarters of an hour Belinda has been struggling to solve the problem how to swallow. It is dreadful to eat, but it is still more dreadful to have your lack of appetite noticed and wondered at. Grapes are perhaps less difficult than most other things for an unwilling palate to deal with; and she has taken a few Muscats, and is holding a small bunch between her hot and listless fingers at the time of Miss Watson's bounding entrance. Instantly they fall with a slight patter upon her plate.

"What about him?" asks Sarah eagerly, jumping up and running toward the intruder, while Mrs. Churchill drops the little red Alpine strawberry she is in the act of lifting to her lips, and says in an amazed voice:

"Dear me, Miss Watson! how you startle one!"

"You have not heard, then?" says the other loudly, in a voice of relief. "I am the first to tell you?"

"Yes, yes; of course. What is there to tell?" As she speaks, Sarah places herself adroitly between their visitor and her view of Belinda, and mentally thanks her gods for the failing light and the unkindled gas.

"I was at the station this evening," begins the other; only too happy to embark upon her tale; "indeed, I have come almost straight thence." She is in rather disheveled morning dress. "I went to see the Rays off. You know how much we have been together; they would never have forgiven me if I had not!"

Despite her anxious suspense, Sarah cannot avoid a sardonic smile. It is the open secret of the whole English colony that the Ray family has been compelled, by Watson assiduities, regretfully and at great personal inconvenience, to curtail their stay in the Saxon capital.

"I took their tickets for them," pursues the unconscious narrator—"I never mind trouble—indeed, I insisted upon it. To tell truth, I was a little glad of the opportunity to find out where they were going to book to, about which they had made rather a foolish mystery, when, just as I was counting my change, whom should I see coming up to the ticket-office but young Rivers!"

"Well?" Even Sarah is a little breathless.

"And what brings you here, pray?" I said. "Are you come, too, to see the Rays off?" He did not hear me. I was prepared for that; you know you explained to me that he was a little deaf. By-the-way, that deafness should be seen to at once, and so I shall tell him, if I ever meet him again."

If she ever meets him again! Belinda is leaning forward in an attitude of the acutest strained listening; her heart is beating against the edge of the table with loud, hard blows.

"He evidently could not have heard me," pursues Miss Watson fluently; "nor seen me either, for the matter of that, as he turned sharp round and walked off in the other direction. Of course, as soon as the Rays could spare me, I went after him and overtook him."

"Of course!" murmurs Sarah, under her breath.

"I put my hand on his arm. 'Come, now, where are you off to?' just like that. He shook my hand off—you know he never had any manners—that is why I think he must be related to the Stukeley Rivers; they are proverbially rude, as a family. 'What do you want?' he said, just as if he had not heard my question. 'I want to know where you are off to?' I said. 'Where are you off to?' He hesitated for a moment, and then seeing, I suppose, that I was not to be trifled with, that I was determined to have an answer of some kind, he turned his head quite away, and said, so low that I could hardly hear him, 'I am going back to England to-night.' Then he was away like a shot, and what with the confusion of the train coming in, and seeing that the Rays had all their parcels right in the carriage—of course, at the last moment, one was missing—I never caught another glimpse of him." She stops, out of breath, her narrative ended; nor, for a moment, does any one of her three auditors comment upon it.

Belinda has sunk back in her chair, and round her the room is spinning. Sarah, Miss Watson, granny, the dogs, all are whirling. Mrs. Churchill is the first to speak.

"I suppose," she says, in a voice still somewhat ruffled by Miss Watson's inroad, and picking up the sugar-sifter in her delicate old fingers, "that he was tired of Dresden. There is nothing very wonderful in that. Punch, take your hands off the table this instant."

"But it is so sudden!" cries Miss Watson, in a loud, aggrieved tone, as if Rivers' departure were a personal injury. "Why did not he tell us? He never told me; did he ever tell you he was going?" Nobody takes the trouble to answer. "I am sure that yesterday, at Wesenstein, nobody would have said that he had such an idea in his head, would they now?" turning directly to Belinda.

By a great exertion of the powers of the mind over their weaker brothers of the body, Belinda has forced the room and the people to stand steady and still again. By a like exertion, she frames a sentence, which, though short, is not conspicuously tremulous.

"No; I think not."

"Probably he was telegraphed for home," says Sarah, coming hastily to her sister's rescue, and trying to divert from her the brunt of Miss Watson's eyes and speech. "Probably he had bad news."

"I should not wonder," answers Miss Watson, looking down on the floor for a moment in inquisitive reflection. "I should not at all wonder. He looked like a man who had had bad news. In point of fact, he looked shockingly ill. I never saw a man so changed in so short a time. I am so annoyed with myself," in a tone of the sincerest vexation, "for not having asked him point-blank!"

"I should have thought that you might have spared yourself that reproach," says Sarah; adding, as she casts an oblique glance in the friendly dusk toward Belinda, to see how she is holding up, "most likely one of his relations is dead."

"I hope it is not even worse than that," answers the other, in a voice of mysterious curiosity. "I hope that none of his sisters have got into a disagreeable scrape. You know that, in the world, the Rivers women have the character of being un peu leste."

It is not till every possible conjecture has been exhausted, till the few facts known have been worn bare and shiny by turning and handling, that Miss Watson at length withdraws. She would not have gone then, had not the idea suddenly presented itself, that, if she make haste, she will be able before bed-time to force herself and her news upon three or four more households.

No sooner is the outer door safely shut upon her, than—

"Tommy is incorrigible!" says Mrs. Churchill, in a tone of irritation. "The number of times that I have impressed upon him not to admit that woman on any pretext whatever, while we are at dinner!"

"Pooh, granny! what nonsense you talk!" replies Sarah, disrespectfully. "When that great galleon bears down upon him, what can a poor little skiff like Tommy do? Of course she will come to breakfast and luncheon and dinner, and we may think ourselves very lucky if she does not insist on thrusting herself upon us in our baths." As she speaks, she puts her hand under her sister's heavy hanging, limp arm, and draws her away toward the salon. "If you will be so slow, grauny," she says, with a parting laugh, "we must leave you to carouse alone. I believe you enjoy yourself more when you have no witnesses of your gormandize."

But arrived in the salon, she no longer laughs. Belinda has thrown herself flaccidly into a chair. The curtains are undrawn, and through them her eyes stare out upon the street—the street where, through the deepening gloom, the lit lamps, but now such insignificant yellow specks, are beginning to gain importance and use—the street so continually worn by his eager footsteps, where she has so often heard them, up and down, up and down, waiting, watching for hours, if it be past all seemliness and moderation for him to venture a visit on the bare chance of her throwing him out one parting smile. All through dinner she has been dreading the evening—dreading its suspense, the bell that will ring now and again; the intervals that will elapse, and then the blank silence, nothing resulting, showing that it was not he who rang. Well, suspense is over and gone now; but she would be glad to have it back again, seeing that it has taken hope with it.

"Well," she says after a pause, looking up wearily at her sister, who stands beside her with her fair arms folded and her white brows bent in an attitude of serious reflection very unnatural to her; "well, what do you say now? Who was right now?"

"I," replies Sarah. "I am more convinced than ever that he left a note or message for you, and that it has miscarried."

Belinda's shoulders lift themselves slightly in an unbelieving shrug.

"Notes do not miscarry."

"He left it with the servants to send," pursues Sarah decidedly, "and they—you know what German servants are—put it into the post or into the fire, to save themselves trouble."

Belinda offers no contradiction, but neither does any ray of hope brighten her dull face at this hypothesis.

"Are you quite sure," asks Sarah, looking penetratingly in her elder's face, so as to glean her answer from it rather than from her words, "are you quite sure that you did not snub him yesterday at Wesenstein? I know that you very often do it without intending it; that you can no more help it than you can help drawing breath; but you are sure that you did not?"

"Snubbed him! good heavens, no!"

She has writhed herself half over, and is thrusting her poor face into the cushioned back of the chair, as if she wished that she could for ever bury it there, while the blood seems to be rushing in hot shamed tinglings all over her body, as her sister's words call up before her in all the vividness of new life that scene in the wood, in which snubbing bore so small a part.

"Then it is perfectly obvious," replies Sarah collectedly, and with cool common sense, "as I told that hornet just now, that he has had bad news and been telegraphed for home. I hope," with an accent of awakened anxiety, "that it is not the iron that has gone wrong."

"I hope it is not anything about his father," says Belinda, startled by this suggestion out of her own hot and miserable retrospect; "he would never get over it."

"Pooh!" says Sarah; "sons do not die of their fathers' deaths; and, in fact, as far as we are concerned, it would simplify matters a good deal; he would be his own father then."

For a few moments there is a silence, cut into only by the sound of Punch's snores, regular and long drawn out, through the door. It is Belinda who, contrary to what one would have expected, breaks it.

"You were always telling me," she says with a hard smile, that yet looks as if it needed only one touch to make it dissolve into bitter tears—"you were always telling me that I was so cold to him; you were always advising and urging me to be less cold; perhaps," with a sort of gasp, "perhaps I have obeyed you too well; perhaps—perhaps he thinks so."

"Do you mean," cries Sarah, with a derisive laugh, whose offensive quality is, however, lessened by the soothing gesture of a kind arm thrown at the same moment round her afflicted elder's neck, "do you mean to say that you suspect him of having taken to his heels because you gave him two civil words and one look that was not a scowl? If such is the case, he is a valuable admirer, and the more express trains he gets into the better."

But Belinda is too much cast down to make any rejoinder.

"You will pardon my saying so," continues Sarah in a counterfeit apology that is contradicted by the lurking mirth in her eye, "but he would not have been nearly so tiresome as he was if he had not been genuinely in love. If a man is only playing at love, he can be civil and amusing to other people; but," breaking into an unavoidable laugh, "was poor David amusing? he had his one solitary everlasting idée fixe. My dear soul," passing her light hand with a stroking motion down Belinda's heaving shoulder, "what a trial he was to granny and me! And—cheer up!—what a trial he will be again!"

This is all the consolation, if consolation it can be called, that Belinda has to take to bed with her.

A LETTER TO EVA.

BY PHILIP BOURKE MARSTON.

Now that you have left my life as one leaves a house in a strange land to which there shall be no return; now that I move on alone in the darkness, the coldness and desolation of my days, only one thing holds any hope of comfort for me, and that is to live over in my memory the only happy days of my life. I think of them; I dream of them; and now I have bethought myself to write out a connected account of them, and address it to you, just as if you would one day read it:

Yesterday I walked up to the house where I first met you, on the first of July, five years ago. I saw that the house was to let; and I got permission to go over it. As I stood in the large, empty drawing-rooms, the place was changed for me, as by magic. It was again richly furnished—again brilliant with light, thronged with people. I heard again a clamor of voices, as when I stood that night in the doorway. A hand fell on my arm, and my hostess said:

"Mr. Archer, I want at once to introduce you to a most charming woman, a great admirer of your novels. She has had a romantic story of her own."

So saying, she piloted me across the crowded rooms, and we stood before you.

"Miss Linton, here is Mr. Archer. I told you I would bring him."

"I have very often wished to have the pleasure of meeting you," you said, turning to me, and frankly putting out your hand.

Those were the first words you spoke to me. For the first time I heard my ideal voice—the low, subtle, thrilling, sympathetic voice, with a note in it of tender, pleading music, unlike any other voice that I have ever heard. Did I take in all its beauty that night? Hardly, I think, yet I felt it keenly, and from the first you charmed me.

Oh, fair, gracious face, lit by the fair, gracious soul! Oh, perfect, passionate mouth, such as the old Greeks loved—formed for kisses and music! Oh beautiful, deep, changeful eyes, and white, thoughtful brows, with their crown of soft brown hair—in how short a time they began to come to me in my dreams at night! You know, too, I thought you had the queenliest figure that ever woman had. No woman ever held herself so proudly or so graciously. There was something in the touch of your white, smooth, small, but withal strong hand, that seemed to speak to me. You wore that night a soft, luminous dress; you had a red rose in your bosom, and a red rose in your hair. I sat down by you and we began to talk. Our talk was about novels, poetry, English and American, and of the places we had visited. When you rose to leave, I went with you to your carriage, and you asked me to come to see you. I had been longing for you to do this. Looking back, now, I see that, though I did not realize it then, I must have been in love with you that night.

I went back to the house after you left, but remained only a few minutes. It seemed so worse than uninteresting when you were gone. All night I lay awake thinking of you, recalling your voice, longing to hear it again.

I turned away yesterday, sadly as one leaves a friend, from that house over whose floors your feet had passed, that had been swept by the hem of your dress, and where I had first seen you. I came back into the heart of London, and walked for some time to and fro in front of that other house you had till so recently occupied, over the threshold of which I had passed so many times. As I walked up and down, in the raw air of the November night, hearing the discontented wind sweeping along the leaves that had fallen from the trees in the London Square, the pain and loneliness of my life seemed more than I could endure. A boy with a basket stopped in front of the house and rung the servants' bell; a light appeared for a moment at one of the upper windows and then vanished. I should have liked to kneel down and kiss the dear stone steps which your beloved feet had crossed so many times.

Slowly I turned back then to my chambers to think of you, then finally to find some rest from thought by means of kindly chloral. It will kill me in the end, perhaps, but what matter!

That night I had such a wonderful dream of you. I thought I was walking in a strange, lonely, sunset country, something like country I have seen, but unmistakably dream-country. No one was in sight, but from the tranquil field, and from the patient hill, I heard a sound of many divine voices singing, and I knew they were singing of you, and my heart leaped and thrilled in me, and the song told that you were coming; and just for great delight to think that I should see you again, the tears burst forth and I wept like a child. Then all in a minute you stood before me, your face more beautiful than ever, in the sunset light of that fair dream-country. It seemed to me that you were the queen of it, and when you saw my tears, thinking them tears of sorrow, you threw both your beautiful arms around my neck, and I laid your subtle lips to mine. I felt your clinging close to me. I thought I should have fainted from the joy of it; instead, I awoke—oh, the bitter awakening that it was!

The day I next saw you after the first meeting was the fifth of July, the day on which you told me I might call. It was a brilliantly fine day, too intense for most people, but not so for me. Besides, your drawing-room, with its tempered sweetness, its flowers, its delicate tints, was a heaven of shade. Not as I saw you on one day only do you appear to me in memory, but as I have seen you on many days. Still, visions of you, as I saw you on certain special days, beset me specially, and very often I see you as I saw you that day. Your soft dress was veined with blue; you looked a divine blending of heaven and earth—you might have been a saint to die for; you were a woman to live for. I remember the tone of voice in which you said, "I am very glad to see you." Just as if really you were a little glad. Then, of course, we fell to talking of what a hot day it was, and from that of people who like compromises with nature as with all things. I said I was always in extremes; but, all the same, a great believer in compromise; and you laughed, a little, a-half perplexed laugh, and said that you believed only in things that were absolute. You seemed to draw me on to talk of myself, which, as I told you at the time, is not a favorite subject of conversation with me. Before I left you, you knew, I think, the lonely, reserved man I was—made cruelly lonely by a nature utterly insufficient for itself, yet not finding in any companionship that for which it sought, for which it still craved ceaselessly.

When I rose to leave you I saw tender sympathy for me in your then gray and so compassionate eyes, heard sympathy in the tones of your voice, felt sympathy in the touch of your fair, firm hand. I went to the club that night, but did not hear what any one said, so lost was I in trying to recall the way in which you spoke. I fell asleep and awoke early, my heart flooded with the thought of you. This interest which I had in you—I, who until then, had been interested in no one—seemed to remake life; for when I looked back on the internal loneliness of the days before I knew you, I wondered how I ever could have borne them.

That day I made some pretext on which to write to you. Two days after I called upon you, in the evening, as you had told me I might. It was a hot, windless evening, with a storm brooding. You received me very kindly, and we sat for a happy hour in the twilight. Presently you said:

"Is there no chance of cure for your loneliness?" and I answered: "A week ago I should have said no such chance could be. Now I say there is; it rests with you."

"With me?"

"Yes, with you; will you be my friend? Will you let me be yours?"

"I think I need a friend as much as you do," you answered, with a little sigh. Then, with one of those dear impulses, which were so adorable in you, you put out both hands, and I took them, and held them in mine for a minute.

When did the feeling first burn home to me that what I felt for you was love—love in the sense of being in love—not the friendship I had imagined? I could not keep away from you; could not keep from writing to you. In one letter, I remember, I asked you to explain me to myself. Here I have your answer—the handwriting is faded with time, that beautiful handwriting, which, like everything about you, had on it the impress of your own gracious individuality. Oh, dear letter, once warm from your own hand; a letter in which I almost seem to hear you speak. You say:

"DEAR FRIEND: Your letter, half-sad, half-glad, came to me this morning with many others. I turned at once to yours. You ask me to explain yourself to yourself—to tell you why it is that while you are glad in my friendship—gladder, you are good enough to say, than of anything else in your life—you are yet so restless at times, even so despairing.

"As a rule, no woman is more stupid at explanations than am I; but I think this a problem that I can solve. By your own account, when you met me you were a lonely, reserved, self-contained man, never having known a real friendship. You say that your friendship with me made you, for the first time in your life, live. I have made a new world for you, you tell me—given a meaning to the summer it has never had before.

"My friend, a sudden friendship stimulated you thus: but you see now, don't you, that it is not by any means all you thought it would be? Hence your restlessness: hence your despair; but I, your new friend, am hopeful for you. Your power to feel so much shows me a capability of feeling still more. It has been my good fortune in life, when I never thought to be of any more good at all, to rouse you from lethargy, to plant in you some knowledge of what life may be made. Am I a little sorry to think that another friend must complete what I have only begun? Perhaps I am—I know I am—selfish. I suppose I should have liked this friendship, which came to you so unexpectedly, to have been the completest of your life; but I will try to be glad of what is best for you.

"Will you come to-morrow, and talk over with me the plot of your new novel? I want this, your next book, to be very much alive. I half feel as if the sun of our friendship were setting. Come to-morrow, and tell me that it is not quite sundown yet—it often turns so very chilly in the twilight.

Your friend,

"EVA."

The next day I reproached you with your letter, which, all the same, had been so dear to me, as evidence that you did value my friendship. Your face brightened when I told you that never another such friendship could come to me.

"I am glad that, at least, you think so now," you said, in a tone that was as sweet almost and as subtle as a caress. I passed the evening with you. You did not know then, my Eva, how I longed to kneel down by you—to kiss your lips, your hands, your dress, the heavy gold locket hanging at your white, wonderful throat. And I had to sit at a little distance from you, and dared not even reach out and take your hand. You were gay the early part of that evening. Talking of an acquaintance of ours, supposed by most women to be very dangerous to men's peace of mind, you said:

"She is a bright, noisy little brooklet of a woman—pretty to look at, but too shallow to drown in."

Do you, at this date, remember describing to me a sunset you had seen once on the coast of France—a wonderful opal sunset, in whose strange light shore and sea seemed translated?

"It was a sunset that hushed you," you said. "It seemed like the glorified ghost of a sunset."

I have seen in your eyes, my love, when talking of anything that greatly moved you, a look of passionate inspiration, as if they saw deep into the mystery of things. In your voice, too, at such times, was a rapture I knew well, which corresponded to that look which I have seen in no eyes but yours, as I have heard that subtle, thrilling tone only in your voice.

As the evening wore on you fell sad; thus, sometimes, after a day of brilliant sunshine and perfect stillness, just at sunset a sad little wind begins to moan among the trees, and the sky grows gray and hopeless. So seemed to me the change in you; nor was it the first time I had noted this sudden transition. Do you remember my asking you why you were so sad? You answered:

"How do you know I am sad? Have I said so?"

Then I did take your hand, and I said: "Eva, could we be the friends we are, and I not know, without your telling me, when you are sad? Will you not tell me what makes you so?" Oh, my God, how I longed then to draw you close to my heart, and kiss all shadow of trouble from your face; to banish all trouble from your heart!

"What are you thinking of?" I asked.

You answered, looking down, "Of something that is over. I will try not to be sad when you are here. Indeed, I ought not, remembering how cold and lonely I should be now without your friendship."

Soon after it was time for me to go, but all that night I could not sleep, so haunted was I by your sad yearning, pleading, almost hopeless eyes; by your low voice, which had in it that pathetic elemental music, that soft, rainy trouble, which we hear in the summer wind that comes before the rain.

"What is her trouble?" I pondered as I lay awake that night, and owned at last to myself that I loved you madly—that if, by dying for you I could make you happy, I would so gladly die.

You may remember my calling on you the next afternoon. You were going for a walk, and you let me go with you. Your very sad mood of the past night seemed to have passed away. You were gay—gay in your own bright way.

Oh, love of my life, who shall say what it was that most of all in you enthralled me—the wonderful voice, changing with every emotion as the beautiful eyes changed, or the delicate imagination, that divine sense of ideality which contrasted with your strength of will, your power to conceive rapidly and execute surely, and made you not only a beauty and a refuge in the world, but a positive good? or was it for that exquisite, unnamable fragrance of womanhood which escaped from you—the rose-scent from a rose? or was it for your moods of sweet waywardness, like the shadows of April trees shaking in the sunny, windy course of a rapid brooklet? or was it for your sadness, which sounded in me unknown depths of pity? Oh, my poet! oh, my busy, kindly worker! I loved each separate charm of yours ten hundred times more than the most passionate lover ever loved the whole united force of his mistress' attractions. You were, even in those days, what you are now, what you must always remain to me—my beautiful wonder of women. It was the fifteenth of August when I left England for Rocherville, on the coast of Normandy, where you were to follow in a few days, with a party of friends. You thought it best that I should go first, and I obeyed you. We passed the evening of the fourteenth together. I wonder if you remember it at all? You were sad and said you should miss me. I asked you to write to me, and you smiled as if pleased, and answered, "I don't think the sun of our friendship has begun to set as yet."

I remember how a street piano played under your window. It was playing the "Carnival de Venice." Whenever I hear that tune now it brings back to me your drawing-room in the twilight; yourself lying on the sofa—for you were tired that night—while I sat close by, worshiping you, yet not daring to tell you of the great love which was making me afraid of myself.

Do you remember telling me to talk, and calling me stupid? You did not know then that I could not talk because I was so full of grief at parting from you, even for a few days. Oh, did not the shadow of that parting forecast this greater shadow, which is even as the shadow of death?

Shall I ever forget the twentieth of August? I did not expect you until the twenty-sixth. I had been roving all day about the shore, thinking of you and longing for you, when, coming back, about nine o'clock, passing the window of the hotel, I saw you sitting there, your dear eyes bent down, the lamplight shining on your warm brown hair. I entered without your having seen me, and in another moment we stood face to face.

"I have been wondering where we should meet,"—those were your first words. "You are surprised to see me before my time. It was the sudden arrangement of my friends. They found they could leave London earlier than they had hoped."

"Heaven bless your friends!" I said, as I pressed your hand close in mine.

Then we joined your party, and sat all together on the beach. Oh, the joy of that night—the supreme comfort of knowing you were with me! Unseen by the others, you let your hand rest in mine. All that night I could not sleep for thinking of you. To the immaculate moonlight and the everlasting sea I told my love. Whichever way I looked I seemed to see you before me, as I had seen you so unexpectedly in the salon of the hotel, the lamplight falling on your soft brown hair, the face bent down, the dear eyes never meeting mine.

How I must always love Rocherville for the sake of the days that followed! For a week you seemed less sad; but after that the old pensive moods came back very frequently, until there arrived that never-to-be-forgotten seventh of September.

It was a bright, gusty day, and we were walking along the high road when heavy raindrops began to come down, so we took shelter under some trees. The ground was carpeted with leaves, and on them we sat down. I came nearer to you than I had ever dared to do before. Then my love could no longer be kept under. I flung my arms about you, and you did not move from me. My lips clung to your neck; just then we heard voices of people we knew approaching, and, rising, we were on the instant once more only friends. I did not see you alone again until evening; we had been visiting your friends, the Stones, you may remember, and it was my good fortune to see you back to your hotel. Do you, I wonder, remember the brilliant moonlight of that night, and the high west wind bringing to us, as we walked, the sound and the smell of the sea? We walked on until we came to the beach, and there we sat down together. Then, for the first time, I kissed your lips and felt your kiss answering mine; then I lay with my head in your lap, while you leaned above me and your fingers played in my hair. The white waves, exulting in their strength, shimmering in the pure, potent moonlight, filling the spacious night with their own wild, matchless music, will be forever associated in my mind with the memory of that night.

The next day I called to see you at your hotel—a wild, windy day it was, with occasional bursts of rain! A bitter day for me, my love, that dead day was.

I found you restless and sad, pacing up and down the room. When I went to kiss you, you drew back, and I hear again the tone, half of pity and half of terror, in which you said, as you shrank from me: "No, you must not; I have wronged you enough already. You must hear me!" Then you sat down, clasped your cold hands closely together, and told me about yourself and Frank Leinster. Then I heard that the man you loved, whose wife you had promised to be, had, without one word of explanation, left you; that he had last been seen on his way to France, in the companionship of a woman about whom report did not speak too favorably; that notwithstanding this, you had for five years cherished the belief that he would, in the end, return to you, as the only woman he could ever really love, as he was the one man that you could ever really love. All this you told me; and told me how, the day before, you had been for a few hours betrayed into thinking that you would give up all hope of a future with him and draw from my love what happiness you could; but that, alas, this could not be! "Some day," you said, "I feel certain he will return; for were we not made for one another? And then, dear, if you were my husband, what could we do? Would you not even suffer more than we? Can you forgive me for having given you false hopes?"

Did I not forgive you, Eva? You let me kneel beside you and kiss your hands. Then, just as a child might, you leaned your head on my shoulder and the tears came; and so full of pity was I then, my darling, I hardly felt my own suffering. I realized how terrible must have been those long years of vain waiting; how day after day hope would rise, only to fall stricken at night, when no word came from him; and still, after all, hope was not dead. Then I asked you to let me be your friend, one always longing to do your will; and if, I said, "in the course of many years he should not have come, or you should hear of his marriage, then perhaps you will be mine, though you can never love me as you loved him."

You answered, with a faint smile through your tears: "What! do you think you shall love me like this when I am old, as I should be then? I am not a young woman, even now."

"To me," I cried, "you must always be the same. You will let me be your friend, then?" I pleaded. And you answered, earnestly pressing my hands:

"Yes, my very, very dearest friend in all the world."

At the end of September you left Normandy, and shortly after I followed. I came back to town to find vast masses of work awaiting me. I wrote hard through the gray, hopeless days; then how good it was to come to you in the evening! What rest, what joy I found in you, my pure of heart! Of course, seeing us so much together people began to talk, to wonder why we did not marry; but we cared little what they said. You were the whole world to me, and you felt me nearer to you than any but that one.

As I write to you, here in my dreary room, this gloomy November night, I have your picture before me and a packet of your letters. As I turn them over, what a fragrance seems to escape from them! Here is one dated the sixth of December. You write:

"DEAREST FRIEND: I have to pass this evening with an old school friend. I shall greatly miss seeing you. Moreover, I am very sad to-day. God bless you, my friend, for all your tenderness to me and patience with me; but, dear, I want to write to you what I can better write than say. It is that I feel I am doing you a wrong in letting you devote yourself to me as you do. I feel still that he will come back to me; but, if he does not, could I, even after many years, marry any one else? I am shadowing your life with the sorrow of mine. I am sad. This cruel waiting has worn my health away. You think me pretty now—in a little while you will not think me so. You must try to see less of me—must try to take interest in some woman happier and younger than I am. I shall be lonely when I see you less often; but I shall know that it is best for you. As tired children long to go to bed and sleep, so it seems to me that I long to be out of the pain of living. I think sometimes that will be before very long.

"Because you are not coming to me this evening, do not pass the time in working. You looked ill yesterday. We shall miss each other I know, but I know, too, that it is for the best."

Did you not know, my love, that I would not, could not, keep away from you? Do you remember how sometimes we would sit together quite silently through the long winter twilights, seeing visions in the fire? I can hear your voice come softly through the twilight, "Are you tired, dear?" Tired! was I ever tired in your presence?

To me that winter passed like a troubled yet happy dream. To love you had been the supreme revelation of my life. I had before been, as it were, my own prison-house. It was you who broke down the bars—you who led me out into God's light—you who made me know the divine possibilities of life. Had I not reason to worship you, my heart's queen?

Do you remember that April day when we took our first spring drive together? You were gay that day, my poor darling—in one of your glad, childlike moods. To me you would always remain young. It was the day that we went over Hampton Court together. A few days ago I went there by myself. Along the paths I seemed to see flutter again the hem of your dress. In the palace I seemed to have a vision of you standing before a favorite picture. I got strangely in people's way, I know, being blind to all but that vision of you.

When the third year of our friendship had passed, and still he came not, stronger than you knew grew in me the divine hope of making you my wife. Yet I reproached myself for being glad, knowing how you pined for him—for that other man. Did I think that my love might, in the end, come to make you love me more? Perhaps I did. You never, I think, really understood just how well I loved you. Yet that I loved you well, you did certainly know. Sometimes you would say, so piteously, with that sad look in your eyes:

"No one, I think, will ever be as good to me as you are. It is not often that a man loves a woman as you love me."

Ah! but when before had there been such a woman to love?

You can hardly forget the first of May, 1871. I had sat up all the past night working, and came to you to be rested and refreshed. I was strangely alive, as people often are for a while, when they have been sitting up through the night. What a spring day that was—a haze of heat hung in the windless air! It was a day when sounds could be heard with wonderful distinctness. Long after he had passed the house we could hear a man, with a barrow, crying, "Fine flowers, fine flowers—all a-blowing, all a-growing!" and you said the sound lingered in the air as if it had not strength enough wholly to pass away. Your rooms that day were fragrant with blossoms. You wore a soft, blue, clinging dress, such as I loved.

Do you remember how, before I could prevent, you came and knelt down by me, and said, laying your dear, cool hands on mine: "I have been thinking of many things. I am not happy as things are. Dear, if I give you all that I can—all that has been saved out of my existence—do you still care to make me your wife?"

You know what answer I made—with what rapture I folded you to my heart, to be at last my very own. How happy I meant to make you! Ah, that was my life's crowning day!

We arranged the marriage for early in October. Yet, my love, I knew even in those days that though you took the shelter of my love, and longed to make me happy, you still remembered that other man. Often I saw that your gayety was forced; I saw, as it were, the tears quivering behind the smile. When we were silent there would come into your eyes a strange, far-away look, and at such times I knew that your thoughts were with him. Was I pained? Was I not proud to be anything to you? Had you loved me as I loved you I could not have suffered for you. I did not hint to you that I knew how often your heart was far away from me, and you were grateful, I know, for my silence. As the days went on your health failed more and more. It was the last day of July that you went, for change of air, to visit a relative at Dover. Dover is dear to me, for your sake, ever since, yet sad withal now as a graveyard, where the heart's beloved are buried.

Were you wasting away? Were you going to die? The cold drops stood on my forehead at the thought. I remember how, one day when I had gone out thinking to take a long walk to induce sleep at night, these fears so possessed me that I turned straight back, and, entering the room where you were, found you lying on the sofa, and crying softly to yourself; only because you were weak, you said, drawing my face down to yours—your dear face, wet with tears. It was that day that I persuaded you to go to Dover, where I soon followed you, arranging to go up to town once a fortnight for consultation with my publishers regarding some works then in progress. What strange, sweet, sad months were those of August and September. We were to be married the second of October. The sea air seemed not to do you the good it ought. Should I lose you before you had ever been really mine? I suppose it was good for me that I had to work. I used to hurry through the mornings feverishly, and then go to you. How sweet you always were—sad as death, I used to think sometimes, but sweet as the after-peace of Heaven! One day I could bear it no longer. I knelt down beside you, and I cried out:

"Eva, is my love killing you? For God's sake, tell me the truth."

"Oh, how sad your voice was when you answered me! and it seemed to come like a whisper from some far place beyond my reach. You said:

"No, dear, no! It will save me if anything can." And then you said, over again, still more faintly, "if anything can," and you put out your hands to me, and I saw how the bracelets fell back from the little, wasted, blue-veined wrists, and realized more than ever what a mere shadow of your former self you were. But I thought no more of giving you up. You had said that my love could save you if anything could, and I clung to that. Of what use was I in the world but to save you—to help you—even if to do so had been to break my own heart? I looked forward with a feverish, unreasonable hope to our marriage. I thought, vainly perhaps, and foolishly, that when I could take you into a new life, and amidst new scenes fill up your time with new interests, you would forget at last—you, with your passionate, faithful heart!

I remember—God pity me, how well I remember!—the thirtieth day of that September! I spent the whole day with you. I was going to London early the next morning, to make the last arrangements for our marriage, then so nigh. I gave myself, that day, a long holiday with you. I thought you seemed a little better. I read to you in the morning, while you lay upon the sofa, some poems that we both loved. "The Haystack in the Floods" was among them, and your eyes kindled at that with something of their old fire. In the afternoon I drove you myself for miles along the sea, and we listened to it, throbbing its heart out against the shore, as you said. Then, when the tide began to ebb, and a low wind, sad with prophecy, arose, I took you home.

That night when I bade you good-by I held you close in my arms—I, your lover, so soon to be your husband. I kissed your dear, consenting lips; but all the time the far-away look never left your eyes, and a pang pierced me, for I felt that some presence I could not see came between you and my kisses. And yet what a good night that was, if I had only known!

The next morning I went up to town; and, first of all, I went to leave some copy at my publishers'. There quite a packet of letters was handed to me, and the first one I looked at gave me a sensation something as if I had seen a ghost. It was the very peculiar, unforgettable handwriting of a man who had been my closest friend at Oxford, yet of whom I had lost sight utterly, since, a year or two after our university days were over, he had gone to America for his health. I do not believe much in presentiments, but there was something in the very touch of that letter which gave me a cold chill. I opened it, and this was what I read:

"MY DEAR ARCHER: I have long lost you from sight, though not from memory; but I will not stop to fill up the gaps now, except so far as is necessary to what I have to say. I pretty well recovered my health in America, studied medicine, and have got on well. Last spring I found myself getting run down again, and I put my practice in the hands of a friend, and came abroad for the summer. I have spent the last two months in Paris, and here I have formed an intimacy with a French physician, who asked me, three days ago, to go with him to the hospital to see a very interesting patient, a countryman of my own, just released from long incarceration in a French prison. I went with a languid sort of interest, and found—is not truth always stranger than fiction?—Frank Leinster, a friend of long ago, of whom, however, you will never have heard me speak, as we met first on the steamer that carried me to America, whither he was bound for a pleasure trip. I was very ill during the voyage, and he nursed me like a brother, and with that our intimacy began. When he returned to England we corresponded for a time, but a little more than eight years ago sudden silence on his part fell between us, and I have never heard of him since till I found him, three days ago, lying more dead than alive on a pallet in a French hospital. Since then I have learned his story.

"He was always a half-mad Republican in theory, and at one time he got himself naturalized as a French citizen, and joined a secret communistic or socialistic association, binding himself by all sorts of oaths to obey, on the instant, the orders of his superiors. At the time of his mysterious disappearance he was suddenly summoned to Paris. He went in company with a Madame Vautrin, a fellow-conspirator, summoned at the same time with himself. No sooner had he reached Paris than he was betrayed by a spy who had been set to watch his movements, and thrown into prison. He was only released six days ago.

"Figure to yourself what those eight years would have been to any man. They were something worse to him. He was engaged to a woman whom he adored. Her name was Eva Linton. When he started at an hour's notice for France he meant to write to her the moment of his arrival, but he was arrested before he had even reached his hotel. For eight years she has had every reason to believe him faithless. She is married, very likely—or dead, perhaps—who knows? But he judges her by himself, and clings to some wild hope that she has trusted in him through all, and waited for him. 'They seem to think I'm booked for death,' he said, when he told me the story, 'but, Grey, you must find her first.'

"He told me that she was living, when he left England, with an aunt at 10 York Road, South Kensington. I at once telegraphed, and found that neither Miss Linton nor her aunt had been heard of there for more than five years. I can see that to find her is the one hope for saving my friend's life. His anxiety about her is consuming him, as the swift flame burns the oil in a lamp. I am not willing to leave him. I will only do so as a last resort. In this extremity I bethink myself of you. I know your old passion for ferreting out mysteries—I used to tell you you ought to be a police detective. I fancy it was this turn of mind that made you a novelist. You know London, and the ways of London. I can reach you, no doubt, through your publishers. My appeal to you is a forlorn hope; but I know you will spare no pains to help me, were it only for the old time's sake.

"Yours faithfully,

"JOHN GREY."

I suppose men do not usually faint or cry out when the ninth wave strikes them; at any rate, I did not. I read this letter through as quietly as if it had been on some ordinary matter of business. Then I folded it deliberately and put it into my pocket, and spoke a few civil words to the man who had handed it to me, and went out into the street. There was no more to be done about my marriage. Not for one moment did I doubt what that letter meant in my life; and in the midst of my keenest anguish I thanked God that it had not come too late. I wandered about the streets, I know not how long; but I took the afternoon train to Dover, by which I reached there a little before seven o'clock. How it rained all the way down! When we stopped the howling wind drove the rain in volleys against the carriage. All the way I was trying to realize what life would be, now I had lost you.

I shall never forget shivering through the streets that first of October to your friend's house at the East Cliff. When at length I came level with the sea, and heard its dull, heavy waves, dark as night, breaking on the beach, it seemed to me that sea was not more dreary than my life, without you, must henceforth be. Then bitter remorse of heart took hold on me that I could be so unhappy when I had the supreme blessedness of bringing back to your life that light and joy which you had thought lost forever.

You knew my knock at the hall-door, and came to open it yourself.

"My poor wet darling," you said; "what a night it is!" Then you put both arms round my neck and raised your lips to be kissed, and drew me into the dining-room, where all things looked so warm and bright. I thought that dinner would never come to an end; but it was over at last, and then we went together into the little sitting-room at the end of the drawing-room, which had come to be regarded as your own, and seemed pervaded by the sweetness and potency of your presence.

Oh, my love, how well I remember everything about that evening! You wore a dress of silk and velvet that made a soft swish upon the floor as you walked. You had pearls in your ears, and your pearl locket was hanging at your throat. You had never looked lovelier or seemed so at rest since I had known you.

Outside we heard the falling of the rain, the bitter complaining of the wind, and through all the troubled voice of the sea. I remember just how you turned shivering to the fire, and how, kneeling down by it, you leaned your cheek against my hand. Dear, I cannot help lingering over that night. If only you had been in one of your sad moods, that might have given me strength; but no, you seemed at rest, and of your own accord began talking about our marriage.

"I am going to try and be just the best wife that ever was," you said, half playfully, yet earnestly meaning what you said. You went on: "How happy it will be when we are together all the time. I never seem other than alone now when we are parted. I am quite lost without my dear."

"Bless you!" I said, under my breath, and then you leaned your dear head on my shoulder.

God knows I take no credit to myself for what I did that night—I could have done nothing else; but oh, my love, my love, your divine tenderness made it all the harder, for I began to believe that I could have made you happy at the last, even I; and it hurt—God knows how it hurt—to think I must put you out of my life just when you were beginning to be so fond of me, and go on my dark way alone. You remember questioning me why I was so silent?—"Did I love you less?"—"Was I afraid of to-morrow?"—"Should you read to me?" And then the warmth of the fire and the silence within soothed you, and being very weak withal, you fell asleep there, with your head upon my shoulder, just as confidently as if you had been already my wife.

I had made up my mind to tell you all at half-past nine, and just before the half-hour struck you awoke with a start, opened wide your eyes, and said tenderly, as you fixed them on me:

"I am so very glad to have you back, my dear. I dreamed that you had not returned, and I was most unhappy, and began to think something dreadful must have happened. And I thought what it would be if I should never see you again. I shall not let you go again without me."

Oh, my love, when I remember that I do think I might have made you happy in the end, but who knows? I said to you these words in answer:

"Eva, my darling, I shall go away from you. You will never see me again; but you will not miss me."

Can I ever forget the tone of voice in which you said, lifting your head from my shoulder, and with a light I had never seen there before blazing in your eyes, while the blood came and went in your cheeks:

"You have news for me? Quick! What is it?"

For answer I put John Grey's letter in your hand. When you had read it through I think you forgot my presence for a moment. There was a wonderful light of rapture on your face, and you said, in a voice as low as a prayer, "Faithful and true through all, faithful and true!"

Then I saw a cloud pass over your face and the light fail in your eyes, and I knew that you were thinking of me and of your promise to me, and I made haste to tell you that you were free, quite free—that I knew all must be over between us now; and you were by no means to be unhappy for me, because your good and your joy must be mine. And then, one dear last time, you clung to me and wept—a great flood of healthful, saving tears—for sudden joy is as dangerous as sudden grief.

I offered, I remember, to take you to Paris the next day—the day that was to have been our wedding-day; but you spared me that. You told me your cousin would take you, and I was thankful. When it was time to go, you told me how good I had been to you, and once more you gave me your lips to kiss.

I walked about long that night in the wind and the rain; and when I went home and slept at last, I dreamed of you, and that to-morrow was our wedding-day, and we were never more to be parted. Then I woke again to the whole bitter truth, and I heard the clamorous wind and the cry of the empty, hungry sea; and the rain fell upon the roof as if it were falling upon a grave, and I knew that my life was dead, but that its ghost would haunt me until I, too, who have outlived my life, shall cease to be.

[The writer of the foregoing letter has now been four years dead. I, his friend, have printed it, using other names than the real ones, but making no other change. Its publication will harm no one; and if some time it should meet her eye, it will not be amiss that she should know how well he loved her who loved in vain.]

THE HOUSEHOLD—THE STORY OF A HOUSE.

ONLY a square New England house of painted pine, with more pine, scalloped and perforated and pointed, by way of ornamentation, here and there. A house which romance would disdain, and in which no tragedy save the inevitable tragedy of living could even be imagined to find a place. And the story in all its forlorn details is still hidden between the covers of a book read by few, the moral being too obtrusive and the plot too pronounced, and on the whole, offensive. Yet, objectionable as the reader finds it, the "realism" is much more real than any fiction of the modern school of novelists' devising, and whoever would read not only this but a dozen similar ones, may find them all recorded in a Report of the State Board of Health for Massachusetts, where almost microscopic observation has been supplemented by equally minute and patient details of each and every phase of investigation.

A minister built it. A man fresh from the seminary and newly married, and, unlike the most of his order, with a little ready money, which it seemed to him good to invest in a home. And so the house was built, and this is the way the story runs: "The house was provided with an open well and sink-drain, with its deposit-box in close proximity thereto, affording facility to discharge its gases in the well as the most convenient place. The cellar was used, as country cellars commonly are, for the storage of provisions of every kind, and the windows were never opened. The only escape for the soil moisture and ground-air, except that which was absorbed by the drinking water, was through the crevices of the floors into the rooms above."

Here we have the beginning of the story—a beginning common to nine-tenths of the houses built in New England or out of it. The minister's business was with souls. That bodies had any interests half as important, he would have denied on the spot. Or, if he had admitted their rights, it would never have occurred to him that his methods involved their destruction. Why should it, when their first principles even had never been learned? And so naturally: "After a few months' residence in the house, the clergyman's wife died of fever. He soon married again, and the second wife also died of fever within a year from the time of marriage. His children were sick. He occupied the house about two years. The wife of his successor was soon taken ill, and barely escaped with her life. A physician then took the house. He married, and his wife soon died of fever. Another physician took the house, and within a few months came near dying of erysipelas. He deserved it. The house meanwhile received no treatment. The doctors, according to their usual wont, even in their own families, were satisfied to deal with the consequences and leave the causes to do their worst. Next after the doctors a school-teacher took the house, and made a few changes, for convenience apparently, for substantially it remained the same, for he, too, escaped as by the skin of his teeth. Finally, after the foreclosure of many lives, the sickness and fatality of the property became so marked that it became unsaleable. When at last sold, every sort of prediction was made as to the risk of occupancy, but, by a thorough attention to sanitary conditions, no such risks have been again encountered."

One of our best illustrated papers some time since had a very vivid and suggestive picture of modern improvements—a carefully-drawn interior, with stationary stand and bath-room visible through the half-open door, while from each water-faucet issued the figure of a demon, looking with an evil and assured smile of confident power and possession toward the unconscious occupants of the room. How they must have swarmed and rioted in the house, which, so long as its stands, can be only a haunted house, given over in the beginning to demons, who, though driven out, are replaced by the ghosts of the young wives slowly done to death.

For was not all this death suicide, and suicide none the less because ignorantly accomplished? We call such things mysterious dispensations, but the day is coming—indeed, is close at hand—when we shall blush at the shameful stupidity and folly that made such words possible. Typhoid fever and diphtheria follow bad drainage just as surely as the crop of wheat follows the sowing of the seed. And if an objector urges that our grandfathers never had such difficulties, I answer that here as elsewhere "the fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge." "The mills of God grind slowly." Years may pass, even generations, before the work is done, and then a life often far dearer than our own suddenly slips away, and we sit in darkness and wonder at the mystery of life and of death. Yet escape was in our own power, and the rules which hold the secret of escape are simple and plain for all who will learn. When will this be believed, and is there any chance that some school of the future will make their knowledge of as much importance as the first principles of arithmetic or facility in analyzing a sentence?

At a time when the diplomatic situation in Europe is perpetually "strained," it is impossible for the thoughtful observer to consider the question of armaments and not wonder what it is all coming to. The latest official figures give in round numbers an aggregate of 11,365,000 men for the war footing of the six great powers of Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Austria-Hungary and Russia. Add to these the navies (173,000 men), and the grand total foots up 11,538,000 men. These are, to some extent, "paper" figures; but the regular or standing armies are enough to appall a political economist of frugal mind. Austria-Hungary has 289,190 men in her regular force, France, 502,765; Germany, 445,402; Great Britain, 131,636; Italy, 736,502, and Russia, 974,771, without counting the navies. It has been suggested, half in jest perhaps, that these powers would find it to their interest to set apart a neutral territory, some ten miles square, on the borders of which each should be entitled to maintain a thousand picked men, subject to the inspection of an international commission. In case of war between any two or more of the powers interested, each should put its men in array, and, at a signal, open the campaign, operations to be confined to the neutral territory as specified, and the war there fought out to the bitter end. This would give each nation a chance to select its soldiers and train them with the utmost care, and the nation with the greatest resources would presumably have the best chance to secure superior material. The expense would, of course, be reduced far below present figures, private property would be secured against the wholesale destruction of a general campaign, and war would be stripped of half its horrors. A natural concomitant of such an arrangement would be of course the erection of towers of observation along the borders of the neutral tract wherever observers who chose to take the risk of stray long-range projectiles could "see the fun" at so much per head. No doubt expenses could be to a great extent defrayed by selling season-tickets and choice proscenium boxes, as it were, at fancy prices. The question of naval armaments would be even simpler, for a total tonnage might be allowed to each power joining the international convention, with a limited number of men and a specified weight of metal for armament. Presumably not more than two of the high contracting powers would go to war at one time; but in case of a general "unpleasantness," what could be simpler than to adopt the plan followed by rival colleges in the matter of football and other games—play off, or in this case fight off the ties. Seriously, however, the idea is not without a germ of common sense, and, next to an international court of arbitration in perpetuo, the plan seems the simplest and most humane that has yet been devised.

THERE is something very pathetic in the story published in the present number of THE CONTINENT entitled "A Letter to Eva," when it is known that the author is totally blind. The unconscious importance attached to qualities of voice, to the sounds of nature, to the sense of touch, have their significance, and references to the remembered loveliness of color and form all gain new force when this is known. It is interesting also to know that the author in his infancy inspired Mrs. Mulock Craik to write her fine lyric, quoted in all the books of selected poetry, and beginning:—

"Look at me with thy large brown eyes,
Philip my king!
Round whom the empurpling shadow lies
Of babyhood's royal dignities.
Lay on my neck thy tiny hand
With love's invisible sceptre laden;
I am thine Esther to command,
Till thou shalt find a queen handmaiden,
Philip my king!"

It may not be inappropriate to quote here the following lines, lately written for "The Critic" by Margaret J. Preston:

TO PHILIP BOURKE MARSTON.

They tell us thou art he, about whose brow,
In cradle years, a poet twined the lays
Through which she glorified, in poet's phrase,
Those splendid eyes, that forced her to avow
Heart-fealty to thee, her liege, and bow
Before thy regal looks, with regal praise
Of more enduring freshness than the bays
Which blatant crowds bind for their heroes now.
Had she prevision that above those eyes
God meant to press His hand, the better so
To cage the lark-like spirit, lest it soar
So deep into the blue inviolate skies
That earthly listeners, standing far below,
Should fail to catch the ethereal music more?

MARGARET J. PRESTON.

ANY one whose opinion is worth consulting at all, would, if he could, place liquor beyond the reach of those upon whom it works mischief. That is to say, every sensible man is theoretically in favor of prohibition, however much he may question the practical utility of prohibitory laws. That such laws have worked well under certain exceptionally favorable conditions, is true, but it is equally true that in most cases their efficient enforcement has proved impracticable. The existence of any law is justified only by the possibility of its enforcement, and where such enforcement is impossible any law becomes at once worse than useless, for it provokes popular contempt. One such law weakens all others, by suggesting that they too may be broken with impunity. Mr. Henry Hitchcock recently delivered an address at St. Louis, before the State Bar Association, which brings together, in a compact form, the legislation of different states on this vital question. Iowa passed the most sweeping enactment in the shape of a constitutional amendment, absolutely forbidding the manufacture or sale of any intoxicating liquor within her limits, and travelers on through lines of railroad have had the satisfaction, or otherwise, of seeing posted in palace cars, and at railway restaurants, notices to the effect that liquors cannot be had. One of the state courts, however, pronounced the amendment unconstitutional on technical grounds, and its decision is now confirmed on appeal by the State Supreme Court. In Mississippi the sale of liquor has been prohibited in fifty different towns. One county permits the sale of malt liquors alone, while another allows liquors of any kind to be sold in only one of its towns. Another act curiously permits the sale of liquor within a radius of seven miles of two specified churches, whose denomination, by the way, it would be interesting to ascertain. So it is with other territories and districts within the state. In South Carolina a similar set of provisions subsists, with special laws for certain localities, while a general statute provides for a local option vote in any city, town or village, a majority to decide on "license" or "no license," but exempting from prohibition in any event domestic wine sold by the gallon. This, by the way, would seem to indicate an approach to the "town-meeting" idea of New England—certainly a most desirable innovation. In Kentucky special acts regulate the sale of liquors in the different counties, as in the two states just named; and, in some instances, public sentiment has changed, local prohibitory laws having been repealed presumably in accordance with a change of opinion on the part of the people. In Texas a local option law has been in force for some time, and was slightly amended in 1881. In Ohio the "Pond Law," imposing a heavy tax on dealers, was overruled as unconstitutional, being in conflict with the general prohibition of licenses. Another law prohibited Sunday sales wherever liquor was sold on week-days, but this is understood to have proved a dead letter. In Massachusetts the license law has lately been made more stringent, in prophetic anticipation, perhaps, of General Butler's accession to the Governorship; and Connecticut has a "license or no license" law, dependent upon the vote of town meetings. Here, too, the seller is made responsible for damage done by men made drunk on his premises, and sales to habitual drunkards, minors, or persons already intoxicated, are made punishable according to the gravity of the offense. It is evident from all these scraps of legislation, that interest in the liquor question is active in widely-separated sections of the Union, and the inference is certainly fair that contempt for drunkenness and active pity for its victims is gaining ground in quarters hitherto indifferent, if not rather inclined to favor free liquor. This feeling must tell for the advancement of the temperance cause whatever existing local laws may be, and it is upon the growth of this that the friends of moderation may most surely base their hopes of reform. The formation of anti-treating clubs and of associations whose members pledge themselves against "perpendicular drinking," point in the same direction, and are to be highly commended, so far as they go, to discourage tipping at the bars of drinking-places. Upon the whole, if we look back fifty years, and take into the account the vast increase of population, the temperance outlook is by no means discouraging. Even in England, where prohibitory laws are unknown, the spread of intelligence has exerted a well-defined influence on the sales of liquor, as indicated in the tax list. Men who are not altogether bad sometimes get drunk; a great many strictly temperate men sometimes drink and never get drunk. The former class will be very apt to stop short of inebriation when it dawns upon them that a glass too much renders them objects of thorough-going contempt and pity even to their friends and boon companions.

EVERY reader who takes up the latest volume in the "American Statesmen Series," and recalls the fact that mere details of personality are out of order, save as they bear upon the political life and work of the subject chosen,¹ will feel a hearty sympathy for the biographer. John Randolph overrides all laws and all theories, precisely as he overrode them in life; and, repress all gossip and anecdote rigorously as one may, the aggressive, penetrating, dominant personality has it way. The high-pitched voice sounds again, and the long forefinger points in the face or emphasizes a threat against this would-be dispassionate and certainly supercilious narrator. Mr. Adams has had a difficult task, and he has addressed himself to it in a manner that recalls Justice Maule's summing up of Lord Westbury, as one that would be "offensive in Almighty God addressing a black beetle." Poor Andrew Jackson was kicked like a football through the pages wherein Professor Sumner gave his views of that period in American statesmanship, or the want of it, and the same method is followed, and with even greater energy, by Mr. Adams. The book, however, is a very striking one, and we have seldom had a clearer or stronger picture of the opposing forces at work in the troubled beginning of the century almost ended. Those who have read the brilliant chapter on colonial Virginia, in Professor Moses Coit Tyler's "History of American Literature," will note the similarity of deduction in the present biography where the same topic is treated. Professor Tyler's work is a singularly sympathetic, yet profound analysis of the spirit of the time, the mould into which through every natural cause it was finally run, and the inevitable effects of causes unseen and unfelt consciously by those they influenced, but plain to-day to the clear-eyed student of the past.

Had John Randolph been born to a quieter time, and amid influences that would have repressed instead of stimulating his lawless and passionate nature, he might easily, with his ardent loyalty, his strong affection and his equal power of inspiring affection, have become the statesman he fancied himself. But from beginning to end of the stormy and bitter life, every circumstance seemed against him. With the theories of Rousseau, and fond of calling himself "l'ami des noirs," he was a provincial despot, exquisitely courteous when it suited his mood, inexpressibly brutal when it did not. Education might have given him some power of self-government, but education in any real sense he never had. He grew up among old English classics, and much of his brilliant and forcible style came from intimate knowledge of their contents; but he absorbed their worst elements also, and in his coarsest and most vulgar moods had always something apt to quote in justification.

The dread of "National Sovereignty" filled many minds in the critical period when government was still an experiment. Against such sovereignty Jefferson thundered, and Randolph, who came into public life in the midst of this struggle, was for a time one of the President's chief agents in the attacks upon the Supreme Court, which was considered the most dangerous element in the new system. Out of this terror sprung the State-rights party, and Randolph remained through life a fanatic on this point, and, as Mr. Adams remarks, "he played tricks with his hobby until his best friends were weary and disgusted." To him rather than Calhoun must be given the leadership which ended in making states' rights and slavery inseparable. He "sketched out and partly filled in the outlines of that political scheme over which Calhoun labored so long, and against which Clay strove successfully while he lived—the identification of slavery with states' rights. All that was ablest and most masterly, all except what was mere metaphysical rubbish, in Calhoun's statesmanship had been suggested by Randolph years before Calhoun began his states' rights career. Randolph discovered and mapped out from beginning to end a chart of the whole course on which the slave power was to sail to its destruction." Nothing sadder, nothing more impressive has been known in the story of lives than the waste and misuse of power, the final defeat and the soured and evil later days of a man who threw away opportunities and rejected counsel with a fatuity that brought the natural consequences of folly. Mr. Adams' summary is picturesque and painful. The whole book is a strong and valuable contribution to political history, and will give a clearer idea of the time than many more pretentious ones.

(1) JOHN RANDOLPH. By Henry Adams. American Statesmen Series. 16mo, $1.25. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

On the whole, it is also just. Randolph chose to shroud his real inner life in mystery. In the end aspiration and any faith had left him, and whether the sensational story of his final remorse be true or not, it is a life before which men must draw a curtain, and which can be justly judged only before a tribunal which sees more clearly than human eyes can, and is merciful as well as just.

"POOLE'S INDEX" is at last finished in its new and revised edition, just issued by J. R. Osgood & Co., and makes a bulky volume of fifteen hundred pages, every one of them invaluable to the student or literary man.

THE library and art collections of Dr. John Brown, the author of "Rab and His Friends," are to be sold, and will thus be scattered broadcast, following the fate of most literary men's possessions. The sale is to take place in Edinburgh.

THE Art Interchange is doing most excellent work, not only in its own special field, but in its department of book criticism, which is exceptionally bright and keen. Whether there is room for one or two other art journals which have just sent out specimen numbers remains to be seen.

"THE VOYAGE OF THE VEGA," by Baron Nordenskjöld, published by Macmillan & Co., has been translated into eleven different languages, and its interest is likely to remain a permanent one, as the Vega is the only ship that has ever accomplished the Northeast passage.

ALL who have watched the progress of the brilliant New York literary fortnightly, The Critic, will welcome its change to a weekly form. Incisive as its judgments are, there is none of the pragmatism and bitter tone which has distinguished one, at least, of our weekly critical journals, and there is every indication of a successful future.

MR. CHARLES READE, who is usually in far too dead earnest to descend to puns or any light use of the English language, is credited by a London story-teller with at least one lapse. Once upon a time "Ouida," it is said, asked him to suggest a name for her new pet dog. "Tonic," quoth he instant; "for it is sure to be a mixture of bark, steel and whine."

THE final volume of Mr. Froude's series, "Short Studies on Great Subjects," has just appeared, and he makes the statement that a unity of purpose is present throughout, all the essays having a reference more or less direct to the problems by which the present generation have been most perplexed. By way of lightening these rather heavy labors, he contributed a story for the Christmas supplement of an English periodical.

THOSE who have enjoyed Mr. W. J. Linton's "Golden Apples of Hesperus," the dainty little collection of poems not to be found in other anthologies, will welcome its revision and enlargement under the title of "Rare Poems of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries; a Supplement to the Anthologies." It is possible that some readers may object to the frank earthliness of some of the selections, but if there is license, it is certainly what one of our most honored critics has called "clean dirt." It is a book for poets, and though there is here and there a grossness unpleasant to the nineteenth century ear, it is infinitely higher and better than the morbid and sickly feeling of the Swinburne school, while many of the poems are so exquisite as to make one wonder why they have been so long neglected. (16mo, pp. 264, $2.00; Roberts Brothers, Boston).

MR. D. L. HOLBROOK, of New York, known as a very careful and thorough writer and investigator in matters of hygiene, is becoming equally known as one of the foremost students in microscopic science. At the last meeting of the American Society of Microscopists at Elmira, N. Y., two papers were read by him, which have since been put into pamphlet form—one on "The Structure of the Muscles of the Lobster," the other on "The Termination of the Nerves in the Liver." This last treats of a subject very little understood in the profession, and has attracted wide attention among anatomists.

It is possible that the six "New Arabian Nights," recently published by J. B. Lippincott & Co., are from the Arabian, but let no one credit them to Scherezade. If she had launched forth on their inconsequent, unmeaning marvels, she would most speedily have joined the vast caravan of her predecessors. Not even a sultan could with patience have endured these tales of genii and of princes who hurry from one absurdity to another, until the tale becomes a handful of beads unstrung. That Lane and Galland omitted them from their collections is to their credit, and the stories are to Sinbad and Aladdin what the "Gospel of Mary" is to St. Matthew. (8vo, cloth, pp. 390, $1.50).

AN Art Students' League has been organized in Cincinnati, under the able direction of Mr. Matt Morgan, which includes many points that may be copied to advantage by other cities. The plan embraces not only stated classes for which studios have been arranged with every facility for costume life-study, but lectures on artistic anatomy two weeks in a month, and on perspective and architecture the remaining two, the fee for these advantages being but five dollars a month. A European scholarship, to be the prize to whoever paints the best original picture from a given subject, is also offered, and there seems every prospect that Cincinnati will do for art what she has already done for music.

WE are threatened with another edition of Shakspeare, if, indeed, we can have too many—this time with a German editor, Professor Delius, of Bonn—which will be issued by Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co. "Professor Delius asserts an inveterate skepticism as to those outward allusions which so many diligent commentators have detected in the plays, and, except where they may be looked upon as self-evident, he ignores them altogether in determining the date of composition. He rejects the theory that Shakspeare ever re-wrote his plays, and refuses to acknowledge the handiwork of any other author except in 'Timon,' 'Pericles,' and the prologues to 'Troilus and Cressida' and 'King Henry VIII.'"

A NEW venture in journalism is always a problem, not only to publishers, but to public, the field being already overcrowded; but the rather stale adage that "there is always room at the top," holds good in this as in every other case, and thus The Builder, owned by Clark Bryan & Co., of Holyoke, Mass., and edited by Mr. E. C. Gardner, already known to readers of THE CONTINENT as one of the best, perhaps the best, authorities on building in this country, begins with almost a certainty of success. It covers sanitary ground also, as all true building should, and general hints in many directions, all of such value that the paper should at once take the place it deserves as something "no family should be without."

MISS EMMA LAZARUS has become well known to magazine readers through short poems of a good deal of power and feeling. The present collection, "Songs of a Semite," published at the office of The American Hebrew, New York, is made up of a historical tragedy in five acts, entitled "The Dance to Death," and various translations and adaptations from the Spanish. The tragedy is simply a blood-curdling record of a persecution of the Jews. The "Songs" hold, many of them, deep religious feeling, and the whole has interest as a work essentially and almost aggressively Hebrew in spirit and purpose, but with a power and originality that deserves better setting than is given in the cheap form in which it appears. (Paper, pp. 80, 50 cents).

ONE of the most amusing of the many books for children produced for the holiday season is Gautier's "My Household of Pets" (16mo, pp. 132, $1.25), Roberts Brothers, Boston, translated by Susan Coolidge. The work is gracefully done, and the history of the many pets, chiefly cats, will delight every child, as well as the elders who may be called upon to read it to them. "Two Tea-Parties," by Rosalie Vanderwater ($2.00), is another of the profusely illustrated and delightful books for children issued by Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co.; a larger one, made up also with illuminated covers, being "Happy Little People," by Olive Patch (pp. 176, $1.75). This last is intended for older children than the previous one, and is simply but very pleasantly written.

THE New York business man whose home is in "Jersey," and who rushes in the afternoon down Barclay street for a "train-boat," is tolerably certain, if he has a garden, to stop, as spring approaches, and look into the windows of No. 34, where for years Bliss & Co. have shown their tempting array of everything the gardener can want, from a paper of seed up to a hand-wheel cultivator. The catalogue for 1883, recently issued, is not only a neat and attractive piece of work, typographically considered, but a guide to be relied upon implicitly, years of experience having made the firm an authority more and more valued by every one who has ever had occasion to need their services.

WHERE full and minute detail of ancient peoples and systems is required, nothing can take the place of Rawlinson's work in this direction, and no library can be considered well-furnished which does not possess his "Oriental Monarchies." A new edition of his "Seventh Monarchy" has lately been brought out by Dodd & Mead, the two handsome volumes being an American reprint from American plates of the English edition of 1875. The illustrations and notes are given in full. One may occasionally wish for a little better management of the profuse material, or for more grace of style, but, as a whole, the books have a permanent and solid value, and the present edition is not only most attractively made up, but exceedingly low in price. The reading community owe Dodd & Mead a debt for this combination of typographical excellence and cheapness. (2 vols., 8vo, pp. 338-351, $6.00).

THE Museum of Kew has recently been enriched by a very fine collection of Japanese lacquer-work. The collection, which was obtained especially for the museum by the acting consul at Hakodate, under instructions from H. M. charge d'affaires at Tokio, is extremely complete, and illustrates the whole process of manufacture. Thus, for instance, there are specimens of the trunk of the varnish tree, showing the deep cuts through the bark, made in a horizontal manner and close together, by a sharp, gouge-like instrument, which is also shown, as well as several other instruments used in various branches of the collection of the lacquer or its preparation. There is also a neatly-made pot for holding the lacquer as collected, constructed from a simple joint of a large bamboo stem; a large series of lacquer as collected from the stems or as prepared, and a complete set of tools, such as fine and coarse brushes, made of human hair, rat's hair, etc.; spatulas, burnishers, and a series of colors used in decoration. Besides these there is a very fine and instructive series of lacquer-work, from the earliest stages to the most highly-finished examples, some of which are of great age, one, for example, being one hundred and twenty years old, and of exquisite workmanship. The processes through which good lacquer-work passes are both tedious and numerous; the results, however, are wonderful accuracy in every detail, many of the designs, especially those representing plants and flowers, being worked with so much care as to be in many cases botanically correct; this is particularly the case with the gold-work on wood, both flattened and raised. The collection is all the more valuable because it is said that good lacquer-work is becoming more and more scarce, the demand for cheap articles in the European markets being so great as to induce lacquer-workers to turn their attention to the class of goods which meets with a ready sale, to the neglect of the more costly, and, consequently, more carefully wrought. The value of the collection is also increased from the fact that a very elaborate account accompanies them descriptive of the collection of the juice from the varnish-trees, its subsequent manipulation and final application.

MR. THOMAS MEEHAN has remarked that Audubon, Nuttall, Wilson and other eminent ornithologists have suggested that the seasons had evidently not so much to do with the migrations of birds as the question of food, though most authors connected this question of food with the autumn or winter season. He had recently observed the migration of the robin in great numbers during the ten days prior to August 1, or on the evenings of those days, for the flight was from about sundown to dark. They came from the northwest and were flying southeast. Some were but a few hundred feet above him, while others were so high in the air as to be scarcely visible, which would indicate a long journey. Robins had abounded on his property in Germantown during the past spring and early summer; he might say, without exaggeration, there had been many hundreds of them. At this time it was rare to meet with one. He considered the disappearance entirely owing to the scarcity of food, as there had been no rain of any consequence for two months. For two weeks numerous trees and plants on his grounds had been kept alive by artificial waterings. Examining the dry earth after the harrow showed no signs of insect life. The cherry crop had been nearly a failure. The usual berried plants, such as dogwood, on which they usually fed, were not ripe. There was really little for them to eat, and he had reason to believe that the same conditions prevailed all over Northern Pennsylvania. In New Jersey plants with berries were ripening, as they were also farther south, and he concluded that a search for food was the cause of this early migration.

It is a marvelous circumstance that the black man of Australia should have dropped upon the same narcotic principle (nicotine) as the red man of America. Pituri is a plant of Central Australia not far removed from the tobacco plant. The leaves of the plant are chewed by the aborigines, who trade with it extensively. Chemical analysis shows that the alkaloid in which the peculiar poisonous properties depend is nicotine, the same substance to which tobacco owes its effects. Pituri is eagerly sought by the native Australians, not for the purpose of exciting their courage or combativeness, but to produce a dreamy, voluptuous sensation, such as is experienced by the opium-eater. It is often taken by the natives on their long marches to deaden the cravings of hunger and to support them under excessive fatigue.

It has long been known that the richness of the atmosphere in ammonia varies from time to time. The soil and plants absorb it. Condensation of atmospheric moisture sweeps it out of the air. These and other similar modifications have been hitherto studied only in the lower strata of the atmosphere, and whether similar causes are at play in the more elevated regions has remained a question until we now have the results of a series of observations made at the famous observatory of Nansouty, on the Pic-du-Midi, in Southern France, from which it appears that the elevation makes no difference. This result is the more remarkable in view of the almost complete absence, in these elevated regions, of nitric acid and ammonium nitrate.

DR. VICTOR BURG, distinguished as the discoverer of metallotherapy, extols the disinfectant and antiseptic properties of copper. Quoting a report made by Dr. Verneis, he remarks the fact that workers in copper, who become strongly impregnated with the metal which they constantly handle, are by this circumstance protected against the cholera. In view of this discovery the author recommends that the wood employed in the construction of hospitals should be carefully treated with copper sulphate. This ingenious suggestion may be easily submitted to the test of experiment, and is well worthy of the attention of physicians.

THE DRAMA.

MR. HAVERLY has merged "Hague's British Minstrels" in his own "Mastodon Minstrels," and the poster-writer proclaims it as "The Master Minstrel Stroke of the Great Theatrical Magistrate's Career." An impressive line truly.

HERR BARNAY, an eminent German tragedian, has appeared at the Thalia Theatre, New York, and has been received with the highest demonstrations of approval by large audiences. "Coriolanus" is Herr Barnay's favorite character.

SIGNOR SALVINI's first wife, it appears, was an actress of great power, as the Signor has lately said that since her death he had never met an actress capable of truthfully and powerfully depicting suppressed passion and emotion until he saw Miss Clara Morris' performance of "Miss Multon."

SIMULTANEOUSLY with the appearance of a leading exponent of German theatre art in New York, has been our Mr. Booth's appearance in Berlin. The press exhausted the adjectives of praise in behalf of his performance of "Hamlet." "In eloquence and gesture," says the Borren Zeitung, "Booth stands on the same level with Rossi and Salvini, and perhaps surpasses them in minute power of suggestion." The Crown Prince and Princess were present on the opening night, and the Prince attended three nights in succession.

MME. ALBANI, after an absence of seven years, has returned to join Mapleson's Opera Company. On the evening after her arrival from London, although the voyage had been an unusually tempestuous one, she sang at a concert of the Symphony Society in New York. Her voice, it seems, has matured into one of greater beauty, fullness and compass than when last heard in this country. She made her first appearance in grand opera at Chicago, and will sing at the New York Academy of Music during the spring season of opera, beginning in March.

MR. THOMAS KEENE has been receiving not a little gratuitous advertising on account of Mr. Barrett's refusing to appear in conjunction with him at the Cincinnati Dramatic Festival. It is held by Mr. Keene's manager that this refusal is owing to Mr. Barrett's fear of comparison to his (Mr. Barrett's) detriment. This can scarcely be the reason. Mr. Barrett's well-earned and assured position as an actor of rare ability and high attainments could be but little affected, no matter with whom compared. Mr. Keene has been announced for a week's engagement at the Arch Street Theatre, Philadelphia, on February 12th.

THE WRECK OF THE DOUBLE-ENDER.

It was the Double-ender hight,
 Stood looking down the hill,
 The while ten pestilent small boys
 It waited for to spill.
 All smooth and polished was its steel,
 And eke its plank was wide,
 And its steering-gear well rove withal
 Along its gleaming side.
 Light reeked those pestilent small boys,
 As they its back bestrode,
 That on the steepy mountain side
 All icy was the road.
 Down on the scene the full moon gazed,
 And through the belt of pine
 She marked full well the hidden stump
 And the coil of last year's vine,
 But she "never said nothing" to those small boys,
 As they sat there in a line.
 She "never said nothing," but well she knew
 The peril that lurked below,
 The hidden stump, and the coiling vine,
 And the rocks all hid by snow;
 But she "never said nothing" to those small boys
 That sat there in a row.
 They're off! they're off! The wild mustang
 Ne'er plied a fleetier heel;
 Their tippets red wave overhead,
 Above the flying steel;
 And the cold, cold nose of each small boy
 Is ready to congeal.
 Their faces cleave the moonlit air
 As the vessel cleaves the sea,
 And trees and fences fly them past
 Like sprites of mysteree.

The steersman grim, he set his teeth,
 And never a word spake he;
 But he braced his feet on the wooden bar
 Made out of the good oak tree.
 And he thought to himself, "There's too much weight
 On the forrard sled, I see!"
 "Hitch back! hitch back!" he cried at last,
 "Hitch back! Push off, Jim Lee!"
 They hitched them back. Alas, for Jim!
 His pants were torn from he,
 As heels-over-head away he sped
 Athwart the icy lea.

Then laughed those wicked boys aloud,
 Loud laughed they all, to hear
 The passing yell of Jimmy Lee
 All in the moonlight clear.
 But faster, faster, now they fly
 Adown the glassy slope;
 They wist not of the coiling vine,
 Nor of the trailing rope;
 Nor of the hidden stump that lay
 In wait within the shadow gray.

What darkens now the wintry sky?
 What fragments these that on the breeze
 Go drifting idly by?

The moon looks down on a silent hill,
 On a wreck of broken sleds;
 And ten small boys with aching bones,
 And broken heads and husky tones,
 Are prisoned within their respective homes,
 On their ten respective beds.

Q. E. D.

THE POET SOUL (as conceived by the Modern Bard).

Not that I love thee do I sing, O Sea!
 Thy wild, storm-driven waves that seethe and swell;
 But that they mirror (though imperfectly)
 My passions fierce and fell!
 Not that I ever loved you have I told
 Your praise, O infinite Sky! but that in thee, Perchance, as in a glass, I might behold
 My soul's immensity!

And thou, O Earth—what are thy shrieks of woe?
 Thy dissonant cries, thy murmurs of alarm,
 Thy curses, but an echo, faint and low,
 That makes more sweet my calm?
 Earth, heaven, and the watery wilderness!
 In all your mighty volume I can see
 But one vast page that serveth to express
 The universal Me!

"The tender dawn is breaking through the shadows :

Sweetheart, arise !

For see Love flies

With eager step across the bare brown meadows."

"Nay, nay—ah nay !

It is too soon :

You see the glimmer of the sinking moon—

Not rising day !"

"Ah, now indeed the sun is up and shining !

Make short your prayer ;

Look who is there

Beneath your lattice patiently reclining !"

"Ah where, ah where ?

I cannot see,

For sleep that lingers, what the wight may be—

If dark or fair."

"Put down the silken web your hands are weaving !

The noonday sun

Shines full upon

Poor weary Love, who waits and watches—griev-

"So near—so far ?

To love a maid, is that to fear her ?

How strange men are !

He should be farther still or much, much nearer !"

"But now, sweet maid, but now the twilight darkens ;

"Climb not, but wait !"

I come ! I come, beloved—late, I know—

But not too late !"

THREE KILNS—THE LARGEST IN THE WORLD.

TERRA GOTTA IN ARCHITECTURE.—II.

THE origin of the crude manufacture of terra cotta having been lost in the mazes of the past, we can only conjecture when it first lent itself to the tools of the modeler, or who first fashioned the bas-relief or bust. Cicognara, in referring to this remote date, thus alludes to a poetic legend: "Who knows how often and among how many nations may not have happened that which was related in Corinth of the potter Debutades, of Sicyon, whose daughter traced on the wall the shadow of the face of her lover, who was about to leave her, and the outline of which, filled with clay by her father, produced the first profile in bas-relief, and was baked in the furnace along with the tiles?"

It were as vain to seek the origin as to ask,

"Who tamed the first wild steed?"

Who first kindled fire?"

Primitive nations early learned the use of earthenware, which is only a coarser kind of terra cotta, which means "baked clay," as porcelain is a finer kind. By kindling fires whereon to dress their simple meals, they found the clay beneath and about them baked into a substance so hard that it served to hold food and water. Perhaps the use of clay utensils was discovered as Charles Lamb's hero discovered the flavor of roast pig—by the fiery destruction of his rough cabin.

To form a platter or dish out of a mass of clay and bake it beside the fire was an easy thing to do. And as ages passed, bringing the orderly development of arts and sciences, more elegant forms appeared, made out of finer materials, more carefully prepared and moulded.

Every well-equipped museum exhibits the ladder by which man has raised himself from the lowest round to higher and still higher refinements in the expressions of life. Each age takes the results of the past, and adding to them new discoveries and inventions, triturates still finer atoms of matter, to find within each process a higher potency still. How much thought and toil have been given, how many experiments have been made, in order to bring the clay to the requisite conditions and secure the proper cohesion and strength!

The result is something greatly superior to that anciently used, though that was durable enough to satisfy every requirement. Mr. J. J. Talbot, in "Art and Art Education," cites several instances in regard to this quality. At Buckingham Palace are several handsome vases of terra cotta supported on pedestals of Portland stone. Both are of the same age, but while the pedestals have lost the shape of their carved mouldings by the sharp tooth of time, the delicate figures and foliage upon the body of the vase are as perfect as when first exhibited. Granite mouldings more than a century old in Dublin are decaying slowly, while terra cotta in juxtaposition is unchanged.

The manufacture of this material has only been established in this country about fourteen years. Even now the only works which have furnished large and fine pieces of architectural decorations are adjacent to the great clay-bed described in the first article on this subject. They are situated in the pleasant old town of Perth Amboy, which considered itself of some importance before the settlement of New York City.

As we approach the Perth Amboy Terra Cotta Works, delightfully situated on the banks of the Kill-von-Kull, we see a whole village of buildings, which connect by means of bridges and terminate in a dock, whence finished articles are shipped to all portions of the continent. These buildings with their yards cover seven acres of ground. Above the surrounding roofs nine kilns rear their huge bulks high aloft, which, seen from within, look like enormous brick demijohns, bound with iron. They are, indeed, the largest of their kind ever constructed. Once within the enclosure we hear the steady hum of healthy and happy labor.

Following loads of buff and deep-red clay, we find it spread over great floors, where it dries before it is taken to the mill to be pulverized. To see the driving power, we enter the machinery rooms, moved by a large engine, whose dull thud throbs through a space of twenty-five by two hundred feet. The clay is then ground in what is called a "pug-mill," into which flows a stream of water just large enough to give it the desired consistency. When this clay is dried sufficiently it is cut into masses and transported into the workshops of the moulder or the studio of the modeler. In the former case, a mould is made of plaster of Paris in the ordinary manner direct from the model of the designer. Into its every crevice the clay is pressed by hand. When the piece is of sufficient size, it is hollow in the centre, and care is taken to have it of uniform thickness throughout.

But the real beauty of terra cotta consists in the ease with which it lends itself to the skill of the modeler. He can grave upon this plastic substance his grandest and broadest conceptions, and then burn them into stone. In order to do this in a fitting manner, he must be capable of great dignity and sweep of imagination. It is related at the works that unless an artist is accustomed to execute in this bold, free manner, he is a PORCH OF HISTORICAL SOCIETY, BROOKLYN.

One of the most graphic pictures shown to the visitor is the room where these moulds are made, an operation requiring much skill and dexterity. The plaster hardens so rapidly, and shrinks so much in the hardening, that a large mould is made in several pieces. Scores of men and boys flit about, working swiftly as they pour the wet plaster into forms which stiffen while they are smoothing it into shape. By these means the more common ornaments can be reproduced indefinitely, such as tiles, friezes, simple cornices and capitals.

failure here, no matter what may be his training in a more restricted style of art. The design must be viewed from a distance, and so have a symmetry of proportion not easy to attain by one who gives his chief attention to minute details, and yet he must not lose the grace and harmony of separate portions in that of the rounded whole. The illustrations given of panels and figures by Kemys and Mora, show what are the results of genuine artistic skill in colossal forms.

Whether modeled or moulded, the pieces must be dried just sufficiently to give them the right texture—too wet, and they crack in the kiln; too dry, and they crack even before burning. If the different parts of an article vary in thickness or in amount of moisture, it is liable to twist from unequal contraction. The clay shrinks also in burning about one-twelfth of its bulk. In fact, it requires the greatest skill and experience to bring everything to a successful issue and display the bas-relief as flawless and almost as clear cut as a cameo. Hence they are not clumsy craftsmen who have charge of any portion of these processes. In a number of studios, with high, northern-lighted windows, are bright-eyed men, alert with keen intelligence, who, standing before large easels supporting masses of clay, carve the bas-relief from sketches hanging above them. Said one in charge of a studio to the visitor: "We love our work; it absorbs us. It is a part of our very lives." This is the feeling of a true artist.

When dried to a certain delicate point, the pieces are taken to the kilns, within which they are carefully and laboriously packed, the smaller ones in "seggars," that is, frames of fire-clay, to hold them fast and safe. The entrances are then closed with brick and clay, and fires lighted in furnaces underneath.

And such fires! they seem gateways of Tophet! We watch a kiln fed through its twenty voracious mouths with great lumps of coal which are devoured with ceaseless roar. Fierce, wild, glorious fires! We gaze into a light almost as blinding as that of the sun from which it borrowed incandescence, and in its white heat, realize not only the tremendous energy of elemental forces, but the truth of that purification which comes by fire, dispelling all that is extraneous, and leaving only the real and permanent. It gives one a sense of the feebleness of man's efforts when once this fiendish beauty slips the leash that chains it to comfort and safety. But it is well bound; swarthy men, day and night, flit from door to door, feeding the fiery dragons and clanking the irons that hold them fast. For a few days they give the monsters all that is needed to fuse the damp clay in their mighty fastnesses into the semblance of a rock, more enduring even than that molten by the fervent heat evolved by nature's primeval forces.

And then the fires go down; the mighty mass slowly parts with its intense caloric; the door is broken open, and the finished ornaments carefully withdrawn. In spite of all the trouble that has been expended, a percentage is ruined by unequal contraction or by cracking. The charging and uncharging of the kiln has been a labor of great nicety, and sometimes, if the pieces are large, of danger. After cooling, the articles are ready for shipping.

Such, in brief, is the story of the production of a material the use of which is yet hardly begun. All over the congeries of buildings which have grown up within a recent date, in answer to the demands of the age, we witness the various stages of labor in which Use wreaths itself with the blossoms of Beauty. Old, dead mineral débris, the dust or mud under our feet, is mixed, ground, moistened, carved and baked, till, by the informing power of man, shaping a form which first existed within his own imagination, the ideal becomes the real. It is forced, therefore, to express his science, his art, his sense of fitness, of harmony and refinement, until it is an embodiment of the wit and wisdom of the century. The use of this material in the United States dates back only a short period; its growth is coincident with that of the pottery which has been described. Tiles, fire-brick and simple ornaments are furnished by potteries in Ohio, Massachusetts, New Jersey and on Long Island; the best clay comes from the bed at Perth Amboy. Its revival as an architectural decoration has begun, and architects are now introducing it into plans of public buildings. As our people learn to appreciate artistic beauty, in place of the merely stereotyped and meretricious, there can be no doubt that some material of this kind will be found to vary the monotony of brick, brown-stone and marble.

Among buildings already completed or soon to be finished, in which terra cotta from the Perth Amboy works is freely employed are the Scofield Building, Cleveland, Ohio; the Buffalo Board of Trade, Buffalo, N. Y.; the Capitol at Albany; the hall of the Long Island Historical Rooms, in Brooklyn; the Pennsylvania Railroad Station, in Philadelphia, and the Metropolitan Opera House, now in process of construction in New York City. The entire walls of the latter will be of the same material, in light buff, with four panels over the main entrance, representing pairs and groups of youths singing and dancing, with various instruments of music. The Pension Building, at Washington, D. C., an immense structure, will soon be built, also of brick and terra cotta. The plans show it will be one of the noblest projected structures of the country.

The greatest use of this material as a decoration in architecture, however, which has yet been made here, is in the Produce Exchange of New York City. This magnificent gateway through which the tides of commerce ceaselessly ebb and flow, will not be finished before the spring of 1883, if as soon as that. Yet, through the courtesy of the Building Committee of the Exchange, of the

In the address of the Hon. A. S. Sullivan at the laying of the corner-stone of the Exchange, June 6th, 1882, the following sentences occur: "The structure which is to crown these foundations will work an epoch in the advance of art in our beloved city. New York should have no honors so costly but she will lay them at the feet of architects who will build the city up to the finest conceptions of use and beauty." It is of interest, then, to describe the edifice in which it is soon to be established. In dimensions this structure will cover a parallelogram of about one hundred and fifty by three hundred feet, and will be, when finished, one hundred and twelve feet in height. It is situated on the southeastern or lower corner of Whitehall and Beaver Streets. With its site it will cost $3,000,000.

In style of architecture the building is a modified Renaissance, fireproof in construction, being made of brick, stone, iron and terra cotta. The tower on the southeast will be two hundred and forty feet in height. The main exchange room is one hundred and fifty by two flour, provisions, petroleum, lard, naval stores, maritime affairs, lighterage, butter, cheese, oils and distilled spirits. Each of these trades has rules regarding its transactions, respecting which the committee in charge decide all minor disputes. The Arbitration Committee settles more important cases; its power is equal to that of the Supreme Court, but from its judgments there is no appeal.

tions in terra cotta from the Perth Amboy manufactory which has been described. These, when practicable, are characteristic of the objects to which the structure is devoted. In the frieze of the main-story cornice, consisting of renaissance scroll-work, are introduced colossal heads of American animals, two of which are given in illustration. The seals of the thirty-three states of the Union, in high relief, and four and a half feet in diameter, decorate the spandrels between the main-story windows. These are all executed by Mora. Besides, this material is employed in bases, capitals, arches of windows and doorways, cornices and mouldings—about twenty-four thousand separate pieces in all.

The question of a proper building material for a rapidly increasing population is now before the public. Monarchs of the forest, the results of the slow growth of leisurely ages, which so long proudly sheltered countless acres of virgin soil, fall in serried ranks before the woodman's axe, while no skill can increase the measured growth of their successors. The treeless prairies of the West slowly robe themselves in garments of waving green. Meanwhile the swiftly-gathering settlers cannot delay, and art must supersede the slow processes of Nature. Then, too, the fierce conflagrations to which wooden buildings are subject, exciting horror at past calamities and apprehension for future ones, teach the absolute necessity of fire-proof substances. Iron, stone, brick and terra cotta offer themselves as substitutes for wood, and each has its special claims to merit. In case of the latter, they have been proven in the remains of edifices constructed more than twenty centuries ago.

There is no question but we are at the beginning of an era in which this art industry will be employed in untold ways and forms; for the dignity of a great race demands that its power shall be conserved and directed broad and shallow, following the configuration of a continent of magnificent distances. It now gathers itself up, however, for better work—work whose permanence shall finally equal its excellence.

What it shall do is better than hath been.
Slow grows the splendid pattern that it weaves into channels commensurate with its resources. As a nation waxes strong, it seeks expression in forms of art grand and inspiring as its genius can evolve. Every movement exhibits not only its present condition, but its lines of thought and aspiration. In this country, shoddy textures and materials are passing away with the youthfulness which gave them creation and furnished their apology. The era of the cheap, the flimsy, the gaudy in constructive material, as well as in vesture and decoration, is gradually disappearing with American immaturity. The spirit of the age, unquenchable as volcanic fires, deepens. Heretofore it was naturally

HEAD OF BUFFALO—NEW YORK PRODUCE EXCHANGE.

The result of this slow growth will be artistic, as well as enduring. The love of building, which man shares with the ant and the beaver, has grown from an instinct into an intuition, in which his love of proportion, of harmony and of beauty is the measure of his unfolding.

The love of the permanent will gradually take the place of that feverish thirst for change which is now so generally characteristic of us as a people. The spirit which now pushes westward in search of the new, will lose its force in the more settled parts of the country, and our restless lives may absorb some elements of peace.

With the accumulation of wealth and consequent leisure, man will gather the products of the far ends of the earth; metals, curiously carved and beaten; precious stones and gems, cut by cunning workmen. Especially will he delight in those various forms of terra cotta and porcelain, which so readily obey the imagination and skill of the designer. In proportion to his development he will seek original forms, both in decoration and architecture. For he cannot be trammelled by the genius of the past, that brilliant beacon set in a vanishing twilight. As the morning breaks, ushering in a fuller, richer civilization, utility at first clamors for universal service. Under her reign inventions decrease labor while they increase its results.

Soon beauty comes forward to lend her grace and witchery to soften the crudities of her predecessor, and social life grows rounded and harmonious. Private dwellings and public edifices alike become visible signs of the habits, the refinements, and even the religion of their builders.

To-day the use of a plastic material in these new and magnificent structures is significant of increased freedom, variety and picturesque effect. All prophecies indicating the future of our continent, the magnitude of its commerce, the variety of its manufactures, the productiveness of its soil, the grandeur of its scenery, the wealth which it must aggregate, point to a period wherein elegant culture will be diffused throughout a cosmopolitan nation. Its architecture, then, while embodying those classic laws which underlie all true expressions of art, must finally be adapted to our habits, our needs, our climate and our civilization.

A BIT OF POTTERY.

THE potter stood at his daily work,
One patient foot on the ground;
The other with never slackening speed
Turning his swift wheel round.
Silent we stood beside him there,
Watching the restless knee,
Till my friend said low, in pitying voice,
"How tired his foot must be!"

The potter never paused in his work,
Shaping the wondrous thing;
'Twas only a common flower-pot,
But perfect in fashioning.
Slowly he raised his patient eyes,
With homely truth inspired:
"No, marm; it isn't the foot that kicks;
The one that stands gets tired!"

ALICE WELLINGTON ROLLINS.

THE BRIDE OF SAINT ANTONIO.

BY LIZZIE W. CHAMPNEY.

VERILY believe that St. Antonio is the St. Valentine of you Portuguese," said Margaret Andrews carelessly, as the pretty peasant maid, Leonilla Felicidade, finished another of her marvelous stories of her favorite saint. "When I was in Padua I found St. Antonio claimed as an Italian, but I learn now that he was a Lisboner."

"Yes, dear lady, St. Antonio does indeed belong to us Portuguese, for he is one of us. He was born in Lisbon, and went as a missionary to Morocco; but his health failed in the land of the Moors and he took ship to return to Portugal. The winds were contrary, and he was carried on to Italy, where he found the people so much worse heathen than the Moors that he remained to preach to them. St. Antonio of Padua, indeed! The Paduans have only their wickedness to boast that our countryman ever remained a day with them.

"The young girls of Portugal are his especial care. It is he who provides good husbands for those who make pilgrimages in his honor, or wear little medals consecrated to him, or place a lighted candle on his shrine on the eve of his fête. And those who are destined to an early grave, for whom there is no earthly bridegroom, he graciously betroths to himself, appearing to them in person; and they are so filled with admiration of his celestial beauty that henceforward they are in haste to be gone. So that no lover on earth, be he prince or emperor, can keep them from their spiritual spouse. He is as brave, too, as he is kind. He fought for us in the last war with the Spanish. He was a captain in one of our regiments," she added, as she noticed the look of amused incredulity in Margaret's eyes. "Oh! it is all certified and sworn to—it is incontestably true. He was a gallant officer, and was always polite to the ladies. He never caused a tear either by rudeness or too much kindness. He never intoxicated himself, or pilfered or gambled. He was a model gentleman. You can see it in the army records. Such captains as he are rare; it was no wonder that they set it down."

And Margaret, to her surprise, found afterwards that the simple girl had not overstated the facts. One of the certificates which she discovered was so naïf that I cannot resist quoting it here:

"I attest and certify" (wrote Don Hercules Antonio Carlos Luiz Joseph Maria de Albuquerque e Arango de Magalhaens Homem, nobleman, knight, major, etc., etc., etc., a gentleman whose names and titles are not more numerous than those of many a modern Portuguese) "that the Lord St. Antonio, otherwise the great Saint Antonio of Lisbon (commonly and falsely called of Padua), has been enlisted and had a place in this regiment ever since the 24th of January of the year of our Lord Jesus Christ 1668. The said Saint Antonio gave for his caution and surety the Queen of Angels, who became answerable that he would not desert his colors, but behave always like a good soldier in the regiment. On the 12th of September, 1683, his majesty promoted Saint Antonio to the rank of captain, for having, a short time before, valiantly put himself at the head of a detachment of the regiment and beat off a strong body of Castilians, four times the number of the said detachment, which body had been set in ambush for them, with the intention of carrying them all prisoners to Badajos.

"I do further certify that in all the above papers and registers there is not any note of Saint Antonio of bad behavior or irregularity committed by him, nor of his having ever been flogged, imprisoned or any way punished by his officers while a private in his regiment, and in every other respect he has always behaved like a gentleman; and, on all the above-mentioned accounts, I hold him most worthy and deserving of the rank of aggregate major to our regiment. In testimony whereof, I have hereto signed my name the 25th day of March, of the year of our Lord 1777.

"MAGALHAENS HOMEM."

"He was a sweet gentleman," sighed Leonilla. "Only look at the sacred image of him in the Church of the Holy Martyrs, and tell me if you ever saw a more beautiful young man."

The image was of wax, and represented St. Antonio, as so many other images scattered through Spain and Portugal do, as a comely young man, in the garb of a Franciscan friar. A plaited cord fills the double office of scourge and girdle. The tonsured head is shapely, and the face full of intelligence and amiability. With one arm he sustains the Infant Jesus, and in the disengaged hand he holds a stalk of lilies.

"So St. Antonio is your beau idéal of manly beauty?" queried Margaret. "Is there, perchance, some sturdy peasant of the Minho, with a face like his, who has stolen away your guileless little heart?"

"Oh, no," replied Leonilla, with charming unconsciousness. "José Plácido Barbosa does not at all resemble the sweet St. Antonio. I wish he did."

In spite of this suggestion of a longing not quite satisfied, Leonilla was reasonably proud of José Plácido. Lethargic and good-tempered, his name seemed peculiarly appropriate, for no more placid countenance or more trustful disposition could be imagined. He trudged sturdily beside his ox-cart, conveying loads of garden produce to Oporto, traveling by night, so as to offer his merchandise fresh at the markets in the early morning, and reclining uneasily in his rude wagon while the oxen crept patiently homeward in the blistering glare of the next day. Night or noon the ear-piercing shriek of the ungreased axles announced his progress, like the warning whistle of an express train. José was attached to the sound. It was the voice of his faithful cart. It gave a sense of companionship to his lonely journeying, and he would not on any account have silenced it. There was a popular notion, too, that it scared the wolves, and that one was safer at night when guarded by the frightful sound. On a sunny slope of the Gerez chain José had a hut of his own, where his old mother sat and spun and wove, and dug, too, in the scrap of a garden, which was given mostly to flowers, not from any preference for their beauty, but for the sake of the bees. It was a picturesque nook, and they were well-to-do peasants. At the market in Oporto José had met with Leonilla, the daughter of other peasants from the wine district. He had wooed her first with admiring glances as he leaned both arms on one of his great yellow oxen; later by gifts of little jars of honey and with enormous and hideous bouquets of flaring dahlias. He brought his mother in his cart one day, and both of Leonilla's parents came down the Douro in a boat laden with casks of the new vintage. The old people wrangled about the matter all the morning in the market, while José Plácido and Leonilla Felicidade wandered into the Cathedral, and each held a candle at the funeral of some rich man, unknown to either of them. The beadle had any quantity of candles, and he beckoned to all who loitered by to come in and add to the prestige of the funeral. They were a little awe-struck by the mummery of pretentious religion, and by the greater majesty and mystery of death, and when they came back to the old people, and found that none of the merchandise was sold, but that they were formally betrothed, the ceremony at the church seemed to them a part of the transaction; and, to add to its sacredness, José always kept the end of the burned candle. It should finish burning, so he said, at his own funeral, and, meantime, it was a witness to his betrothal to and love for Leonilla.

They were to be married, so the elders had decided, as soon as a good vintage allowed a sufficient dowry, and as soon as José's mother could weave enough linen for a good household outfit. José's mother had spun and woven slowly at first, for she was jealous of a rival in her son's affection. But age was stealing on, and she confessed to herself now that a daughter-in-law would be an acceptable boon.

There could hardly be imagined a greater contrast between two agreeable girls than that which existed between Leonilla and her young mistress. The one credulous, naïf, affectionate; the other haughty, cultured and brilliant, and both distractingly beautiful and pure as pearls. At least, this was what Henry Jackson thought concerning them, and Mr. Jackson was, to Margaret, at least, an authority on nearly every subject. He was an Englishman, but had resided in Oporto for the past three years in the interest of a London wine-importing company. The Andrews had met him four years before in London, and, though the acquaintance at that time had been slight, he had some way established himself with them on the familiar footing of an old friend. He was so thoroughly well informed in all the customs of the country; he made himself so useful to them in various ways, that Mr. Andrews hailed his appearance as a godsend. It was he who advised Margaret to engage the services of a maid, and who drew her attention to Leonilla, the prettiest peasant girl in the Oporto markets.

"She will help you acquire this unimaginably difficult language," he had argued, "and she will explain all the pretty customs and legends of the mountains while you are in the Minho."

And so it had been decided that Leonilla should accompany the Andrews on their tour through the north of Portugal. She was all the more willing to do so that several weeks of the time were to be spent at Bom Jesus do Monte, a famous resort not far from José's home, and one of the most charmingly grotesque places in the world.

High up in the mountains above the ancient city of Braza, an archbishop of Froissart's time, or thereabouts, conceived the idea of founding a Mecca for pious pilgrims. Shrines, hermitages, hospedarias sprang up at the word of the holy man; the Pope sent dispensations, the worldly built lodging-houses, and laid out gardens, dancing pavilions, lakes and boats, band-stands for open-air concerts, and other amusements. Fashionables flocked from the heated cities, where the air lay baked and lifeless, to this charming mountain resort, and the good archbishop forbade them not, but obligingly gathered in the gold they brought and continued his work of making the mountain the eighth wonder of the world. From the foot to the top an elaborate and ingenious via crucis was designed. The pilgrim proceeded on foot, either alone or making one of a procession along a series of inclined planes and up an ornate grand staircase to the principal church, pausing, however, as he went to offer prayer before each of the fourteen chapels which divided the way. Allegorical statues representing Old Testament worthies looked down benignantly from each angle of the staircase; and fountains illustrative of every Christian virtue gushed clear and sweet on every terrace. The way was shaded by the cork, the mulberry and the stone pine, and the bracing mountain air made the climb an ecstatic delight. Even the languorous worldling preferred to dismiss his carriage at the foot and follow the pilgrims' path, though there was a good carriage road to the summit.

But though the rich came, as we have said, and made the place popular and famous all over Portugal, they formed but a minority in the vast multitudes who swarmed hither at Whitsuntide. Camping grounds were provided for the peasants. The ox-carts, ranged in rows and filled with fresh straw, and protected by toldas, or canvas covers, formed excellent beds. Great ovens had been built for their use; there were plenty of free games and amusements, and a part of the grounds was reserved as a bazaar or fair. The men bartered their various commodities, the women gossiped, the young men raced their ponies and wooed the maidens, the girls wandered reverently from shrine to shrine, unburdening their heart sorrows before the altar of Maria Santissima, or leaving a flower and a prayer before the shrine of St. Antonio. It was not the time of the great yearly romaria, or religious festival, but at all times Bom Jesus is more or less a place of pilgrimage. Even had there been no other visitors the Andrews would have felt themselves well repaid for their pains. But Mr. Jackson had found it convenient to take a short recess from business, and had joined them here.

He had been so very attentive of late that Margaret, not usually suspicious in such matters, had been obliged to confess to herself that either she must at once begin to discourage him or else be fairly held to have countenanced any pretensions which he might be cherishing. Did she really care to discourage him? This was the question which she asked herself one slumberous afternoon, when nearly every other guest of the hotel was taking a siesta. Leonilla came noiselessly through the door with a dish of bursting pomegranates. She smiled when she saw that Margaret was awake, and, placing the fruit before her, prepared to arrange her hair for the afternoon.

"Tell me another legend of St. Antonio," said Margaret, "and what do you do when you wish his gracious opinion as to whether the young gentleman you happen to be thinking about is the one that he would approve in your case?"

Leonilla's face brightened. "Ah! lady," she exclaimed, "to-night is the festa of St. Antonio. Will you not keep it with me? The dear saint will not mind that you are not a daughter of Portugal. He was compassionate to the Moors, and even to the Italians. If you will only ask him I have no doubt that he will give you as good a husband as my José Plácido."

"That were kindness, indeed," replied Margaret good naturedly. "If you will lend me one of your gay suits, and will help me to dress so that no one could guess but that I am a true daughter of the Minho, perhaps we can deceive even the good saint himself."

Leonilla brought her best scarlet petticoat, her velvet bodice and embroidered vest, with wide white sleeves. She removed the solitaire pearls from Margaret's ears, and replaced them by the enormous filigree ear-rings of the country. She plaited her hair and arranged the gay kerchief upon it, until St. Antonio must have been sagacious, indeed, not to have mistaken her for one of his own countrywomen. Then, hand-in-hand, just as the moon rose, they slipped from the Hotel da Boavista and descended the terrace staircase. It was deserted, and there was no sound but their own footfalls and the musical sobbing of the many fountains. St. Antonio's shrine was apart from the others, in a little dell half-way down the mountain. Margaret had brought two waxen tapers, each a yard high, garlanded with moulded pansies; she had bought them in Lisbon, with the intention of carrying them to America as curiosities, but had yielded to a Hallowe'en freak, and had decided to leave them for herself and Leonilla as propitiatory gifts for St. Antonio. As they descended the stairs Leonilla persisted in pausing before each of the chapels and gazing through the grated doorway at the wax-work tableaux displayed within. The interior of each of these little chapels was fitted up to represent a scene in the passion of our Saviour. The figures, carved from wood, were of life size, clothed and painted with amusing realism. When Margaret first looked upon the effigies which coarsely caricatured scenes that were to her very sacred—the Flagellation, the Crown of Thorns, the Garden of Gethsemane—it seemed to her that this was a palpable kind of blasphemy, a second mockery of the martyred Christ. She had marked since then the real devotion in which these figures were held by the simple devotees, and she had become reconciled to them. They passed by the fountains guarded by the statues of Hope, with her two companions, Confidence and Glory; Faith, blindfolded in the Romish fashion, attended by Confession and Docility, and Charity, with her followers, Peace and Benignity, and were standing in front of the chapel devoted to the taking of the miraculous napkin portrait by Veronica, when they heard footsteps ascending the staircase. Leonilla, frightened, shrank into the thicket which bordered the staircase. Margaret remained a moment irresolute, then feeling that it was hardly prudent for her to meet any chance comer there alone she turned to fly, when she heard other footsteps descending the staircase. She was hemmed in on both sides and it was too late to follow Leonilla, for the crackling of the branches would now certainly attract attention. In her agitation she leaned heavily against the grated door of the little chapel. To her surprise it yielded to the pressure, opening noiselessly inward. She caught at the asylum thus offered, and knelt behind the wooden Veronica, with her back to the door, hoping to be taken for one of the figures in the tableaux. Slowly the firm, manly footsteps which she had first heard came nearer, and passed the chapel without a pause. Margaret sprang to her feet, and, looking curiously, saw the figure of a young man, in the gown or cloak of the University of Coimbra, passing on toward the hospedaria, and bearing in his arms a little child. She quickly resumed her kneeling position, for she heard others coming from either direction. They met in front of the chapel, and Margaret recognized the voice of Senhora Aranjó, a Portuguese lady whose acquaintance she had made in Oporto, and whom she inwardly despised as a superficial little flirt. Her heart gave a quick throb as she heard Mr. Jackson expressing surprise and pleasure at meeting her. There were other voices, but Margaret's attention was only for these two.

Mr. Jackson's tone was carelessly gallant, and his phrases were chosen from the overdrawn compliment of Portuguese courtesy. But though Margaret knew that Senhora Aranjó probably attached no serious importance to his extravagant offers of service, and his vehement desire to kiss her angelic little feet, and though she knew that the phrases were uttered with the flippancy of one who conceived that he was only ordinarily courteous, still the conversation angered her. He had seemed so serious to her in the few reverent, half-hesitating attentions which he had paid her; was this respectful deference also only a mannerism assumed for the exigencies of the case? The party presently turned their attention to the scene within the chapel.

"What wretched art!" exclaimed Senhora Aranjó. "If, now, these figures were only carved in marble, instead of being so hideously painted and dressed! See, there is a figure actually in the costume of the peasants of this time and locality."

"You mean the kneeling girl by the side of Veronica," replied Mr. Jackson. "I have never noticed that figure before, and I thought I was quite familiar with all the scenes. Really, now, she is the most admirably executed of them all. I wonder whether it is made of wax or papier-maché?" He thrust his rattan through the grating and tapped Margaret lightly upon the shoulder.

"The coiffure is real," remarked Senhora Aranjó. "You moved one of the plaits with your stick."

"It is wonderfully life-like," replied Mr. Jackson. "I would like to compliment the artist who constructed it," and with a little more light chat the party turned away and mounted the staircase, Mr. Jackson walking gallantly by the side of the senhora.

As soon as they were safely out of sight Margaret left the chapel, her shoulders tingling as though the touch of the cane had been a sharp blow. She was thoroughly indignant, for she did not believe that Mr. Jackson had been deceived. He knew that it was yielding flesh against which the vibrant rattan had pressed. Possibly he fancied that some simple peasant girl had placed herself here in fulfillment of a vow of penance, and he had touched her in this insulting way to satisfy his curiosity. She walked quickly up the steps, quite forgetful of her intention of placing the candles which she still held on the altar of St. Antonio. In her anger she forgot even to wonder what had become of Leonilla. She had just gained the upper terrace, and was turning toward the hotel, when a figure lounging on the church steps sprang up and barred her way.

"Ah! my pretty little one," exclaimed Mr. Jackson, for it was he, "why did you make one of the ugly party in Veronica's chapel to-night? Did you think that I did not recognize the charming Leonilla? No, you need not turn away your head. I have seen those earrings before, and this jaunty handkerchief crossed so coquettishly over your bodice. Tell me what you were doing in the chapel? Praying the good St. Antonio to send you a lover, were you not? Well, here he is, my pretty Leonilla, and you will not even look at him."

"Mr. Jackson, let me go, if you please!" Margaret exclaimed in a stifled voice, turning suddenly and facing the discomfited gentleman.

"Margaret!" was the dismayed reply, "what cursed contretemps is this?"

Bitter taunts welled to Margaret's lips, but she crushed them back, and with a sweeping courtesy, entered the hotel. An importunate note came the next morning begging Miss Andrews to see him, to listen to his explanations and apologies; but the missive was returned unopened, and Mr. Jackson, after waiting through the day in vain for some opportunity to make his peace, left that evening for Braza and the south.

"Our experiment in seeking St. Antonio's favor was hardly a success, was it, Leonilla?" Margaret asked of her maid, as she witnessed through her parted curtains the departure of her admirer.

Leonilla's reply was a sob, and Margaret, regarding her keenly, saw that the girl's face was haggard and her eyes swollen with weeping.

"What is the matter, child?" she exclaimed, drawing her gently toward her. "Have you had bad news from José Plácido, or were you frightened last night?"

For answer the girl burst into passionate weeping. "Dear lady," she explained, as Margaret soothed her into calmness, "the gentle St. Antonio himself appeared to me last night, and I must die unwedded, a thing which would break my José's heart, let alone my own."

"Pray, what do you mean?" questioned Margaret kindly.

"I saw him," replied Leonilla, "the beautiful saint, with a countenance of heavenly sweetness. He was robed in black; on one arm he bore the radiant Christ-child, in the other hand he held a stalk of white lilies. He spoke no word, but as he passed me one of the lilies fell at my feet, a sign that he called me to himself. I must go home, dear lady, and prepare to die."

"Nonsense," exclaimed Margaret cheerfully. "I also saw your vision, and to me he seemed a very real and substantial man, dressed in the gown of a university student. If you will remain here a few days longer I have no doubt that I shall be able to point him out to you."

But Leonilla was not to be persuaded, and the next morning witnessed her departure for her home. Margaret was seriously annoyed. "The poor child will brood and brood over this thing," she thought, "until fancy will really accomplish her death." She had not seen the face of the student, and she looked eagerly but in vain among the groups of pleasure-seekers and devotees for some one in the peculiar scholastic garb. The days that followed would have been very tedious to her had not Senhora Arango presented her brother, Nepomuceno de Castro Rego, for whose sake, indeed, she had made this diplomatic journey. He was a serious young man, tall and graceful, faultlessly dressed after the Parisian fashion. He was more than ordinarily intelligent and well informed, having traveled widely both in Europe and Brazil. He spoke English accurately, but with a studied and rather bookish manner, and preferred to converse in French, of which he was a fluent master. From him the courtly obeisance of the usual forms of polite conversation had nothing stilted or feigned. He seemed to be a courtier speaking to his empress. His sincerity was very patent, for he had really fallen in love with Margaret almost at first sight.

"If you would only see Coimbra," he said one day, "I think you would love our Portugal. The English poet, Southey, thought it one of the most fascinating of old towns. You know he writes of the dear Mondego, and of its venerable buildings, its olives and its cypresses."

"Were you ever a student of the University of Coimbra?" Margaret asked.

"Yes, indeed; I have but just completed the course of law. You look surprised, but you know we enter the university older than the students of nearly all other countries."

The startled look in Margaret's face had another cause. "When you first came here, on the eve of St. Antonio's day, did you wear your student's gown?" she asked.

"Yes. It was very dusty, and I threw it on to protect my new suit."

Margaret still looked puzzled. "But the child?" she said to herself, not quite conscious that she was speaking aloud.

"Oh! the child. We met some friends of my sister's at Braza, who came out to the mountain with us. The nurse was not strong, and you know the staircase is long, so I offered to carry the child for her. I had bought some lilies, which helped amuse it. Did you see me in my character of nursery-maid? I could not have presented a very dignified appearance."

"I want you to assume it again, please," said Margaret, "for the sake of a poor, simple child, who took you for an apparition of the good St. Antonio."

The young man started, and, habitually serious as he was, could not forbear smiling. "My sister's friends left the next day," he said; "but I suppose we might manage to borrow some other baby."

"First, we must find Leonilla," said Margaret decidedly, "and to accomplish that we must return to Oporto."

The entire party returned to the city together, accompanied by Senhor de Castro Rego. Margaret searched the markets for Leonilla. They found only José Plácido, standing beside his dun-colored oxen, the image of abject despair.

"Where is Leonilla?" Margaret asked. "Is she well?"

"She is well," José replied, crossing himself. "She is dying."

"Oh, no!" Margaret exclaimed impulsively. "That must not be. Take us to her and we will cure her. Leave your oxen in care of some one else; go to the river and hire a boat; I will go to the hotel for my father, and will meet you at the Queen's Stairs."

It was only a short walk across the square, but Senhor de Castro Rego delayed her.

"I cannot go with you on this trip up to the vineyards," he said.

"Cannot!" she exclaimed indignantly. "And you know that without your help that poor child will die—that all my explanations will go for nothing if I cannot prove them true? Is that nothing to you?"

"It is nothing," he replied passionately. "What are all the girls of Portugal to me, who care only for you?"

"But do you not see that I care more for this than for anything else in the whole world?"

"Yes, I see it; and if we go, if we succeed, and the illness of your protégé proves to be only of the imagination, then, when you have nothing else to care for, will you not give some small part of your attention to my trouble, which is not at all of the imagination?"

They had reached the hotel. Margaret turned toward her own room. "You can go or not, as you like," she said coldly. "I make no promises." Her heart smote her reproachfully as soon as she had uttered the words, but she did not unsay them.

On descending the "Queen's Stairs" with her father she found the Senhor waiting with José Placido in one

"Well, you might as well appear in character at once, and I will explain to her that you are all 'of the earth, earthy.'"

"I beg pardon for suggesting a change, but it seems to me, if this young girl is in a physically weak condition, it will be too great a shock for her to see me at first in my grand rôle. I think you had better introduce me as a physician from Oporto, and let her get accustomed to me as a man, before you spring the supernatural upon her. Otherwise, I might be responsible for her death, for she is probably awaiting a second appearance of St. Antonio as a sign that her time has come."

"How thoughtful you are!" exclaimed Margaret, of the wine-boats. The great sail was hoisted, the boatman, in the picturesque beggar's-purse cap, gave a twist to the long rudder, and the boat sailed proudly up the river.

"LEONILLA CAME NOISELESSLY THROUGH THE DOOR WITH A DISH OF BURSTING POMEGRANATES."

"It is an excursion I have long thought of taking," said Mr. Andrews. "In fact, I promised Mr. Jackson that I would go with him, but some way the plan fell through."

Winding between the terraced hills they came, late in the afternoon, to the vineyard country, Leonilla's home.

"I wish you would tell me how you intend to carry out your plan of disillusionizing this child?" Margaret's companion asked.

"Why, I see that you have brought a parcel, which I presume contains your student's gown—"

"And a stalk of waxen altar-lilies. I could find no natural ones."

struck with sudden admiration. "I thought you had no interest in the poor child."

"I am interested, however, in the success of your undertaking."

"Then you are more generous than I had supposed."

José pointed out the cabin, almost hidden behind a colonnade of rough stone pillars, over which the vines clambered, roofing the spaces with a canopy of quivering leaves. Under this trellis, on a rude couch, Leonilla lay. They had brought her out of the cabin to enjoy the afternoon breeze. José stopped suddenly at the sight.

"I cannot bear it," he said.

"Come with me first for a little walk around the vineyard," said Mr. Andrews. "We will join the others by-and-by."

Margaret and the Senhor went on. Leonilla greeted her with a happy smile and a questioning glance at the strange gentleman, which was repeated by Leonilla's mother.

"This is a doctor," said Margaret, "who will certainly do you good."

Leonilla shook her head doubtfully, but allowed him to take her hand, and answered all his questions. Some children, her little nephews and nieces, approached and eyed the strangers curiously. The Senhor lifted one to his knee, and continued conversing pleasantly, and drawing from Leonilla, little by little, the story of the miraculous appearance of St. Antonio.

"My child," he said at length, very kindly, "have you never thought that this may have been only some chance traveler passing that way with a little child in his arms?"

Leonilla regarded him with a startled look.

"This baby has a very sweet face," he continued. "If you were to see it in my arms some moonlight night, could not you imagine that I were St. Antonio?"

"Ah, no!" she gasped; "St. Antonio is far more beautiful than even you, fair Senhor."

"True," he replied; "but I really did pass up the stairs of Bom Jesus with a little child at just the time when you saw your vision. Could you not have been mistaken?"

Leonilla's faith was shaken, but she still shook her head. "No, no," she persisted, "he wore a flowing robe, and he carried the lilies."

Very patiently the Senhor explained that the students at Coimbra wore just such gowns. He unfolded his own, and showed it to her, making her feel the texture and observe the cut, and then he put it on before her and again lifted the child in his arms.

"Now," he said, "if I only had the lily-stalk would not the resemblance be pretty fair?"

"I have some lilies here," said Margaret. "Let us try the effect," and she placed them in his unoccupied hand.

Leonilla gave a little cry and fainted. In spite of all their care, the shock had been too much for her overwrought imagination. The Senhor de Castro Rego hastily divested himself of his stage properties and assisted Margaret in restoring her to consciousness. As she opened her eyes José Plácido came up, anxious and hesitating.

"Oh, José," she cried, "is it thou? Where, then, is the good St. Antonio—I mean the physician who was here but a moment ago? Or was it a dream?"

The Senhor stepped forward. "It was all a dream, little Leonilla. I am a very poor saint, and yet I am the only one you have seen."

"Then I am to get well?" she asked timidly.

"Certainly, you dear, obedient little thing," replied Margaret; "and here is José to help persuade you. The Senhor and I are going to take a little walk to the end of the terrace. When we return perhaps you will have some grapes ready for us, for I have no doubt that his saintship is very hungry."

"You succeeded much better even than I hoped," she said to the Senhor as they looked up the vine-bordered river; "and you did it all knowing that I promised you nothing in return."

"You have promised nothing," he replied; "but if you should choose to give—"

And Leonilla, looking after them, flushed faintly as she said: "I was very dull and stupid, José—almost too stupid for you. Only the Senhora Margaret is wise and beautiful enough to be the bride of St. Antonio."

CUPID IN CUSTODY.

"CUPID, little criminal,
What have you been doing?"

"Nothing wrong, oh, nothing wrong;
Just a little wooing."

"You've been stealing hearts, I fear, Stealing hearts by dozens."

"No, I haven't, no, I haven't;
They were all my cousins."

"Come along, you little fraud;
You will have to tarry
In a prison, till you learn
Wooing means to marry."

"Very well, here's Bonnybelle;
She shall be the winner."
Bonnybelle said: "Officer,
Free the little sinner."

"Oh, I'll marry—Bonnybelle
Knows my truth and purity;
Here is good Saint Valentine,
He'll be my security."

CHAPTER XXXII.

POSSESSIO PEDIS.

DEATH is a fact that never becomes common. No period of protracted expectation ever prepares us for the announcement. Come when it will, it brings a tremor of surprise. Like the crash of thunder near at hand, or the rumble of the earthquake, one is never quite prepared to hear it. It may not alarm nor even startle, but it always hushes. There are, however, instances in which it is heard with a peculiar thrill. We expect the old to die and the young to live as a universal rule. The demise of those who have long been afflicted with disease or are of peculiarly frail and weakly habit is, of course, regarded as more probable and therefore is less startling than that of the active and strong. The temperament of the decedent, too, is a distinct element in the effect that death produces. There are men who are neither young nor vigorous, but whom we never associate with the idea of death until the fact stares us in the face, and we wonder at it. We are never able to realize that they are not as they always have been. We are forever thinking of them as alive, and recalling with a start our error. Such a man was Merwyn Hargrove. He was not especially robust, but his life for years had been one unvarying round of re-duplicated days. What yesterday had been with him, to-morrow was sure to be again. His personality was self-sustaining. He neither leaned upon his neighbors nor held them up. He neither talked of himself nor listened when another broached the subject. Griefs and pleasures were alike to him so far as others were concerned. He had become a fixture, as it were, in the eyes of all who knew him. He did not come very close to their lives, but yet he did not drop out of them, and there was probably no one in that whole region whose life seemed so much a matter of course as that of Merwyn Hargrove. There was an amazement, therefore, that for a time forbade any speech on the part of the little group who heard Mr. Clarkson's announcement. Kortright looked steadily at the speaker. His wife, after the first start, watched her husband carefully, as if to note the effect of this unexpected news upon him. Martin stood at the foot of the bed transfixed with horror. Mr. Kortright at length spoke, holding up the telegram as he did so.

"You think there is no mistake?"

"I am very sure there is none."

"This 'M. B.'—who is he?"

"Matthew Bartlemy, Captain Hargrove's attorney in the South."

"You have no idea how or when—?"

"You know all that I do."

"You say I am the executor?"

"Yes."

"What do you suppose this man wishes me to do?"

"I am aware that Captain Hargrove anticipated a struggle in regard to his property, and it is probable that the object of this haste is to have you enter into possession in order that you may the better hold for his devisees."

"I will do it," said the sick man, with his accustomed decisiveness. "What is the first thing to be done?"

"We will offer the will for probate as soon as possible," said Clarkson; "but it is better that you should take possession immediately. Bartlemy evidently fears a hostile entry."

"Martin shall go to Sturmhold to-night, and I will follow to-morrow. Will that do?"

"That is the very best that can be done," answered Clarkson. "Captain Hargrove certainly made no mistake in choosing you for his executor," he added as he nodded approval.

"Merwyn Hargrove has a right to command me and mine, whether alive or dead," said Kortright with emotion. "Martin," he added, "you must make no delay."

"But, father," said Martin hesitantly, "do you remember—there is Hilda—ought we not to inform her of this?"

"True; I had forgotten," said Kortright thoughtfully.

Clarkson looked quickly from one to the other.

"Hilda," said Mrs. Kortright, noticing this look of inquiry, "Captain Hargrove's daughter is to be Martin's wife."

"I ought to go for her at once," said Martin.

"Better wait till we are sure," said Kortright cautiously.

"You may serve her even better by going to Sturmhold," added Clarkson with sympathetic assurance.

Martin still hesitated.

"Do not seek to be the bearer of evil tidings, my son," said his mother. "Let Hilda be happy as long as she may."

"I will do as you wish," said Martin, with evident reluctance, "though I think she ought to know of this and come here at once."

How true is love's prescience.

An hour later Martin was on his way to Sturmhold, full of sad forebodings.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY BUCCANEER.

THE next day the air was full of rumors. Captain Hargrove was dead and 'Squire Kortright was his executor. That everybody in Skendoah knew. The manner of Hargrove's death was variously guessed. It was believed that in some way or other slavery was answerable for this, as well as the burning of the mills. There were especially strange reports in regard to Sturmhold—its young mistress, and poor Madame Eighmie, as the crazy woman was called in the neighborhood. There was talk of kidnappers and fire-eaters and violence.

"They'd better not be tryin' any of them tricks," said the old man Shields. "'Tain't so long since the Anti-Rent war here, that the people of these parts have forgot to take care of themselves, and their neighbors, too. The fact on 't is there's been just about as much man-stealing and land-stealing done in this region as we care about sitting still and looking on at. I'm an old man, but if any nigger-hunter comes into this country a tracking after a runaway or a stayaway, I'm ready to be one of a crowd that'll give him all the pond-water he'll care about takin' aboard at a time."

He was not alone in these sentiments. A company of citizens waited on Mr. Kortright as he was about to enter his carriage to be driven to Sturmhold, and offered to watch the premises night after night, in turn, as long as he might think a guard necessary. It was even reported that suspicious movements had been observed about the place during the previous night by Martin. That young man did not return, as his parents had expected, but sent a short note of excuse by one of the servants. This fact troubled Harrison Kortright, and hastened his departure. He declined, however, the good offices of his neighbors, and only arranged for the man who had been watchman at the mill to go with him to Sturmhold and remain for a short time.

One of the New York papers received that day contained the following:

"A DOUBTFUL RUMOR.

"There is a report of a wholesale kidnapping affair upon the coast of Carolina, in which a well-known citizen of one of our interior counties is said to have lost his life. Great excitement is reported in that region, and the affair is denounced as an 'Abolition outrage' of unprecedented magnitude. The tendency to exaggeration on the part of the 'chivalry' in regard to anything affecting in the remotest degree the 'peculiar institution,' leads us to anticipate that this will prove to be a great stir over a very small matter. It may even prove to be a flurry started to cover up one of those knife and pistol affairs to which Southern hospitality so often appeals when the Northern creditor goes there to enforce his demand. At all events we shall refrain from further comment until we obtain fuller information."

Another referred to it under the heading

"A QUEER COMPLICATION.

"The report comes from Washington that a special messenger from the governor of one of the Southern States arrived in that city yesterday, and laid before the President a request that he would dispatch at once a swift-sailing man-of-war to intercept a schooner that cleared from this port, about ten days ago, for Kingston and San Domingo via Newbern, Wilmington and Charleston. It seems that instead of touching at either of these ports, or proceeding on her voyage, the schooner hove to, somewhere off Hatteras, and took on board some forty or fifty slaves which were brought outside the bar and transferred to the schooner by a fast sailing yacht—which is well known in this harbor and up and down the Hudson. It is supposed that the intention is to take the slaves to Hayti, or, perhaps, to one of the British West Indies, for the purpose of freeing them. The President referred the matter to the Attorney-General, and the Secretary of the Navy was ordered to have a vessel in readiness should it be decided to attempt the pursuit. It is not probable that anything will be done, as it is not thought that the government has any power to act in the premises.

"The Sea Foam is reported to have passed up the river last night, but this is not credited. It is rumored that she has been engaged in such kidnapping excursions along the rivers and sounds of that region before. Her owner is said to have been outlawed and a price set upon his head for seducing slaves to run away, more than a year ago. It is generally believed that the whole story is a canard, and intended as a set-off to the absurd stories of Southern outrage in Kansas."

That evening Jared Clarkson drove over to Sturmhold. Harrison Kortright was on a couch in the library. His wife was with him when Clarkson was admitted. Kortright gave him a swift glance as they shook hands, and said in a calm, steady tone:

"It is true, then?"

"Too true."

"You have learned the particulars?"

"I have a letter from Mr. Bartlemy," said Clarkson, taking it from his pocket.

"Wait a moment," said Kortright. "I want Martin to hear it. He will have to act for me in this matter, and I want he should know it all. I can only lie here and plan. He must do the work."

Mrs. Kortright withdrew while he was speaking and soon returned with their son. Martin had a troubled, anxious look as he shook hands with Clarkson and sat down beside his father's couch. Mr. Clarkson, with the delicate sense of perception which always characterizes men of his temperament, recognized at once the development which a single night of suffering had wrought in the young man's nature. His tone revealed respect and consideration as he said:

"I have a letter from Mr. Bartlemy which I was about to read."

Martin bowed and Clarkson continued:

"It is written from Richmond, Virginia."

"MY DEAR SIR: I have just reached this point, having come here post-haste in order that I might communicate with you without awakening suspicion. I learned of the death of your friend and my client, Captain Hargrove, just before leaving home. He was killed two days ago in an attempt to remove the slaves of his late brother, George Eighmie, from Mallowbanks, the plantation formerly belonging to the said Eighmie. You will probably learn the particulars as soon as I, through the public press. I am so well informed as to the purposes of the heirs of Eighmie—who may also prove to be Hargrove's heirs, though they are only of the half blood—that I think we should take immediate measures to prevent their stealing a march on us by taking possession of the premises at Sturmhold. If you carry out my instructions as given by telegraph, Mr. Kortright will be on the ground before you get this, and I judge him to be a man not easily frightened or driven."

A smile came over Clarkson's face as he read the old lawyer's estimate of the man before him. Kortright's pale face flushed a little as he said:

"He did not know his letter would find me as I am."

"I don't think he would have changed his opinion if he had," said Clarkson. Then he read on:

"Nevertheless—and this I want you to impress upon him seriously—he must keep a sharp watch. Our Southern people have not in all respects the same regard for the mere forms of law as you of the North, and Gilman has a long head. In the fight they intend to make, possession of the realty in your state would be of the utmost importance. So too is the discovery and identification of Lida's children. I have just learned that the boy Hugh ran away from his master, who lives near Harper's Ferry in this state, some three or four years ago. He had a peculiar livid scar that looks like a cut, extending from the nose almost back to the ear on the right side of his face."

"Oh, Mr. Clarkson," exclaimed Mrs. Kortright, "do you remember the young fugitive that was rescued from the jail?"

"Sure enough," said Clarkson with a start. "The description fits him exactly."

"And Lida—" said Mrs. Kortright. "You remember how she ran after the carriage, calling out, 'My baby! my boy!'"

"And we thought her crazed," said Clarkson bitterly, as he rose and walked back and forth across the room. "Oh, vile and terrible institution, what evil hast thou not to answer for—a lost child, a crazed mother! How long, O Lord, how long?"

There was a moment's silence. The veins stood out on Clarkson's brow, and his hand was clenched with the excitement of his thought. His eyes burned so fiercely, when they flashed upon the auditors without seeing them, that it seemed as if there might be danger of his own mind losing its proper balance.

After a time, Kortright said quietly:

"Well, what more has Mr. Bartlemy to say?"

Clarkson at once resumed his reading:

"The girl I think we shall not find it hard to discover. By the way, if Unthank, Hargrove's body servant, turns up in that region, by all means keep him in concealment, but do not lose track of him. Even if we are unable to use him as a witness, his information will be indispensable to us. He is the only one living who really knows anything about Hargrove's life for the last twenty years. But don't let him be seen about there under any circumstances—at least until after you hear from me again. By the way, I learned while hunting for the boy Hugh that the man who owned him has the only one of Unthank's children whom he has not managed to run off. This may help you to keep him in sight if you let him know it."

"My God!" exclaimed Clarkson. "How heartless slavery makes the best of men!" Then he resumed his reading:

"I am going direct to Mallowbanks to-day, and will attend to the burial of our friend and whatever else needs to be done there. Do not relax your vigilance, and tell Kortright he must not leave the plantation for an hour until the danger is past. It would be better if he did not leave the house. Those who are against us are very determined men. We will teach them, however, that they can't fool with a client of Matthew Bartlemy or I'm mistaken. I've got my heart set on straightening out this tangle, and I'm going to do it, if I live long enough, even if I have to give up all the rest of my practice. Bob Gilman shall not have a chance to brag that he has got around the old man, if there's any way to circumvent him. I leave in an hour."

"Yours hastily,

"MATTHEW BARTLEMY."

There was a moment's silence, when Kortright remarked:

"Is that all?"

"No," answered Clarkson; "I have a copy of the Clayburn Register. I only glanced over it hastily on my way here. It contains a full account of the killing of Captain Hargrove. Shall I read it?" he asked, glancing at Mrs. Kortright.

"Of course," answered Kortright for himself. "We must know it all some time, and the sooner the better."

Clarkson glanced down the column and said:

"There is no need to read the head-lines. It was evidently a godsend to the editor, and he makes the most of it. It is a horrible tale as he tells it. This is what he says:

"A STARTLING OCCURRENCE."

"We stop the press to insert a hurried and imperfect account of the most infamous abolition outrage ever perpetrated on the soil of a Southern state. The people of Clayburn county have long been aware that a renegade born upon her soil, but for many years a resident of a Northern state, had become one of the most dangerous and pestiferous of that gang of nigger-stealing fanatics who seem to have no purpose in life except to disturb the peace and harmony of Southern society. This man, himself born a slaveholder, and of a family noted for cruelty and harshness to their slaves, became by accident the executor of an eccentric half-brother, whose will has for many years been a subject of litigation in the courts of the state. Almost a generation of lawyers have passed away since Eighmie vs. Hargrove was first entered upon the docket. Several minor suits have grown out of it, all of which would probably have been dismissed for want of prosecution, since the heirs of George Eighmie were also the natural heirs of Merwyn Hargrove, had they not learned that it was the intention of the latter not only to divert the property entirely from his family and bestow it upon the base-born children of a mulatto woman, with whom his testator sustained illicit relations, but also to deprive them of a chance of recovering it at his death by freeing and removing the slaves. Already the plantation of Mallowbanks had suffered severely in its productive capacity by the loss of about one-fourth of the requisite working force, which Hargrove had freed and colonized at the North. Although he is reported to be a man of large means, it was evident to every one that no estate could stand such wholesale depletion as he contemplated, and yet be sufficient to reimburse the heirs for losses sustained through his misfeasance. Under these circumstances an injunction was obtained to prevent his removing the slaves during the pendency of the litigation. This was some two or three years ago, and he has shown no inclination to carry out his original purpose until a few months ago circumstances that came to the knowledge of the claimants put them on their guard, and they arranged to have Mr. Alfred Iddings, a poor but respectable man, who lives on an adjoining plantation, keep watch of matters at Mallowbanks, and let them know of any attempt to remove the slaves, or, in fact, of the coming of Hargrove. It should be stated that about two years ago Hargrove was indicted for kidnapping and seducing slaves to run away from their masters; and, in accordance with the law, as he constantly evaded arrest, coming and going in the night time, on his swift-sailing yacht, the Sea Foam, he was formally outlawed by the proper authority. The claimants were determined to assert their rights at all hazards, and were fully sustained by the popular sentiment of the vicinage, which was kept in a constant state of alarm by this descendant of old Hargrove of Hargrove's Quarter, who seemed to have inherited all the thieving propensities of his buccaneer ancestor.

Nothing came of these precautions, however, until this morning about three o'clock, when Mr. Iddings, being awakened by the barking of his dogs, became aware of some unusual stir about the negro quarter at Mallowbanks. The morning being foggy, he could not at first make out what it was, but running along the path that skirts the shore he soon came to the inlet, where he found the Sea Foam, with her sails furled and an armed desperado sitting in the stern, evidently awaiting the arrival of some one on shore. The moon was at the full, and Iddings was able to see everything upon the deck as plain as if it had been midday. For a little while he was thoroughly astonished. Then he thought that if the craft was there the master of it could not be far off. Stealing back along the path, he ran quickly through the corn-fields to the house of Major Ezekiel Eighmie, one of the claimants. As soon as Iddings communicated what he had seen to Major Eighmie, that gentleman seized his conch and blew a blast that awakened the whole neighborhood. The coming of the yacht had been foreseen, and upon Major Eighmie giving the signal agreed on, all the gentlemen of the neighborhood seized their arms and started for the landing. About this time a fire was seen in the direction of Mallowbanks, and the general belief was that the crowd of ruffians, with Hargrove at their head, had pillaged and fired the Eighmie homestead. Shots were heard in the direction of the landing, and also of the house. Owing to the fog, and the uncertainty as to the number of the marauders, it was necessary to advance upon them with caution. It was, therefore, some considerable time before the band of armed neighbors reached the fire, which they found to be not at the mansion, but at the negro quarters, which had been deserted and set on fire. When this fact was ascertained, the whole infamous plan burst on the minds of the pursuers. It was a great kidnapping scheme! The negroes had been partly corrupted and partly coerced into flight. At once a cry was raised, 'To the landing! To the landing!' Major Eighmie called upon them to follow him, and the enraged neighbors responded promptly to his appeal. They started down the path to the landing, but had not advanced more than a hundred yards when a perfect volley was fired at them out of a clump of wood that intervened between them and the inlet. The bullets that whistled over them showed that Hargrove had a strong and well-armed party to aid him in his nefarious enterprise. The citizens then advanced carefully, firing every time they caught a glimpse of the enemy. At length they reached the brow of the hill above the landing just as the fog lifted and a sharp breeze sprang up from the west. There was the yacht, with every stitch of canvas set, loaded to the gunwale with frightened negroes, who were crying piteously at being driven away from their home and friends. The wind filled the sails and straightened the hawser, that was fastened to a tree on the bank. Half way down the slope was Unthank, the desperate negro villain, who has served Hargrove as his body-servant for twenty years, and who has been his confederate and agent in all his recent villanies, supporting his master, who was evidently wounded. The yacht was hardly twenty steps away, and the black scoundrel was making desperate efforts to get him aboard. Hargrove was perfectly helpless. He must have been wounded somewhere about the spine, as he seemed unable to use his limbs at all, though he was quite conscious and able to use his hands very freely, as he afterwards showed. The neighbors at once opened fire on the precious pair. Hargrove looked around, and, seeing that escape was hopeless, spoke a few words to the negro. A black-bearded scoundrel, who stood in the stern of the yacht with a knife raised ready to cut the rope, called out to them to make haste. Unthank laid his master on the ground at the foot of a large water-oak, and raising his gun drew a bead on the advancing party. Hargrove, however, forbade him to fire, and taking a packet from his bosom gave it to him and ordered him aboard the yacht. The negro refused to obey. Hargrove again commanded him to go. Upon his refusing a second time, Hargrove ordered the man in the stern to cut loose. The rascal did so without waiting for further orders. Unthank, seeing it was his last chance, ran down the slope and jumped from the landing just as the yacht swung out into the wind. The neighbors rushed forward to prevent the escape of the slaves, but before they had advanced ten steps were fired upon by Hargrove. As he was known to be a desperate villain and was undoubtedly well armed, besides being protected by the tree, it was not a safe matter to advance upon him without cover. While those in front fired upon him steadily some others of the party crawled through a little belt of bushes above where he lay and sent a bullet crashing through his skull. He was undoubtedly saving his fire, expecting a rush to be made on him in front. Strangely enough none of the attacking party were hurt, though Hargrove is known to have been the best rifle-shot ever seen in these parts. By that time the day had broken, and the yacht was dancing over the water before a twelve-knot breeze half a mile away.

"It was discovered afterward that the Sea Foam had a consort outside the bar to which her cargo was transferred. She had evidently made one or two trips before the one on which she was discovered, as more than fifty slaves are missing from the plantation. Documents that were found upon the person of this daring robber show that he intended to remove every slave at Mallowbanks. It is perhaps but fair to say that he claimed these slaves not as executor but as legatee under the will of his half-brother. The court was unable to try the question of his right by reason of his refusal to come forward and reply to the interrogatories of the complainant. Being a non-resident the court had no jurisdiction over him except to enjoin him from removing the property. The neighbors were so enraged that the dead body was treated somewhat roughly, until the overseer at Mallowbanks took it in charge. The coroner has been informed, and a jury will probably be impaneled who will thoroughly examine into the affair. Major Ezekiel Eighmie starts North to-day to take steps to secure remuneration from the estate of the dead kidnapper for the loss sustained. The community are probably indebted to him for ridding the coast of a most dangerous enemy. It is said that the deceased was such an insatiable negro lover that he took his brother's favorite wench and her mulatto children to his palatial home among the Catskills and introduced them into the selectest circles of northern Abolition society as his own wife and daughter!

"This is altogether the most daring piece of villany the abolitionists have yet attempted. The recent expulsion from our soil of the Massachusetts attorney who came to the state expressly to gain a residence in order to test some points of our slave code before the Federal courts, must now be recognized as a wise and prudent measure. The letter of the law is not always to be relied upon. Perhaps, under the circumstances, the act in which Hargrove was engaged would not be held to be a felony, but it was certainly very natural that men who saw themselves about to be robbed by an armed marauder should not be over-nice in their conduct toward him. A number of shots are said to have taken effect upon him, and it would probably be impossible to ascertain who fired the one that actually caused his death. There was nothing found upon his body to implicate any other parties in his act. Indeed, there was an explicit disclaimer, and a declaration written in his own hand, and dated the day before, affirming that he only did it in the assertion of his lawful ownership of the property. No reliance can be put on the declarations of such an out-cast from decent society, and it is exceedingly improbable that it is true. The whole body of abolitionists of the North are undoubtedly responsible for this invasion of our soil and violation of our rights. We counsel our people to exercise moderation, but vigilance. Every Yankee craft that comes into our waters should be thoroughly overhauled for stowaways, and not one should ever be allowed to leave her moorings without being so thoroughly fumigated as to drive out or kill every living thing under her hatches. The South must protect itself and its institutions against the envy and greed of Northern hypocrites and fanatics."

So the descendant of the buccaneer, who had risked his life in planting slavery in the colony, was slain in the attempt to restore the children of those slaves to freedom.

As the people of Skendoah attributed their misfortune to slavery, as an ultimate cause, so the citizens of Clayburn county accounted the abolition fanaticism the disturber of their peace. Distrust was paving the way for strife.

CHAPTER XIII.

"Lenore fuhr am Morgenroth Empor aus schweren Träumen."

THIS is all the consolation with which she wakes next morning and exchanges the shadowy muddle of her discomfortable visions for the not less discomfortable reality. She had slept—to her own surprise—through the earlier part of the night; but in May-time day and night faint into each other; and though the light is broad and universal, yet the hour is a small one when she awakes, with that hopeless decidedness, that irrevocable bursting of the chains of slumber, which tells its unhappy victim that all juggling efforts to overtake the flown blessing will be of no avail. She lies on her uneasy bed for as long as she can bear it; then, since the hour is still far too early to ring for her hot water, and so make public an abnormal condition of mind and body, she rises, and throwing on her dressing-gown, sits down by the open window and watches the strides of the morning, stepping clean and young and lucent, across the old and dirty earth. Even the ugly Bohemian Railway Station and the stucco houses come in for a portion of his kindness. How much more the little hoary garden plat and the dew-pearled tulips!

It has been an open question since the world began whether the loveliness of nature assuages or aggravates the misery of humanity in its more miserable moods. Belinda would subscribe to the latter opinion. It seems to her that she could better bear the look of the day—that it would not make her so angry—if slant rain were slashing the earth, or if it were locked in a prison of frost, or wound in a shroud of snow.

The splendor of the transparent air: the trees, just lightly wagging their heads in the early wind; even the short-tailed starlings, cheerfully walking about while the sun touches up their apparently sombre feathers, and brings out little rainbow colors in them; each—each has a separate stab for her. There were starlings at Moritzburg; there were tulips in the inn garden at Lohmen: can she set her eyes upon any one common object that does not bring a memory with it? She has never been of a very bright or hopeful temperament with regard to her own future; not one of those happy young ones to whom the long life ahead seems swathed in a golden mist. The deep conviction of her own paucity of powers of attraction, a conviction which has been with her as long as she can remember anything—as long as the far-away days of short frocks and coming down to dessert, when strangers used to pull Sarah's long curls and laugh at her smart answers—a conviction that for a bright interval has been shaken, now settles down in its cold and humbling certainty again in her heart.

"He was not telegraphed for," she says to herself, in a tone of surpassing bitterness; "he had no ill news; but he was right to go. I am not of the stuff of which the women that men love are made! Let me try not to forget it again."

The clocks one after another, in their different voices, have just struck eight. Cramped with long sitting in one position, which she has forgotten to change, she rises, and is beginning to walk up and down the little room when a knock comes, a quick, loud, rattling knock, which, in its lively energy, partakes of the nature of the person who has executed it, and who adds to it an urgent calling:

"Belinda! Belinda! are you awake?"

Awake!—is she awake? She smiles grimly to herself.

"Yes, I am awake," she answers in an unwilling voice, that she in vain tries to make sound sleepy.

"Then why do not you open the door?" cries the voice impatiently, accompanying the question by a long and noisier rattling of the handle.

But Belinda takes no step towards complying. She wishes for no one's company, not even Sarah's—perhaps Sarah's least of all; for is not she the one person from whom she has been unable to hide her humiliation.

"What do you want?" she asks morosely.

"If you do not open the door at once," replies Sarah, desisting for a moment from her rattling, so that her voice may be the more penetratingly heard, "I warn you that I shall open your note and read it myself!"

Her note! In one bound Belinda is across the room, has turned the key, and is palely facing her sister.

"Who was right?" cries Sarah, strutting in, disheveled, dressing-gowned, triumphant, and holding in her hand a letter, which the other silently snatches. "I was so certain that he must have written, that I sent Tommy round to his lodgings the first thing this morning; and sure enough they unearthed this, which they had entirely forgotten, and which we ought to have received yesterday afternoon. Come, it is not a bill this time!"

Belinda has opened the envelope, and is staring strainingly at the paper.

"How stupid!" she says, passing her hand across her eyes. "Somehow I cannot see it."

"Is it possible that this is his handwriting?" cries

Sarah, coming to her aid, and examining with surprise the superscription. "What a shocking hand he writes!"

"Yes; it is his," says Belinda, again passing her hand across her eyes; "but it is very shaky. Something has happened to alter it very much. I think you must read it, please."

"There does not appear to be any beginning," replies Sarah, complying with some alacrity. "'I cannot come to meet you this afternoon. Oh, forgive me!'" (Then comes a prodigious blot—mixed tears and ink, I expect.) "I have been telegraphed for home" (I told you so; then there is something scratched out; what is it?) looking at the paper askant and half shutting one eye). "'A frightful cat'—(what, cat? what is it likely to be?—catastrophe—that is it, of course; he has put long legs and loops to all the short letters, but I can quite make it out, in spite of that)—'a frightful catastrophe'—(scored through, you know). 'I do not know what I am saying. God bless you!' (Then more blots.)—'D. R.' That is all!"

"All!" cries Belinda, stretching out her trembling hand for the note. "Are you sure that there is nothing over the page?"

"Not a syllable!"

There is a silence. Belinda's eyes are riveted on the few scrawled words—so few—on which all her future is to be built. Among them is there one which will support the weight of a legitimate hope?

"It would have been more to the purpose," says Sarah, in a tone of wounded common sense, "if he had given us a hint as to what the catastrophe was, instead of wasting so much ingenuity in making all those unnatural legs and arms to his 'a's' and 'c's' and 's's'."

"You think that there is one really? that something has happened? that he was telegraphed for?" asks Belinda, appealing in wistful fever to her cool, shrewd junior.

"Of course he was; of course there has!" replies Sarah decidedly. "I must say," with a rather satirical look, "that you have a high opinion of your admirer; he ought to be flattered by your confidence. No! reassure yourself," striking the untidy blurred page with her forefinger; "any one with pretensions to be even an indifferent liar would have been ashamed of this."

"A catastrophe!" repeats Belinda, as though speaking to herself, and still looking at the note; "what sort of a catastrophe? I think—I fear—that it must in some way concern his father."

"Well, anyhow, the poor boy's character is cleared up," says Sarah gayly, sweeping in her long peignoir to the window, and standing blithely looking out at the tulips and the starlings—as brightly pretty as the former, as robustly cheerful as the latter. "After all, he has not been driven away by your unlady-like warmth, as you had quite made up your mind last night; and as to his father, if it is he, our grief must be chastened by the thought that we have never set eyes upon him. Well, I suppose I must not spend the day in my dressing-gown," walking to the door.

Neither must Belinda; and yet for long after her sister has left her, she sits, still poring over the meagre sheet that is her first love-letter. She laughs derisively. Will it be her last, too? At that thought she sets herself to weary calculations. It is, without stopping—he will, of course, stop nowhere between Dresden and London—a thirty-six hours' journey. Probably five or six hours more will be occupied in getting on to Yorkshire. It is a four days' post from England to Dresden. Even if he wrote to her immediately on arriving—a most unlikely hypothesis—it cannot be much less than a week before she hears. There must be five or six absolutely void black days, that yet will have the same complement of hours in them as the day at Moritzburg or the day at Wesenstein. She lays her hot forehead on the cool wooden chair-back. Oh, if they could but be slept through!

But at this moment the entrance of her maid, with the usual paraphernalia of her toilet, sufficiently reminds her that they cannot. They cannot be slept through! They must be dressed through, talked through, eaten through, made expeditions through, joked through. Worst of all, his departure, its cause, his probable or improbable return, he himself, must be continually discussed and worn threadbare in her hearing.

This, indeed, is an evil from which she suffers for only two days. After that, he being gone, and never having sought to make himself specially acceptable to any member of the little society save one, he slips from their talk and their thoughts.

She is deeply thankful when their chatter about him ceases, and yet angry with them for so soon forgetting him. And meanwhile the days in summer procession pace stately by, full of sap and growth and laughter. The date of the Churchill departure is now fixed for the fifth of June; and as that period approaches, a freezing panic fear begins to clutch Belinda more and more tightly in its hold—the fear that her own going may antedate the arrival of his letter; that he may write to her here, and the letter not be forwarded. The many tales she has heard of lives dismally wrecked upon some such small accident throng her memory.

The house is full of signs of an approaching déménagement; full of packing, disarranging, bustling. It is mostly full also of German officers, who, being aware that their time for enjoying the society and the wit of their love-worthy Sarah is all too quickly passing, are resolved to have nothing to reproach themselves with in the way of not having availed themselves of it while they were able. Some of them are not unwilling to extend their endearments to the elder sister, seeing her no longer monopolized by her surly fellow-countryman; but she has received their compliments so blankly, that, ashamed of their brief infidelity, they have clanked hastily back to their first love, who sees them go and return with the same joyous indifference.

Belinda has been innocent of the least intention to snub them, but how can one receive pretty speeches—any speeches intelligently, when one is continually doing a sum in one's head—36 and 5, 41; 1 day from 4 days; 1 day from 3 days, etc.?

The packing is not of so wholly occupying a nature as to exclude incidental amusements. It does not even forbid a farewell excursion to Tharandt; an excursion planned by Sarah and her rout of Uhlands; with some necessary padding of a lenient chaperon and compliant girls.

Belinda has believed herself equal to sharing it. Tharandt is rendered agonizing by no associations. She has never visited Tharandt in his company, but, at the last moment, a trifle robs her of her fortitude—the sight of her cobwebby Wesenstein gown, extended with unconscious tactless cruelty by her maid on the bed. She throws herself down, ungovernably sobbing, beside it. It seems like the husk of her lost happiness. By-and-by they are all gone, and the house is left to her and to silence. It is deserted even by the dogs, who have been taken out driving by Mrs. Churchill; Slutty, supinely indifferent to view and air, curled at the carriage-bottom, and Punch, standing up on his hind-legs, with his fore-paws on the carriage-side, like an unsteady heraldic lion.

Belinda laughs at the thought of him as she returns to the salon, which is beginning to wear a desolate look, reduced to its own lodging-house furniture and shorn of the graces bestowed upon it by the Churchills' Indian rugs and Turkish chair-backs. Its new ugliness, meeting her eye, seems to add to the vexation of her spirit. The sunlight on the street vexes her, too. She wanders for a while aimlessly about the room, and then drops as aimlessly into a chair. To an observer it would seem that she were quite without occupation. But it is not so. She is still at work upon that sum. She has just finished it, or rather she has just begun it afresh, when an unexpected interruption drives it, not away—nothing, alas! could do that—but into the background of her mind.

The summer afternoon is at its drowsiest; even the flies buzz inertly along the pane, when the room-door opens and Professor Forth looks in.

"I beg your pardon," he says formally, "but I think your page must have been misinformed; he tells me that Sarah is not at home."

At the sound of his voice, separated by how many seas and continents from her thoughts, Belinda starts to her feet; then, conjuring suddenly up a civil smile, says gently:

"But I am afraid he is not misinformed; I am afraid she is out. Did you expect to find her?"

He has entered the room now in his hard and graceless academic black, which somehow looks out of character with the light-colored room and the blazing day.

"Naturally I expected to find her," he replies sharply, "since it is by her own appointment that I am here; after evading on various trivial pretexts every meeting proposed by me for the past week, she herself gave me a distinct and definitive rendezvous for this hour and day. I am punctual to the moment!" glancing angrily at the Dresden clock.

"I am sadly afraid that she has forgotten all about it," replies Belinda, bursting into a helpless laugh; but indeed there is no greater fallacy than that one may not laugh heartily, violently, and not hysterically, when one's heart is breaking; "she has gone out upon an expedition."

"She is always going out upon expeditions," retorts he snappishly.

Belinda sighs; her mirth vanished as quickly as it came. She has no energy to take up the cudgels for Sarah, of whose conduct no one can think worse than she does, and of whose meditated villany she is guiltily aware.

"She is young," she says lamely.

"I cannot see that that is any valid apology for a systematic neglect of all the more serious duties of life," he replies fretfully.

He has walked to the window, where he now stands drowned in a bath of golden radiance. Never has he looked less lovable; ill-humor rendering yet more pinched and captious his pinched pedant face; and never has Belinda felt so charitably toward him. "He is not amiable; Heaven knows that he is not attractive," she says to herself; "so much the worse for him. But he is unhappy; what better claim could he have upon my sympathy?"

"Do you want her for anything special?" she asks not unkindly, going up and standing beside him in the rain of sunbeams in her large young beauty; "anything in which I can help you?"

It is obvious that the idea had never occurred to him that in her he should find either the ability or the willingness to aid him.

"You are very good," he answers stiffly; "the fact is, I wanted to throw together a few thoughts upon the Idea of Color among the Athenians," glancing at a bundle of notes and papers in his hands, "and I entirely depended upon Sarah to be my secretary. She is perfectly aware," with a revived and extreme exasperation of tone, "of the affection in my eyes which precludes the possibility of my writing more than a certain number of hours a day, and which keeps me here in the middle of term, unavoidably absent from my post and Oxbridge."

"She is very provoking!" assepts Belinda soothingly. "But as far as the writing goes, I write a much better hand than Sarah. She never would learn, when we were children. She was always playing monkey-tricks upon the master all through the lesson. Cannot I be your secretary?" As she speaks, she lifts to his her large serious eyes, full of a compassion that is none the less sincere for being slightly tinged with contempt.

"You are very good!" he repeats ceremoniously. "I am aware that I have no right to trespass upon your valuable time."

"There is no one else to trespass upon it," she answers, stifling a sigh. "On the contrary, I am obliged to any one who will help me to get through it." As she speaks she walks toward the writing-table, and quickly and methodically arranging the writing materials, seats herself, and in a few moments is penning her first sentence from his dictation.

She has undertaken the office out of pure good-nature, and at first fulfills it quite mechanically. Gradually, however, as the meaning of the words she is writing penetrates through her ears into her understanding, a slight interest in the subject in hand awakens in her. She asks a question or two. By-and-by there comes a Greek word.

"May it be written in English letters?" she asks, glancing up. "No? Well, then I am afraid I must leave it for you to insert."

"You do not know the Greek character?" he asks, with a slight touch of regret in his tone.

She shakes her head.

"I am afraid I must ask you," smiling a little, "not to question me too closely as to what I know."

"I offered to teach it to Sarah," he says aggrievedly.

"And she refused, of course."

"It is not the want of knowledge," he says, beginning to pace gloomily up and down the room, "that is the irremediable evil. It is the total lack of all desire for knowledge—that is what I deplore in Sarah."

Belinda has paused in her writing, her elbow leant on the table, and idly brushing with the feather of the pen the red curve of her lips.

"I have never known an instance," continues he, still pursuing his irritated walk, "of a young person whose character had undergone so radical change in so comparatively short a period of time."

"Do you think so?" cries Belinda, surprised. "She has always been exactly the same as long as I can remember her!"

"When I first made her acquaintance," he goes on, not heeding the interruption, "I of course became at once aware of her ignorance—that is patent; but she appeared to me to be not lacking in intellectual force, nor in a rather remarkable desire for self-improvement. On the very first evening I met her, she deplored to me the deficiency of her education, and asked me in so many words to aid her in the formation of her mind."

Belinda drops the pen. It is not a nearly large enough shield to hide the convulsive mirth that this revelation of her sister's hideous hypocrisy has called forth.

"I still cherish the hope," continues he, fortunately unaware of the character of his auditor's emotion, "that this may be only a phase; that on her return to her home and her more regular occupations, freer from these senseless distractions," with an exaggerated emphasis, "her mind may resume that soberer bias which, from my first impression of her, I cannot but believe to be its natural one."

Belinda, still unable to speak, contents herself with a gentle head-shake, as commentary and gloss upon which there comes, at the same moment, the sound of a scampering step on the stone stairs, of a loudly singing voice, waking to life again the dead dumb house. In a moment the door flies open, and the person whose mind is expected so soon to resume its soberer bias stands before them, her hat a good deal on one side from the weight of the flowering May-bough stuck rakishly in it—the May-bough whose strong and almost pungent perfume comes rushing into the room with her.

"Are not you delighted to welcome me back so unexpectedly early?" cries she joyously. "But it was so hot, and my soldiers were all so cross and low at the prospect of losing me, and Von Breidenbach had a toothache, and so—Mr. Forth!" suddenly catching sight of him. "Ah!" with an abrupt change and refrigeration of tone, "of course you came about that essay of yours; and, equally of course, I forgot all about it. Well, I dare say there is no great hurry! Happily, the Greeks will keep; they will not run away."

There is an ominous silence. Then—

"It is unfortunate," begins the Professor, in a voice trembling with indignation, while the puckers of anger that Belinda's mild hand has been smoothing away, again form their network over his face, "that considering the position in which we stand relatively to each other, our views of life and its significance should be so diametrically—"

Belinda leaves the room.

SECOND BLOOM.

In fruitage time we do not look for flowers,
Yet may we see, on some October day,
Allured by autumn's faithless sun and showers,
Beside the ripened fruit, the bloom of May.
It holds no hope of summer glad and gay;
No pledge of future wealth its beauty dowers;
The first autumnal storm that darkly lowers
Shall sweep its sweet, untimely life away.

Oh, fair our toil-won garnered harvests are,
And bright our teeming orchard's store of gold,
And sweet the clusters bending from our bowers
That all their glories of fulfillment hold;
But fairer, brighter, yea, and dearer far,
The fruitless blossoms of our autumn hours.

SUSAN MAER SPALDING.

THE HOUSEHOLD—ABOUT SMALL ECONOMIES.

IN most households there are two steady enemies to small economies. One is the husband and the other the cook; and against these powerful and antagonistic influences the frugal housekeeper has her daily fight. Of the two, the cook is the frankest. She is under no delusion about her opinions, her principles, or her practice. She does not hesitate for a moment in saying that one method of administration is laudable and becoming to a lady, and the other is mean, and not to be encouraged by any co-operation. The two are alike in their opinion of desirable results. Both the cook and the husband like the liberal, well-spread table, but they totally disagree about the means of reaching these results. The husband believes in the traditional soup made out of a boot-leg; the cook will put up with a soup-bone, but what she likes best is a good standing-rib, well boiled down. The first principle in housekeeping, he says, is vigilant, thorough supervision. He approves of the housekeeper who goes to market, and then, receiving the stores when they come home, sees that the bunch of beets is the one she selected. He likes her to follow this bunch of beets—to know that they are properly cooked, and that nothing is lost in the paring. If the skins can be used in a stew or the water made to sweeten a cake, he would consider that a triumph of housewifery. She ought to know how many beets are needed for the family, and if any are left, she should follow them from the table to the refrigerator and thence to the table again. If she has not enough for another dish, she should make a salad or some of the mysterious economical dishes mentioned in cooking-school formulas.

To all of this the wife theoretically agrees. Whether she personally likes to do it or not, she has faith in some supervision and direction of stores. When she attempts to put her theory in practice, she meets the cook, standing like a Greek in her way. She may also take on the courage of a daughter of the Ionian Isles, but it is ancient Sparta against modern Athens, and the odds are on the side of the cook.

When it comes to the boot-leg question, the husband has a clear idea that this needs to be boiled in water (which is cheap) and then seasoned. The cook makes out the list for the seasoning—so much stock, so much cream, so many almonds, so much wine, and certain other condiments at her fancy. The husband agrees with the cook in believing the soup ought to be good, but they misapprehend each other about the means of making it so. To him the merit of the soup is twofold. It ought to be excellent and cheap. To her the boot-leg is the disadvantage, and she gallantly brings the ladder to the rescue. He looks to the wife to have the soup answer his just demands. The cook looks to her for her resources.

The two are alike in another respect—they believe in the feast and have no regard for the consequent famine. Nothing so irritates a cook as to have to keep things on hand. What is left from breakfast she wants to use for lunch, and if anything remains from dinner that cannot be used for breakfast, she wants to put it in the slop pail or give it away at the back gate. She hates to have preserves and pickles and canned goods put away as if they were never to be used. She would have plum preserves three times a day if she had her way, and her rule is to empty the jar without regard to the fact that it holds two quarts, and there are but two to eat them.

The husband has the same idea. "Why don't you have the strawberries and the watermelon pickle?" he says; and then he adds that he doesn't see the use in putting up things to spoil. They also agree in then expecting her to be ready for emergencies, and always have something in the house.

The husband is an enemy to small economies in another direction. He objects to the door-plate on which Thompson is spelled with a "p," and cannot understand a woman's passion for a bargain when she does not need it. It is of no use for her to tell him that it would be best to buy the children's coats in February for next November, because they are cheaper at the end of the season than they will be at the beginning. He thinks their coats are good enough, and as for their outgrowing them by another season, it is best to wait and see. If the wife has a pair of gloves, why on earth should she buy another pair simply because they are on a bargain-counter? He grimly smiles when he sees a procession of women filing out of a store that has flamed out an advertisement of "great reductions." In his soul he knows that each one of the paper bundles they carry contains something bought because it was cheap and not because it was needed. In one way he is right, but what woman, when she goes out to buy something she needs, finds it a bargain ready to her hand? A bargain is a thing that happens. It has its own laws, and one of them is that it comes at the moment when there is no pressing need for it, and when there is no money idle for investment. It may be wanted next month, and the prophetic soul of the wife comprehends the fact. When the day of need does come, and she pays full market price, she is grieved because she remembers.

No woman could have written that cruel satire that spells Thompson in the most ordinary and natural way. She knows too well that when five dollars has to buy ten dollars' worth, that a dollar out of season is the bird in the hand. She knows what it is to have the boot-leg bought for her, and then to have to find the cream and the almonds and the wine and the stock. Hers is the fight for the small economies, but it is her husband who wears the judicial crown and her cook who waves the triumphal palm.

LOUISE STOCKTON.

WHAT SHALL WE HAVE FOR DINNER?

	Clam Chowder.
	Braised Beef.
Potatoes.	String Beans.	Squash.
	Potato Salad.
	Batter Pudding.
	Raspberry Sauce.
Cheese.	Cream Crackers.
	Coffee.

CLAM CHOWDER.—One hundred clams, two onions, cut fine; one dozen "Boston" crackers, or any variety that can be split; twelve fresh tomatoes, or one small can of sealed; one even tablespoonful of salt, quarter of a teaspoonful of mace and half a saltspoonful of cayenne pepper; quarter of a pound of salt pork, cut in slices; two tablespoonsful of butter for crackers, half a pint of hot milk. Fry the pork brown, and cut in small bits. Put the onion and tomato in the pork fat, and cook for ten minutes. Take a large saucepan or a soup-kettle, and put a layer of the clams in the bottom, adding a layer of the tomato and onion and of the chopped pork. Sprinkle on the seasoning, and continue till all are in. Pour on the liquor of the clams, or, if there is none, one quart of boiling water, and simmer steadily for one hour. Split the crackers, dip them in the hot milk, and butter them. Line a tureen with them and pour the hot chowder upon them. If potato is liked, slice six large ones, and put in alternate layers with the other ingredients.

BRAISED BEEF.—Six to eight pounds of the round of beef, or a piece from the top of the rump can be used; quarter of a pound of salt pork, two onions, one small carrot, one small turnip, a bouquet of sweet herbs, one even tablespoonful of salt, half a teaspoonful of pepper. Cut the pork in slices, and fry brown in the braising-pan; when brown, take out, and add the vegetables cut fine. Cook five minutes, and take them out. Dredge the beef with flour, and then brown it on both sides, adding the pepper and salt. It will take from fifteen to twenty minutes. Then put in the vegetables and sweet herbs. Add one quart of boiling water, and cook closely covered for four hours, basting occasionally. Good, cold or hot. If gravy is wished, strain the liquid in the pan, thicken with one tablespoonful of flour stirred smooth in a little cold water, and boil all three minutes.

STRING BEANS.—String, cut in small pieces, and, if very young, boil an hour in salted water; if old, not less than two. Drain off the water, add a tablespoonful of butter and a sprinkle of pepper, and serve.

SQUASH.—Cut and take out the seeds, but do not peel. Lay in a steamer and cook half an hour. Mash fine, season with a spoonful of butter, a teaspoonful of salt and a sprinkle of pepper to about a quart of squash.

POTATO SALAD.—As per rule in No. 2 of THE CONTINENT.

BATTER PUDDING.—One pint of milk, five eggs, two even cups of sifted prepared flour, one teaspoonful of salt. Beat the whites to a stiff froth and the yolks till creamy. Add yolks and salt to milk and then the flour, beating till perfectly smooth. Last stir in the whites; put batter in a buttered pudding-boiler, and boil one hour and a half. Serve at once, as it soon falls.

RASPBERRY SAUCE.—One cup and a half of powdered sugar, quarter of a cup of butter, one cup of raspberry juice, made by pressing fresh fruit, or one cup of raspberry jam. Stir butter to a cream, add the sugar and juice of one lemon, and last the raspberry juice or jam, beating all well together. Set on ice till wanted.

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

"WE want a rule for a good every-day pudding sauce; not too rich. Please give us one.—A. V. W., Roseville, N. J."

Ans.—Here is one which is very good:

MAINE PUDDING SAUCE.—One cup of sugar, one-quarter cup of butter or less, one egg, one tablespoonful of flour; beat all together to a cream. Pour on one cup of boiling water just before serving the pudding. Flavor with one teaspoonful of lemon or vanilla. If this is boiled a minute or two it is almost a custard, and nice to eat with boiled rice, or corn starch blanc mange.

"WILL you please inform one of your readers through your paper whether it is necessary for a gentleman, when sending out New Year cards, to have anything else engraved on the card but his name, and if so, what it is? By answering this you will greatly oblige

"E. O. C., New York."

Ans.—Nothing more than this is necessary, unless he chooses to add his address.

"WILL THE CONTINENT please inform me which is the best and latest book on etiquette, including latest style of wedding cards?"

Ans.—The latest is Mrs. Moulton's book on "Social Forms," soon to be published in "Our Continent Library."

"PLEASE answer a few questions for me in THE CONTINENT:

"1. How is 'Smearcase' (a dish of cream or curds) prepared?

"2. How is the dried or smoked beef of the North prepared?

"3. How is an English cottage constructed?

"Please answer these questions for AN OLD HOUSEKEEPER."

Ans.—1. Smearcase is simply milk which has curdled firmly, and is then to be poured into a pointed bag, and allowed to drip. When quite firm take out, and to a quart of the curd allow half a cup of cream, or a large spoonful of butter, with one teaspoonful of salt. Work all together thoroughly, and eat plain or with cream, for lunch or tea.

2. Dried beef is simply the lower part of the thigh, hung for several days to make it tender, then cured in pickle like corn beef; and, after three weeks' curing, hanging it in a smoke-house for a fortnight or so.

3. An English cottage is everything that an American one is not, having many rooms and being usually of stone. Southey, in his "The Devil's Walk," describes one well:

"He passed a cottage with a double coach-house,

A cottage of gentility;

And he owned with a grin

That his favorite sin

Is pride that apes humility."

HELEN CAMPBELL.

ALL-CONQUERING Cupid is fully recognized in this number of THE CONTINENT in view of the hosts of valentines that are now passing through the public mails. Rarely has a graceful fancy been done into appropriate verse more charmingly than in Miss De Vere's poem on the opening page, with its illustration from the dainty pencil of Jessie McDermott. In "The Bride of Saint Antonio," Miss Champney tells how the Boy shoots his dangerous arrows in Portugal under the robes of a calendered saint usually ascribed to Padua. At the end of the story Cupid has fallen into the clutches of the law, but, as we all know, the chances are that he will plant a winged shaft under the jerkin of his stern captor before being securely locked up. Even "Belinda" and "Hot Plowshares" honor the occasion by passages which may rejoice the "strong god's" heart; and when the reader drifts into "Lighter Vein," his sympathies will be awakened by Mr. Stull's silhouettes for "Miss Hardtosuit," and directed into a calmer mood by the rhymed prose of Oscar Max.

A BILL, whose fate is at this writing undecided, is before Congress providing for appropriations from the Treasury to aid in the erection of monuments of the battle-fields of the Revolution; but let not every locality which can point to a historical skirmish indulge the hope of an appropriation and a local monument. There is a saving clause in the bill as proposed, which stipulates that if the neighbors will raise five thousand dollars the Treasury will furnish a like sum. Should the bill be passed and signed by the President, there can be little doubt that monuments will be raised on almost every spot where an engagement of any importance occurred. From an artistic point of view, such a provision would be very desirable, as it would stimulate the development of a highly interesting form of art, which would bring out native talent and encourage artists to work up subjects of a national and patriotic character.

SINCE the publication of Mr. William Sloane Kennedy's "Undergraduate Life at Harvard," we have been in receipt of sundry inquiries concerning the proper rendering of a Latin phrase quoted as the motto which adorns the drop-curtain of "The Hasty Pudding Club"—Seges votis respondet. A consultation among the accomplished Latinists of THE CONTINENT staff developed at least four—possibly five—distinct opinions as to the correct meaning, and the editor, confident of having his own personal views confirmed, wrote, asking for the translation commonly accepted at Cambridge. Mr. Kennedy permits us to print the following:

"I thought I knew the exact meaning of Seges votis respondet; but your question set me to thinking and examining. Under respondere in Andrews' Latin Lexicon, I find a reference to Virgil, Georgics I, 47.

*'Illa seges demum votis respondet avari
Agricolæ, bis quæ solem, bis frigora sensit.'*

That is, 'the crop which has twice felt the sun and twice the cold will correspond to the wishes of the avaricious husbandman.' (The Romans, according to Theodore Ladewig, sometimes plowed a piece of land four times a year, once in each season, so that a crop raised on such land may be said to have twice felt the influence of the sun and twice that of the cold frost.) As applied by the students, in their use of it as a curtain motto, Seges votis respondet means, I take it, that the entertainment of the evening will be an artistic product which will meet the expectations of the audience. In other words, 'Prepare to grin, for we are going to give you a good thing.'

"There is also in the motto a subtle indirect appeal for the good wishes, or vows, of the audience. The entertainment will correspond to your wishes; and let us have your wishes for our success. Of course, also, there is appropriateness in the use of seges (corn) in the motto of a 'hasty-pudding club.'"

It is officially announced that an international art exhibition will be held in the Royal Crystal Palace at Munich during the coming summer, under the patronage of the King of Bavaria. American artists are invited to co-operate, and in view of the rapidly growing favor with which American work is regarded at home and abroad, it is desirable that it should be adequately represented. To this end, a committee or jury of admission has, we believe, been appointed, and steps have been taken to organize for a definite plan of operations. It is understood that the Munich authorities will insure all works authoritatively accepted, and will assume the expense of transportation. There can be no doubt that a worthy collection of oil paintings can be secured, and certainly in the line of etchings, engravings and black-and-white work generally, we can make a selection that will do us credit, no matter how high may be the general standard of the rest of the exhibition. The files of THE CONTINENT alone afford abundant evidence of progress in this direction.

FOR genuine and uncompromising selfishness the inconsiderate consumer of tobacco can give long odds to most of his fellow-citizens and still come out ahead. A notice conspicuously posted to the effect that no smoking is allowed may, it is true, prevent the overt act, but it does not prevent the retention between the fingers of a lighted cigar or cigarette, which is quite as offensive in a close car or waiting-room as actual smoking would be. The other form of consumption, involving expectation, is often even more obtrusively annoying to the cleanly minded than smoking, but the posters never take it into the account at all, and if they did, would probably be utterly ignored. Justice Morgan, of New York, lately earned the lasting gratitude of non-smokers, as well as of smokers who cultivate a reasonable respect for the comfort of others, by fining two street-car offenders $10 each and holding them in the sum of $300 apiece to behave themselves for six months. The managers of the elevated roads in New York have recently made a rule which prohibits burning tobacco in any shape in their cars, and if passengers will second these efforts by calling the attention of train officials to infractions of the rule, a nuisance will be abated and a wholesome school of manners established.

THE time is coming when the crusades of the nineteenth century will seem as distinctive a feature of its progress as any the middle ages held. They are in most cases individual ones, it is true, and the knights have seldom other title than "Our Special Correspondent," but the spirit of adventure burns in every one, and hardships are endured that would have appalled the knights of an elder day, whose work was mostly accomplished under approving eyes, and who had every stimulus that love or ambition, or that combination of all noble and ignoble passions and emotions that seem to have made up the spirit of chivalry, could afford.

The gallant Irishman whose adventures fill two bulky volumes,¹ made up with the finish and elegance which characterizes the Putnams' publications, is not only daring but of sufficiently generous nature to acknowledge in the beginning that the plan of the undertaking did not originate with him. As in other well-known cases, Mr. J. R. Robinson, the managing editor of the London Daily News, furnished both opportunity and means, and the result is a record of an experience in many points quite as new and individual as that of Palgrave.

It is unfortunate that with such an experience Mr. O'Donovan had not also been master of a more brilliant style. He is always natural and straightforward, but he is also very diffuse, and his record, while photographic in minuteness and accuracy, has the unsatisfactoriness of a photograph, light and shade being almost entirely wanting. Setting aside this defect the work is of great interest, being constantly enlivened with curious bits of personal experience and countless illustrative anecdotes. The journey was undertaken at the beginning of the Afghan campaign, the starting point for Mr. O'Donovan's long wandering being Trebizond, on the Black Sea, which place he left in February, 1879, for Tiflis, Batoum and Baku, on the western shore of the Caspian. Distrust in his purposes followed every stage of his progress. He traveled with the staff of General Lazareff in its voyage across the Caspian, visited many remote points on the eastern shore of that sea, and was suddenly ordered back to pass the winter in Baku. From this place he went to the Persian frontier, and remained some months in and near Asterabad, constantly seeking to propitiate the suspicious Russians and obtain permission to follow the army. The story of these efforts is one of extraordinary interest, and every reader rejoices in the hardly-won advantages he gains here and there, notably, witnessing with his field-glass the great victory of Skoboleff in January, 1881, with the flight of the Akhal Tekkés after the battle.

The Cossacks who scoured the whole country made Askabad unsafe, and he went finally to Merv, where an enforced stay of nearly six months gave him a minute knowledge of life and people, such as no other European traveler has yet attained. His release from what was practically imprisonment came finally, and with this the book ends, leaving a distinct impression of a very powerful personality. Had Mr. O'Donovan had a little more of the sense of humor supposed to be the birthright of all Irishmen, he might have made much more of many situations. There are gleams of it here and there, but, as a whole, he seems to have been weighted by the necessity for painful accuracy, and whenever he falls into easy-going narrative pulls himself up to verify facts which need no expansion. But interesting passages abound, especially when the Merv episode begins, as in the description of his own personal appearance on entering the town:

"So far as my personal appearance went I might have passed for anything. I wore an enormous tiara of grayish-black sheepskin, eighteen inches in height. Over my shoulders was a drenched leopard skin, beneath which could be seen my travel-stained, much-worn ulster overcoat. My legs were caparisoned in long black boots, armed with great steel spurs, appendages utterly unknown in Turkestan. A sabre and revolving carbine completed my outfit. Some people may wonder that I openly presented myself in the midst of the Tekké population, among whom the nature of my reception was at best doubtful, in such a garb as this, and why I did not assume a style of dress more in keeping with the custom of the country. I had considered this matter carefully before deciding upon the irrevocable step toward Merv. I could speak Jagatal fairly well, and my sun-tanned countenance and passably lengthy beard offered no extraordinary contrast to that of an inhabitant, but my accent and a thousand other little circumstances, not to speak of the indiscretion of my servants, whom I knew perfectly well it was utterly useless to pledge to secrecy, would have been enough to infallibly betray me. To appear in Turcoman costume, or in any other which tended to conceal my real nationality and character would, under the circumstances, have been to court almost certain destruction. I have to congratulate myself upon having adopted the course I did, for subsequently, when taxed with having a covert and hostile mission to Merv, I was able to plead that in coming there I had made no attempt at a disguise, and that my servants, one of whom was of their own race, could speak as to the character in which I resided in Derguez. I dismounted at the door of a hut to which my horse was peremptorily led, and in view of the attitude of the people, I for the first time fully realized the risks which at the commencement of my venture I had so gayly faced—at best, captivity for an indefinite period. Nevertheless, I was so delighted to have reached my long-sought destination, and to be at Merv at last, in spite of all the difficulties which the nature of the ground, the efforts of adversaries and the jealousy of the population had cast in my way, that my pleasurable emotions overcame all others. Here I was, at last, in the heart of the Turcoman territory. Let the future take care of itself."

The Tekké character is in many points a highly unpleasant one, and while in some respects identical with most of the wandering races of Turkestan, so vividly described by Mr. Schuyler, has one or two special peculiarities, excessive gluttony being the strongest. One of the most characteristic experiences is in connection with Mr. O'Donovan's mail:

"The courier who brought Baghur Khan's message to Kouchid Khan Kala also brought with him several newspapers which had been forwarded to me from Teheran, via Meshed. They were, I believe, the first of their kind that had ever been seen in the place. That same evening a literal 'gathering of the clans' took place within my redoubt, and inside the ex itself, to witness the unfolding of these wonderful documents. There was a ludicrous misapprehension as to the nature of these papers. As I have already stated, Turcomans have but little idea of the value of gold, their currency being almost entirely of silver. Of paper money they have but a very shadowy notion indeed. They first became aware of its existence through having seized some Russian paper roubles when raiding upon the lines of communication between Bami and Geok Tepé. Matthi, the principal Jew dealer of Merv, being, like all of his race, thoroughly au fait on financial matters, readily purchased these rouble notes, but at a ridiculously low price, giving about two kranas for a ten-rouble (£1 sterling) note. That a flimsy piece of paper should be worth even two kranas was a source of wonder to the Turcomans, but, as they received value for it, they concluded that it must have some mysterious virtue of its own. They took my newspapers to be of the same nature, and as they were much larger than the rouble notes, they thought that they must be of vast value indeed. The general impression appeared to be that the first remittance of public funds from the English Padishah had arrived. It would have been amusing, had it not been dangerous, to witness the extreme disappointment displayed upon their countenances when I told them that the documents in question were simply rooz naméh, or newspapers. The cunning old ex-vizir, however, felt quite satisfied that they were paper money, and that my statement to the other effect was made simply in order to throw dust in their eyes, and thus guarantee my own secure possession of the money."

On the whole, O'Donovan's ride to Merv is an example of as splendid pluck as the story of any war correspondent holds, and the book is a valuable addition to a literature which is fast making itself large space in every library

(1) THE MERV OASIS. Travels and Adventures East of the Caspian During the Years of 1879-80-81, Including Five Months' Residence Among the Tekkés of Merv. By Edmund O'Donovan, Special Correspondent of the Daily News. With Portrait, Maps and Fac-similes of State Documents. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 502, 500; $5.00. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

THE "Parchment Library," which D. Appleton & Co. reproduce for this country, is to add Mr. Tennyson's poems in two volumes. The series has met with very great favor.

THE late Mr. Darwin was very fond of Mrs. Oliphant's novels, of which, by the way, there are now some fifty in existence, and always insisted that in time she would be far more appreciated than at present.

JANUARY is always, fortunately for worn-out readers and reviewers, a quiet month in the book trade, the most important publication for the month being undoubtedly the correspondence of Carlyle and Emerson by J. R. Osgood & Co.

A DESCRIPTIVE and historical catalogue of the works of Murillo and Velasquez is to be published by J. W. Bouton & Co. Two limited editions are to be issued, one in large paper, and the volume is to include many illustrative etchings, an excellent index and exhaustive information concerning both pictures and painters.

TEN BRINK'S "Early English Literature" has been translated by Professor H. M. Kennedy, and is issued by Henry Holt & Co., whose name is always a guarantee of something worth reading. The same firm have a pretty edition of the poems of Mr. E. W. Gosse, who has many American admirers, and who has dedicated the little volume to Mr. R. W. Gilder.

MISS SWANWICK'S translation of Goethe's "Faust," with notes by the Rev. Dr. F. H. Hedge, has taken rank as a careful and faithful rendering of the great poem. Thomas Y. Crowell & Co. have issued it in a red-line edition, bound in American tree-calf, with various illustrations, the attractive size and form making it a most desirable addition to the library. (12mo, pp. 455, $2.50).

THE editors of Life deserve final success, whether they attain it or not. Its appearance is very thoroughly in its favor, the illustrations are far beyond the average, and while its fun suggests that of La Vie Parisienne, it has none of the questionable character of the latter sheet. It is far in advance of Puck, both in make-up and literary merit, and every reader will wish it a long and prosperous life.

HIRAM SIBLEY & Co., of Rochester, have added a new feature to their Seed Catalogue for 1883, in a series of condensed essays on the culture of special crops and garden plants, all written by specialists. In the present interest in American forestry the article on the care and planting of tree seeds, by Dr. John A. Warder, has an especial value. The names are also given in French, German and Spanish; there is a complete price list, and thus it will be an easy matter for native or foreigner to make a selection of what is wanted, being sure that if directions are followed success is tolerably certain.

THE long uncertainty as to whether the common sense of the United States, as represented by its Congress at Washington, is at last over, and the invaluable Franklin collection of Mr. Henry Stevens is in Mr. Lowell's hands. The collection, which will shortly be sent to Washington, contains Franklin's first work on "Liberty and Necessity," of which the author printed only one hundred copies, gave three or four away, and destroyed all the rest, except one copy annotated by Lyon. Among the MSS. is the duplicate copy of the last petition of Congress to the King, signed by Washington and all the members of the Continental Congress.

A BEAUTIFUL and profusely illustrated edition of the Sir Roger De Coverly portion of "The Spectator" has been reprinted from the English one by D. Appleton & Co. (Square 16mo, pp. 194, $1.50.) There is a perennial charm in these descriptive essays, and every lover of the gentle knight will welcome this compact and dainty presentation of his life and death. Their parchment edition of Shakspeare's works has also received another volume, and one a month will be issued till the twelve are complete. The present one contains "Comedy of Errors," "Much Ado about Nothing," "Love's Labour Lost," and "Midsummer's Night's Dream." (18mo, pp. 311, $1).

BY the time this number is in the hands of the readers of THE CONTINENT a number of the best portraits by Hubert Herkomer, A. R. A., will be on view in this city in the galleries of Messrs. Earle & Son. Mr. Herkomer is in this country for a short rest from his great labors of some years past, and is welcomed by his old friends and admirers, and many others who only know of him by the interesting and almost romantic histories the artistic and daily papers have given of him and his work. Besides the portraits of Ruskin, Joachim, Forbes, Mr. Herkomer's father and one or two others, he has brought to this country quite a number of his own etchings and engravings, which are with the portraits, and present a most remarkable ensemble of works of one artist, all breathing the purest and most unadulterated love of his profession.

"THE NATURE AND FORM OF THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT FOUNDED IN THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION," is the title of a little book by the Hon. George Shea, Chief Justice of the Marine Court of New York. The substance of its pages was contained in an address before the General Theological Seminary of the United States, delivered a few months ago. Its occasion, the writer says, is due to the fact that "a class of erratic-minded religionists refuse to accept public trusts or to sit even as jurors," on the ground that "the Constitution omits to establish that God exists." His argument proceeds upon the assumption that the Constitution of the United States is the express image of the common law and the Magna Charta of England. The monograph abounds in historic lore, and contains copious notes and an appendix. (16mo, pp. 82, 75 cents; Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston).

"PICTURESQUE SCOTLAND IN LAY AND LEGEND, SONG AND STORY," from the press of John Wiley & Sons, is an interesting volume on that romantic country which must always possess a charm for the American. It is written and compiled by Francis Watt and Andrew Carter, who write of their native land con amore, though in a somewhat fragmentary manner. All the myths, lays and legends of Scotia have been freely drawn upon; in fact, it would make an admirable guide-book to the land of Scott and Burns. We see again the ruined chapels and palaces, the crags and lochs, from the border-land to John O' Groat's, including all the battle-fields, and the homes and haunts of heroes and poets. We are then taken over to the outlying islands of Skye and the Shetland, the Ultima Thule of the novelist. It is a pity that a book comprising so much should not present a handsomer typographical appearance. The paper is poor, the margins narrow, while the wood engravings, which are numerous, seem singularly coarse when contrasted with American art. (8vo, pp. 511, $2.50).

TO very many in every state of the Union, "Vick's Floral Guide" became a real friend, and there was reason for the feeling—a feeling engendered always by any strong personality in any work which brings it in contact with people. And so when, in 1882, the death of James Vick was announced, a general mourning followed. The genial, gentle soul of the man had been felt in many directions, and he labored each year to have the catalogue, which represented very inadequately his enormous business, more and more perfect in every point. The sons, who have grown up with the desire to carry out the many plans of the father, seem well nigh as enthusiastic, and the beautiful catalogue for 1883 is as perfect a piece of work as the father could have desired. Time has tested the merit of the work so thoroughly that no word is necessary, there being absolute certainty that both seed, and direction for using it, will be as precisely what is needed as the most helpless of amateurs could ever desire.

FIVE little collections of poems of varying degrees of merit are on the table, but all bearing witness to the facility with which the educated American, and, above all, the educated American woman, rhymes. In the present case but two of the authors are women. "Verses," by Kate Vannah (pp. 117, $1.00; J. B. Lippincott & Co.), is of the order of musical, tender, half-melancholy feeling, of which we have so many examples. There is unusual vigor in some of the sonnets, but all are poems of feeling, very delicate, but with little to remember. Of a somewhat lighter order is "A Symphony in Dreamland," by Alice E. Lord (16mo, pp. 90, $1.00; G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York). The verses are graceful, the thought womanly and sweet, and to friends the book will have a value the general public cannot see. "Songs of an Idle Hour," by William J. Coughlin (16mo, pp. 214, $1.00; A. Williams & Co., Boston), is most of it barely tolerable, with now and then a lapse into intolerable verse. A busy hour might better have been spent in pruning and polishing. "Elfrida," by Dyson Rishell (16mo, pp. 146, $1.00; J. B. Lippincott & Co.), is a drama of early Saxon life, but has no good reason to show for being in existence. Last on the list is "Poems," by Ernest Warburton Shurtleff (pp. 141, $1.00; A. Williams & Co., Boston). Mr. Hezekiah Butterworth has written an introduction, in which he describes the poems as "a bouquet of wild flowers plucked by a young hand," and he is right. Youth and spring and all sights and sounds of the open air are in them, and a spiritual quality also, which sets them above ordinary work. The opening pages are far inferior to the final ones, and better editing would have insured the rejection of some bald and poor verses, but, as a whole, true poetry is in them, and if the promise of the little volume holds good there is better work to come. ($1.00, pp. 141; A. Williams & Co., Boston).

PROFESSOR VERRILL says of the bones of vertebrates: "Very rarely do we meet with them at a distance from the coast. Although the waters along the Gulf Stream slope, off the southern coast of New England, swarm with vast schools of fishes, while sharks and a large sea-porpoise or dolphin occur in large numbers, we have very rarely indeed dredged up any of their bones, or, in fact, remains of any other vertebrate animals. In a few instances we have dredged a single example of a shark's tooth, and occasionally the hard otoliths of fishes. It is certain that not merely the flesh, but most of the bones also, of all vertebrates that die in this region are very speedily devoured by the various animals that inhabit the bottom. Echini are very fond of fish-bones, which they rapidly consume. Relics of man and his works are of extremely rare occurrence at a distance from the coast, or outside of harbors, with the exception of the clinkers and fragments of coal thrown overboard from steamers with the ashes. As our dredgings are in the track of European steamers such materials are not rare. A few years ago even these would not have occurred. A rock forming on this sea-bottom would, therefore, contain little evidence of the existence of man, or even of the existence of the commonest fishes and cetaceans inhabiting the same waters."

THE advance in the project of lighting railway carriages by electricity is most gratifying. On the Eastern Railroad of France there is a Gramme dynamo machine driven by the locomotive and Faure accumulators. To these has recently been added an "automatic interrupter," the action of which is to break all communication between the Gramme machine and the accumulators when the speed of the train descends below the normal. Further, if the lamps are lit at such a time, or when stoppage occurs, the automatic apparatus substitutes the accumulators for the machine, or reciprocally: the moment of change is not perceptible. When the train is running without the lamps being lit, the Gramme machine charges the accumulators exclusively; when the train is lit, the machine feeds both the lamps and the accumulators. It is only when the illuminated train slackens speed or stops that the accumulators supply the current required by the lamps, and this is restored when the train has assumed its normal speed. Thus the accumulators are not so cumbersome as if they had sufficient capacity to feed the lamps during the whole journey. There is a Swan lamp in each compartment. The train is lighted by the guard on entering a tunnel. The cost for an ordinary train of thirty-six lamps is about twelve francs a day, whereas the lighting with oil costs thirty-six francs and was very imperfect.

THE growth of the dairy interests in France of late years is quite surprising. Statistics show that France produces enough milk to form a stream one metre (forty inches) wide and a third of a metre deep, flowing at the rate of one metre per second, day and night, throughout the year. The young animals consume a part of this enormous volume of milk, the French people drink another large part, while the remainder is converted into butter and cheese. No branch of agricultural industry in France has made greater progress during the last fifty years than the manufacture of butter. In 1833 France purchased from abroad 1320 tons of butter, and exported only 1210 tons. To-day matters are greatly changed. The quantity of butter exported has increased to eleven or twelve times the quantity just mentioned, while there are received from other countries, chiefly from England, more than 100,000,000 francs. La Manche alone furnishes more than a third of the total product of butter for exportation.

At a recent fair, held in Worcestershire, Messrs. Crowther Brothers & Co. exhibited a watch, in perfect running order, constructed wholly of iron. The object of this curiosity was to illustrate the malleability of iron and its consequent adaptation to a wide variety of novel uses, especially as an advantageous substitute for glass in a large number of domestic articles. Such articles when made of thin iron plate possess the two desirable properties of strength and lightness, while elegance of form is far more easily attained. Such articles may be easily electroplated with silver, gold, nickel, platinum, or adorned with all the beauty of the enameler's art.

THE opinion seems to be gaining ground in England that London fogs exert a much more injurious effect upon health than was formerly supposed. Official statistics show that during the week ending December 16th no fewer than six hundred and thirty-seven persons died in London from diseases of the respiratory organs, "under the influence of the almost continuous fog." And on December 20th the Pull Mall Gazette said: "It is quite possible, judging from past experience, that to-day's fog may cost us as many lives as Tel-el-Kebir, and that the fogs of December may be fatal to as many subjects of the Queen as the whole of the Egyptian campaign."

Knight, author of "The Mechanical Dictionary," died in Bellefontaine, Ohio. —Charles Delano, lawyer, and formerly member of Congress, died at Northampton, Mass. —A large fire occurred at Coshocton, Ohio; loss, $80,000; Hay's Iron and Steel Works were destroyed.

THE DRAMA.

MR. WYNDHAM prophesies that Mr. Irving will be a great success here, and that he will be especially admired as "Benedick" in "Much Ado about Nothing," and as "Mathias" in "The Bells."

M. VICTOR HUGO has given his permission to the young French composer, M. Massenet, to write an opera on his novel of "Notre Dame de Paris." The libretto will be adapted from the dramatization of the work already made by M. Paul Meurice.

MR. JOHN T. RAYMOND's new play, "In Paradise," is generally condemned by the press, but gives evidence of becoming as popular with the public as the "Gilded Age." "Major Bob Belter, sah!" tickles the risibilities as did "Colonel Mulberry Sellers."

MISS MARY ANDERSON was offered a six weeks' engagement at the Lyceum Theatre, London, next season, during Mr. Irving's absence in this country. It was declined, however, Miss Anderson wisely determining that several years' additional experience would better qualify her to undergo the ordeal of London criticism, laden as it is with the national prejudice against all things American.

OFFICIAL returns place the number of theatres in Europe at 1457, divided as follows: 348 in Italy, 337 in France, 194 in Germany, 160 in Spain, 150 in Great Britain, 132 in Austria and Hungary, 44 in Russia, 34 in Belgium, 22 in Holland, 20 in Switzerland, 18 in Sweden and Norway, 16 in Portugal, 10 in Denmark, 4 in Turkey, and 4 in Greece.

THE veteran actor, Mr. C. W. Couldock, whose fine performance of "Dunstan Kirke" will be recalled by so many, returns to England the coming summer, after an absence of twenty years, but will return in the autumn to curse poor "Hazel Kirke" again. Mr. Couldock is widely known as a gentleman of marked generosity and worthiness of character, coupled with a sterling ability as an actor.

To a request of the editor of the Globe-Democrat of St. Louis to Mrs. Langtry, that she favor him with details of her early life, the lady complied, and closed a frank, clever letter thus: "This is my whole story. Since I arrived here my life has been a public one; I have had nothing to conceal and have nothing to excuse, content in the belief that falsehood and malignity will in the end defeat themselves without effort on my part."

MR. JOHN GILBERT was invited by the Boston Gazette to write his reminiscences of the stage, but declined, giving as his excuse that having for so long only studied while other people did the writing, he feared if he attempted to do the writing he would "surely make a mess of it," and added: "Should I attempt to give an idea of the stage in former times, it would not be very complimentary to the present state of the drama. No doubt I am by many called an old fogey. I am not annoyed by the term. Seeing what I have seen, and seeing what I see, when theatres are crowded to witness the feeble attempts of notoriety, when sterling plays by talented and experienced artists are neglected, the stage is indeed in a deplorable condition."

The Duty of Falling in Love.

A RHYMING VIEW OF THE MATTER.

THE modern Corydon and Amaryllis are just like those of old, a pair of sillies. They love short interviews with danger nigh; they understand the language of the eye; they doat on moonlight and the murmuring sea; and they agree that nothing in the world is half so sweet as those brief moments when they chance to meet, and squeeze each other's hands upon the sands, while o'er the ocean the red sun goes down, and seems to leave them with a jealous frown. Then, if the night be very still and calm, they venture arm-in-arm with stolen steps to stroll along the beach, bereft of speech, but sighing now and then, as though a heart at every sigh were roughly rent apart, and glancing with those glances which explain so very much when words would all be vain. But, as the moon arises, speech returns. He whispers how his soul with passion burns; he states his case with some exaggeration, and, in the ecstasy of admiration, he sometimes kneels upon the silver strand to ask her for her hand;—but only if the sand be dry and clean,—in which case there's a most romantic scene. She blushes, hesitates, and, maybe, says some low soft words which seem at once to raise his spirits and himself; for, full of bliss, he rises, like a trout, to catch a kiss.

Poor fish, safe hooked! But no! It cannot be that in the after seasons she or he will e'er regret those moments sentimental, when he appeared so good and she so gentle!

Then back they steal, with frequent halts for kissing, half terrified lest friends may find them missing; and in the morning he takes heart to call on her papa and shyly tells him all. The meek confession leads to inquisition respecting both his income and condition; and when all queries have been satisfied, the swain may call the maid his future bride. We must believe that thenceforth all is honey, although the cynics cruelly deny it, and hint at strife o'er bills and pocket-money for those who, charmed by matrimony, try it. The man will smoke, they say, the wife object; the wife will flirt or join some vicious sect; in fine, according to these dismal sages, the fairest books contain some blotted pages. Perhaps they do; but he who wins a beauty may keep her if he bravely does his duty; and not a shaft from hell, or heaven above, can slay the soul that shields its life with love. He must be strong and kind, and never weak, and she will give him all his hopes can seek; until, at last, the two together grown, her thoughts in all things will reflect his own. For man is crude and useless at creation; he is but fashioned as a complement, and learns, by little short of inspiration, that to perfect his being he is sent into the world. His guide is inclination, and by a miracle his gaze is bent one day upon the woman counterpart whom destiny has moulded to his heart. Felices ter et amplius, says Flaccus, quos tenet copula irrupta. I agree with him that sorrows seldom wrack us, and that in happiness we live and die when kindly Fate is good enough to tack us to the right object; but I can't deny that sometimes Fate refuses to eliminate that object, and is rather indiscriminate. There are, in fact, bad marriages as well as sweetmeats which are poisonous and kill—the marriages concocted deep in hell by fiends whose chiefest object is to still in human breasts all craving after good;—fiends who'd abolish virtue if they could. Such marriages are based on admiration, without respect or knightly veneration, on greed for wealth, on need of high position, and on vain hopes of bettering condition; but love alone can render marriage lawful, or lead to consequences less than awful.

And who may sneer at woman? Not the brother, and not the son of any loving mother! She gives us life and tenderness and love; and who can give us more save heaven above? The lover, ling'ring o'er his first-love's kiss, dreams that a woman as an angel is; but, though an angel has been seen by no man, I often think an angel is a woman. What can be brighter, what can be more fair, than she who stands with rippling, sun-kissed hair; with perfect form, with dimpled, downy cheeks, with ruddy lips whereof the silence speaks—the brilliant picture that has often moved before the eyes of him who e'er has loved? She may be weak; but who would have her strong? The wish would do her grace and beauty wrong! She may have faults, but if she had them not, she would not be on earth to share the lot of faulty man, to whom she has been given that he may school himself for life in heaven.

Then let us honor her and hold her dear as some rare starry guest among us here; as some rare guest from regions far and still, who must be shielded from the rough world's ill. 'Twill not be labor lost, for woman knows no fears, no obstacles and no repose, when she is truly loved, until the debt to its last fraction has been fully met. 'Twill not be labor lost, for Paradise, once forfeited, may be regained by him who, spite of woman's mood and woman's whim, to her for all his peace and comfort flies. In her soft arms his earthly heaven lies. Her own sweet lips his full forgiveness speak. The man who loves may err in being weak, but he who does not love cannot be wise.

Thus all should love, as nature bids them do; the nightingale trills out his tale at night, the timid doves their peaceful passions coo; and nature's self respects the Love-god's might; for is there anything on earth that's single? And willows bend across the streamlet's breast, while streamlets with the stronger rivers mingle, and in the ocean rivers find their rest. Loving is living, and the perfect life is found by him who wins a loving wife.

PENNSYLVANIA HOSPITAL WITHIN THE GATES.

THE BETTERING-HOUSE AND SOME OTHER CHARITIES.

ACCORDING to the old geographies, Philadelphia used to be noted for "her markets, her clean streets, and her charities." The markets still sustain their reputation, and let a Philadelphian go where he must when he dies, he wishes to go home for his dinner. The streets speak for themselves, and what they say in dirt and cobblestones is plain to every one; but only the tax-payer knows what it costs to keep them smelling so badly and so out of repair.

The old geographies, however, knew little of the charities of the city as they now exist. The Philadelphian is fond of classification and organization. If he has anything to do, he likes to make a little society for that specific purpose, and to have the proper officers and a suitable number of members. After the organization is completed, a constitution adopted and printed in a neat little pamphlet, he is ready to go to work. In this way he multiplies societies for charitable as for all other purposes. For each misery and each misfortune the city has its separate relief. It has a home for old men and another for old women, and another still for married old men and women, and will yet, perhaps, discriminate between the old man who is a bachelor and the one who is a widower. The woman who has a baby to take care of does not go to the refuge intended for the one whose child has reached the traveler's majority of four years; and if she has no child at all, she repairs to a third relief fund. There is a legacy left to the city for the purchase of wood for widows, and—as if to prove that no misfortune is without compensation—preference is given to those whose poverty is due to dissolute husbands. The applicant must herself be sober and honest, but the less her departed lord shared in these virtues the better for her. The testator who made this provision went still further. Supposing in his innocence that the number of candidates properly qualified might some time fail, and so leave a balance unprovided for, he ordered that whatever was left should be spent in warm clothing for the "oldest and barest" discharged from the hospital and "Bettering-House," evidently having great compassion for the wrecks in life. For the opposite class—the people who mean to help themselves—Benjamin Franklin and John Scott, of Edinburg, made provision. Each of these energetic men left $5000 for a fund to be used in loans to young married artificers who were qualified for acceptance by certain conditions.

On the twenty-third of February the city keeps the birthday of John Scott by giving twelve dollars' worth of bread to the needy, but never more than two loaves to one family.

This minute classification makes relief easy for those who have mastered the art of dividing goats and sheep at a glance, but it complicates the work of the historian. Who can tell the story of the charities of any great city, and who can do justice to the energy and the goodness that originates and keeps them all at work?

The founders of Philadelphia made no provision for such a host of charities. They fancied that in such a fair and fertile land no one need suffer who could work, and there would always be help for the sick and aged, and support for the young. Emigrants themselves, they did not foresee what emigration was to mean in after days, and certainly no one of them expected paupers to come of their own line.

Still it was not very long before organized help was needed, but it came in a shape that tells what Old Philadelphia meant by "charity." An ancient Quaker tailor, John Martin, dying in 1702, twenty years after the city was founded, left a lot of ground between Third and Fourth and Spruce and Walnut Streets, to three of his friends. He said nothing in his will of the purpose to which it was to be devoted, but his honest old cronies evidently understood, and they at once built a long, quaint house on the Walnut Street front, opening southward, however, on the green field. The Monthly Meeting took charge of the place, and here sent certain of the poorer members who needed help. After a time they built little one-storied cottages, with a garret in each steep roof, and with a great chimney outside. These were ranged in order on either side of a green lane; each had its little garden, and here bloomed fruit, trees and flowers. None of the people who lived here were paupers. Some had a little money, and all worked who could. Two or three old women had little schools, and another—because of the natural law that forces a river to run by a city, and builds a school near a confectioner—made molasses candy. A watchmaker hung some forlorn old turnip time-pieces in one of the Walnut Street windows, and the herbs raised in the gardens had a virtue peculiar to themselves.

As the city grew around them this small village became greener and sweeter. Little by little high brick houses arose around it; the streets leading thither were all paved, and the city beat about it as an ocean about a lagoon. The only entrance was now up a little alleyway, and he who strayed in there unknowing what he would find must have rubbed his eyes and fancied himself bewitched. He came out of noise and traffic, from bustle and business, and suddenly everything was still; the air was filled with the perfume of roses, bees were humming, old men were sitting smoking their pipes under grape arbors, and old Quaker ladies were bending over beds of sweet marjoram and lavender. To awake and find one's self at the gates of Damascus was commonplace to this.

If the stranger was fond of Longfellow he stood still, and he smiled, because he knew the place at once, and he would gently murmur:

"Then in the suburbs it stood, in the midst of meadows and woodlands;

Now the city surrounds it; but still with its gateway and wicket.

Meek in the midst of splendor, its humble walls seem to echo

Softly the words of the Lord, 'The poor ye have always with you.'

Then would one of these peaceful old men arise, and he too would smile, because he too knew, and he would show the stranger the little vine-covered house to which Gabriel was taken, and then the place where he was buried. "It was all true," he said, "and Henry Longfellow did but put it into verse." The stranger found it good to be there. Few pilgrimages rewarded so well, because this asked nothing of imagination, and before he left he took an ivy leaf from the house—he bought rosemary for a remembrance. If he was an artist he made a sketch of the place, and if he was a writer he published a description of it.

Every one who knew "Evangeline" knew of the "Old Quaker Almshouse" in Philadelphia, and the story not only gave the inmates a certain importance in their own and others' eyes, but it added many a thrifty penny to their income. But what proof this pretty tale gave of an imaginative memory! These clear-eyed old people knew perfectly well that a fever-stricken patient never was nor never would have been taken into their asylum. They knew Evangeline never crossed their little yard nor entered their wicket, and that there was no grave sacred to the wanderer's memory in their inclosure. They knew all about the "Bettering-House," once up Spruce Street a few blocks away, and about the fever patients there, and the nuns who nursed them. It had also once stood in the midst of meadows, but when the pilgrims came looking for the true Mecca, behold it was all destroyed and built up as a city in bricks and cobble-stones; and then the old Quakers, leaning over their wicket, beckoned the seekers away to a harmless delusion.

If these thrifty people had only known it, nothing could have been more quaint than their own life, and, in a way, it had its own poetry, and needed little help from imagination. There was one woman who went in a child of eight and stayed until she died at eighty-four, and she must have known about as much of the world she left as could be revealed to an observant and caged canary. They had their ghost and their strange noises, and when the last house was torn down a skull was turned up from the mould, and that explained much, if it did not tell its own story. They had their traditions, and as house after house was taken away and the city steadily stole in, they told stories of the times when "Walnut Place" was in its glory, and had its aristocracy and a drab-colored brilliancy. Then, at last, the one remaining house was torn down, the last rose-bush rooted up, and a few exiles, turning away, went into a greater solitude in going into the crowded, noisy town.

This idea of a rural workhouse, which was not to be a mere almshouse, runs through the early history of Philadelphia. The people had no idea of maintaining paupers, and when they found it was a possibility they determined to make pauperism a disgrace. In 1718 the man who chose to exist on public charity had to also accept a penalty, and, with each member of his family, he was obliged to wear on his right sleeve a badge made of red or blue cloth, on which was a great "P," and the initial letter of the district giving him relief. It was not pleasant to be a pauper in old Philadelphia. To be poor was another matter, and a man could keep his self-respect and his neighbors' esteem if he earned what he ate, but it required courage to take public alms. But plenty of the thriftless had this courage of their laziness, and there were also sick people and helpless old men and women. Still the citizen was taken care of by his neighbors, and sick strangers were lodged in empty houses; but as the population increased the almshouse was needed, and so in 1731 it was founded. A lot of ground between Spruce and Pine and Third and Fourth, just below the Quaker Almshouse, and in view of the new church of St. Peter's, on Society Hill, bought a large tract of land on the same line between Spruce and Pine, but about Ninth. Here was a good orchard, fine forest trees, and plenty of ground for a small farm. They built a sufficiently commodious house in the midst of the meadows, over which ran narrow foot-paths, and the place had soon the air of a public institution. There was a steward and a matron, out-door agents and some resident physicians. It was really a great comfort to many of the appreciative people who liked a "Bettering-House" to justify its title, and so they crowded in, and had the best they could get. There was a main building and two wings. In the first, there was on the lower floor the offices; on the second the steward, or governor, and the doctors were accommodated; then on the next floor came the sick, and on the fourth the insane, and next the roof another class of sick. The paupers were in the wings—the women in was chosen. On Spruce Street there was a gateway, but whoever came over the meadow from Third went in by an X stile. Here were lodged the poor, the sick and the insane, and the common misfortune of poverty put them on an equality even of treatment. After a time it was seen that the sick must have separate accommodations, and the arrangements made for them, which likely enough amounted to little more than a sick ward, taking in "accidents," and under the charge of visiting physicians, have a historical interest, as they resulted in the founding of the first hospital in the colonies. It afterward was removed to High Street, near Fifth, and soon it appears to have ceased being a municipal charity.

Then, as constantly happened with public institutions in those days, the Almshouse was no sooner well established than it had to be moved. Penn had a prophetic knowledge of the possible extent of his city, but as it grew the centre of business was necessarily constantly pushing westward, and also southward, and so all private and charitable interests had to yield and go still further out. The ground at Third and Pine became valuable, and the Almshouse had to go to the country. It was now under the charge of a private corporation "For the Relief and Employment of the Poor," and it one, the men in the other. The children were sent to the "Yellow Cottage," down in that part of the city known as "The Neck." All seems to have gone smoothly until about the close of the Revolution, when the corporation failed, and that historical body, "The Guardians of the Poor," took its place, and entered upon its prerogative of making the pauper a stepping-stone to higher things for itself.

From this time the charities of the city began to multiply. After the war there was an undercurrent of misery, sickness and poverty to be relieved. The old neighborhood feeling had disappeared in the changes and increase of population, and after 1800 the immigration of people who had to be taken care of until they found occupation became a declared burden. People gave here and there, and all sorts of bequests were made to the public charities. Some testators provided for soup, and some for bread, but more for fuel. It became almost as comfortable out of the "Bettering-House" as in it, if only the needy person was ingenious enough to hold the proper threads in his hand. His support was made easier by the division of the present city into districts. The pauper who preferred out-door relief to the conditions imposed at the "Bettering-House" got his soup in the city and carried it home; then he took a little walk to Southwark and asked for his bread, ordered his wood in the Northern Liberties, and probably had a coat or a wig given to him as he went home. The only difficulty he had arose from the constant increase in his class, so that by-and-by the beggars interfered with each other, and none of them liked it. Then there came another trouble. The mendicants began to educate their patrons, and this was a serious evil, and never intended by them. The people who gave found that no one seemed any better for it all. They themselves certainly were not, because constant failures disheartened and irritated them. Give and do what they would, they never got the better of poverty, and their alms, their legacies, all seemed like dragon seed, and only brought forth a large and undesirable crop of greater evils. They were forever multiplying relief by beggars, and finding the result destitution.

In 1831 came a hard, terrible winter of storms and bitter cold, and in 1832 the cholera. During these years the charitable had to work, and had to give, but they also thought. They were benevolent, but that did not also necessitate their being stupid; and our mothers and fathers puzzled over evils which we have fancied peculiar to our own day, and decided upon the same remedies.

There was one good woman, Mrs. Esther Moore, a Public Friend, who thought seriously on these matters. She remembered the days when each one knew his neighbor's needs, and she felt that the thing to do was to restore neighborhood relations. The rich, she thought, ought to educate the poor, and teach them many things they did not know in the way of thrift, of industry, of cleanliness and independence. It was not always the fault of the poor when they were paupers, and she believed in education as well as regeneration.

Like most women, she did not theorize on the question that interested her, but began to experiment. She selected four blocks down town in a neighborhood where the classes were mixed, and she set to work to make the personal acquaintance of each one living there. Her next step was to make the poor known to the better off, and to persuade the latter to each take a certain number under their care. The poor were not only to be helped to work, but they were to be shown better and more thrifty ways. Their homes were to be made cleaner and more comfortable; the children were to be sent to school. The real charity was to be given in constant influence and supervision. She persuaded women to help her and men to give her money; and, by good fortune, just at that moment there came to Philadelphia a young man named David Nasmyth, who was from Glasgow, and full of Dr. Chalmers' plans for remedying pauperism. He had become so interested in these methods, and so fully persuaded that they embodied the only cure for dependent poverty, that he had given up his business and had set out to travel through the Christian world and preach this new gospel of help. In Philadelphia there was no obstacle to immediate experiment, and he and Mrs. Moore fell into harness together with a hearty good will, and took the parts of Paul and Apollos with instant results. They called a meeting in a parlour, and seven were there, four men and three women. Then, in April, 1831, they resolved to call a public meeting at the Franklin Institute and see what would come of it.

What did come of it was "The Union Benevolent Association," which is still actively in the field, and as representative of the merits and also the failures in Philadelphia charities as any society could be.

It was founded on Dr. Chalmers' plans, and has very much the same system as the younger "Society for Organizing Charities." It recognizes neither color, nation nor sect. It has a board of managers, who are men, and a "Ladies' Branch," where are found the visitors and most active of the workers in the administration of charity. The city south of Girard Avenue and north of South Street, and from river to river, is divided into districts, each having its own officers and visitors—all women. These report once a month to the ladies' board of managers, and this, in turn, to the men's. In the fifty-one years of its existence this Association has given over a million of dollars, a hundred thousand tons of coal and coke and a proportionate amount of clothing, food and every other kind of help. This record is the more remarkable because the Association was not organized as an alms-giving society. In 1831 the condition of affairs was very similar to that in existence now. The poor were thriftless and numerous; there were all sorts of societies, working independently and without knowledge of each other's pensioner. There was then no Central Bureau, and the imposter who was detected by one society lightly laughed and applied to another. "The Union Benevolent" meant to be just what the "Organized Charity" now aims for. It wished to unite the existing charities, and to educate both the alms-giver and the alms-taker in the best methods of destroying pauperism. But the needs of the poor have been pressed on the visitors, and a great portion of the work has been simply relief and assistance. In this way it has fallen into routine methods, and at last became little more than the most influential and best managed of the alms-giving societies. Yet it was, even in those years, wise and discreet in its charities. It was impossible that it should have had the women whose names run year after year on its records, and not have been of permanent value. It had a store for the sale of clothing, where a monthly average of thirty-four women have found constant employment in sewing, and many a child owes its nurture and education to its mother's regular earnings there. It is conducted on the most quiet and non-competitive system, yet last year its business amounted to nearly four thousand dollars, and over three thousand were paid to sewing women and employés. In the way of practical charity only the poor can tell the tale. How many hundreds of sick have been supported, how many dead buried, how many children provided for, not even the records show. Here was the fatherless boy sent to Girard College, and there the girl given a home in the country. If the house of a seamstress was too forlorn to attract customers, she was told to scrub and clean, and then a little cheap matting, a few whole chairs, transformed the place; patrons were interested, and the woman's name vanished from the charity lists. Boys were set up in business as boot-blacks or newspaper boys. It only cost a little money to get the start, and he made "the plant," and then there was bread at home even if there was no butter.

One of the best known and characteristic of this Association's charities is the "stove." What visitor of the poor does not know the "U. B. stove," and what second-hand dealer would dare to sell one! He could take a diamond from a crown and manage to palm it off and get his price for it, but the comical little stove that was invented for the society when anthracite coal first came into use, and which will bake and boil and make a room warm and cheery, has a personality that cannot be disguised, and none of the people to whom they are loaned would dare to sell them, even if any would dare to buy one. Two hundred and twenty-four of these Philadelphians have confidence is proved by the fact that they are apt to remember it in their wills.

About the time the Union Benevolent was formed, and its founders were discussing remedies for pauperism, the Guardians of the Poor, who were forced to accept the pauper as he was, were as busy determining how they could take better care of him. The Bettering-House, on Spruce street, had had many experiences, and the "cholera year" had proved its want of capacity. The pestilence had raged there in a terrific manner, and coffins were kept piled in the yard ready for use. The man who died after breakfast was buried before dinner, and sometimes there was not a nurse to be had. The Sisters of Charity came in and took charge for some weeks, and by them many a poor heretic was baptized before he died, and so his road through purgatory made more easy. The distress and loss of occupation resulting from this pestilence brought great numbers to the house, and the wards were crowded.

were loaned last year from the fall to the spring.

The men who make up the Executive Board, and who are always well-known citizens, have brought the Association to the front on many questions pertinent to its objects. It has petitioned the Legislature on matters of temperance and the license laws, and on false weights. It long ago denounced the misuse of public funds by the Guardians of the Poor, and has instructed both the employer and his working people on various moral and legal questions. It has kept in its office a register for children; and down in the cellar it has—as a prudent Joseph in charge of the people should—stored vegetables and flour against the days of winter famine and high prices. When the snow comes, the man who wants to earn an honest, if a cold penny, goes there and borrows one of its snow-shovels, and many a peddler has had the loan of money enough to start in business with a well-stocked basket; while the woman who had sewing, but no needle or cotton, went and had her wants supplied. These practical little charities in the way of housekeeping for the poor are the result of a long experience, and the Association, fighting poverty for so many years, has learned that the summer ought to provide for the winter, and the day of plenty for the famine. That it is one of the institutions in which

PICTURESQUE PAUPERS—SCENE ON SPAFFORD STREET.

Little by little the ground had been sold, so that the farm was gone, the forest trees cut down, and only the garden left. The people who built on the streets which had succeeded the foot-paths over the meadows grumbled because of their pauper neighbors, and the Guardians at last determined to build and move.

This new enterprise was, however, to be final; and so, to secure a site beyond city encroachments, they selected a large lot of ground across the Schuylkill River, and on its banks, and there they built the ideal Almshouse.

house. It was to be a great credit to the city, and the pauper must have regarded it with admiring interest. Here was something that wisely accepted things as they were. The pauper was not to be abolished, but made comfortable, and this was what ought to be expected of a paternal government, and they probably approved of their new quarters when they were moved over, in the summer of 1835, four thousand in number, in wagons, in furniture cars, and all sorts of vehicles. It must have been a motley procession, and no "Centennial" is likely to reproduce it. The insane were tied and chained; the women were stowed away as well as possible, and many a sturdy fellow must have tramped over on foot, reasonably eager to see his new house. They crossed the river by the South Street ferry, the insane leading the way; and, except Charon, what boatman ever carried such a crew! Once in "Blockley" they were housed in the spacious wards, and the work of regeneration soon began. The officials in the Almshouse confronted the administration of pauperism, and there was little theory about this. It was all practice, and some experiment. There was nothing easy but the admission of the inmates. Inside the stone walls was a little city filled with degradation, with distress, with all that was helpless and forlorn. Over it all was the governor, or "steward;" and upon his wisdom and faithfulness the whole administration depended. The condition of most public institutions and asylums was at this time simply frightful. Elizabeth Fry and Dorothea Dix had drawn public attention in England and the United States to the hardships and abuses existing in such institutions, but the pressure of public opinion penetrated few of the walls, and everything depended on the character of the men in actual charge. The great misfortune lay, of course, in the fact that the abuses, neglects and tyrannies naturally fell on the most helpless. There was little expectation of curing the insane, and if they could be kept quiet and out of the way it was well enough. If they were too violent a straight-jacket, a chain, a lancet or a shower-bath subdued them, and visitors were sometimes taken to the cells to see them sitting alone, beating the floor, tearing their clothes, or waiting in wicked, sullen insubordination for a chance for revenge. If they recovered their senses it was in spite of their treatment, and never because of it. In the Spruce Street "Bettering-House" women who either could not or would not work were put on the treadmill, and if one was too obstinate or too weak to raise her foot in time to take each step as it came down she was struck and bruised on the instep; but that was her own lookout.

In the old house many evils existed in consequence of the crowded, inconvenient condition of affairs, but this new one gave room for much reform. And it was made. The men were set to work in the quarries and on the farm, and the women knitted stockings for the house and sewed. The treadmill was not allowed to emigrate from Spruce Street, and the shower-bath was abolished, except when it was ordered by the doctors, who had faith in it as a curative remedy. The well were no longer bled nor cupped, the insane were visited, and every little while some one who showed gleams of reason would be brought from the cells into the "Main Building," clothed and set at some congenial work, and the experiment often ended in the final discharge of the cured patient. There was great faith at that time, in this institution, in the beneficial effect of interesting employment and the absence of irritating surroundings; and so it happened more than once that men who had been chained as violent maniacs became excellent gardeners, industrious and trustworthy mechanics. Women who had been dressed in one garment made of coffee-sacks, because they tore their clothes up, and who cursed every one who came near them, were converted into seamstresses and even nurses to tenderly-nurtured children. There was a new classification in the wards in many ways, and the whole administration was clean, honest and intelligent.

The Guardians found all of this exceedingly interesting. It was true they did little of the work, but it needed constant supervision, and so once a week they came driving over in hired carriages to attend to that department. Naturally enough the long ride and river air gave them appetites, and this was the time to test the Philadelphia markets! In 1852 it cost $1.04 per week to feed a Philadelphia pauper, but where are the statistics to show what it cost fifteen years before to feed their Guardians? They tried to save the feelings of taxpayers by having a hothouse, where fruits and flowers could be raised without appearing as an item in the bills, but there were other expenses which, they felt, were made too conspicuous. They could see no reason why wine should not be put among "Medical Supplies;" and as mutton can be converted into venison, they thought the process should be reversed. It annoyed the hungry supervisors to have a spade called a spade in the steward's account, and whenever this was printed their opinion of his administration went down to zero. They sometimes had to explain to taxpayers about the time required for the visits and the distance, and give no end of other good reasons for their dinners and other expenses, and they did not like it at all when the taxpayer at last rebelled, and the cakes and ale and early strawberries all came to an end and there was no more feasting. It became more difficult to get a quorum, and when the managers met around a table decorated with paper, pens and ink, instead of good old Port and lobsters, what wonder they had their own feelings toward any one who would tell the public how he spent its money, and how deeply they came to feel that he was not the man for the place!

This story of extravagance and waste has run on year after year, sometimes checked for a little while, and then worse than before, until now it has climaxed in an exposure that has proved that it has not been the pauper who has been corrupted and ruined by public charity, but the men who were intrusted with its administration.

The moral of these disclosures is very simple. It is not that the public officials should be honest and content with their legitimate earnings, but more than this—that the voting taxpayer should look after his public house-keeping, and not be quite so much afraid to ask his employes for bills and receipts. He trusts them to spend his money, but until he is forced to do so he has great delicacy in asking how they spent it. If his wife conducted his home on this principle, he would have a very decided opinion of her capacity, and she—she would probably long for the repose of the river Bagdad.

The story of the "Bettering-House" tells the story of much municipal charity in Philadelphia. There has is little help, and plays the part of a fifth-wheel among active people. Still she is not the happier because she is useless, but she is the more to be pitied. Dr. Kearsley no doubt had many such anchorless wrecks among his patients. He was an Englishman by birth, and came to Philadelphia in 1711. He was always a busy and conspicuous character; he practiced medicine; he interested himself in architecture—and whoever would see what he did can look at Christ Church and Independence Hall—and he was a member of the House of Assembly and an enthusiastic churchman. The people liked his speeches so well that they would catch him up as he came out of the Assembly and carry him home on their shoulders, and the churchmen presented him with a piece of plate worth fifty pounds to testify to their appreciation of the energy with which he had, against discouragement of all kinds, persevered until Christ Church was rebuilt. The vestry had found it easy to been nothing niggardly in the appropriations, and the city has given to its poor a spacious, good home, and a liberal income for its support. The result has been the encouragement of pauperism, the defrauding of the poor, and the corruption of public officers. Whether the day will come when the Almshouse will be abolished, and Homes for the helpless, with Hospitals for the sick, take its place, is beyond prophecy, but one of the healthful signs of progress lies in the fact that the work of the "Society for Organizing Charity" has enabled the city to abolish out-relief, and so save thousands of dollars annually.

One of the first of the Homes in Philadelphia—certainly one of the most independent and magnificent—was founded in 1772 by the will of Dr. John Kearsley, and called by him "Christ Church Hospital." No one can know better than the physician how forlorn is the position of a dependent, sick, or aged Protestant woman. She has no convent to which she can go for refuge, and she too often finds her claims on kindred or gratitude but ropes of sand. She is not always the kind of person who adds to the happiness or comfort of a family. She is apt to be queer, and has to be "considered;" she resolve that the little church should be enlarged and a foundation for a steeple laid, but they had no money, nor did they take steps to get any. Then Dr. Kearsley offered to advance what was needed until subscriptions could be raised, and thus enabled them to begin the work at once. In after years he opened the subscription for the chimes, and was always the friend in need where the church was concerned. When he died, he left his property to Christ and St. Peter's Churches for the maintenance of at least "ten poor and distressed women of the communion of the Church of England." Dr. Kearsley died in 1772, and in 1789 Joseph Dobbins gave to the same charity five hundred pounds and two lots of ground; and then at his death, in 1804, increased the legacy by devising to its hospital all the remainder of his property.

The two benefactors probably fancied the valuable portion of their legacies was the money portion, but the Doctor's land lay in such locations as Front and Market, and Arch above Third, and the ground called "Lot No. 4 from Schuylkill" by Mr. Dobbins, was between Eighteenth and Nineteenth and Spruce and Pine. Such property came to be a splendid bequest, and the "Lot No. 4" alone, after lying idle and forlorn for seventy years, sold for one hundred and eighty thousand dollars. The revenues have been managed by prudent business men, and the hospital has always kept within its means, has never been in debt, and never had to solicit assistance. In its early days it occupied a small two-story house on the Arch street property, and accommodated eight ladies, who knitted and sewed, and on Sunday went down the street to Christ Church to service, and on week-days took little runs out to see their friends. Of course they were thankful, and of course they grumbled and gave sufficient occupation to the three vestrymen from each church who were in charge of the charity. Then there came more applicants, and the house was torn down and a larger one built. In time this also became too small, and so a still more spacious building was erected on the same lot, but fronting on Cherry Street. Here forty old ladies could be accommodated, but sometimes two had to share a room, and the matron, as referee, seems sometimes to have had reason to regret the arrangement.

By 1856 the Hospital had an annual income of over nineteen thousand dollars, and so the managers determined to build again. They bought a farm of over two hundred acres of Jesse George, near the West Park, and built the present home. It would accommodate one hundred inmates, but the income, which has suffered from shrinkage of values, supports only forty at present. It might be suggested to good churchmen—for with this work the women have had nothing to do except as pensioners—that every dollar given here would go directly to the support of additional inmates, as all the running expenses are already secured.

One of the most pleasant features in this place is the prevalence of family life. It has happened that the managers have several times been able to take mothers and daughters, sisters and other near relations; so that little homes are set all through the great building, and there is a completeness and content preserved that is not possible when charity breaks all family ties. These beneficiaries have many comforts not common in all such institutions, some of which they owe to their rural situation, and others to the thoughtfulness of the managers. The leading magazines are taken, there are daily papers and a library. On Sunday and week-days service is held in the beautiful chapel, which is in one wing, and so arranged that any one too feeble to go down stairs can enter the gallery from the second floor and worship there. The whole building is fire-proof. They have a farmer, and fresh vegetables, cows and chickens; and many a worse lot falls to poverty-stricken human beings than that of being "a poor and distressed woman of the communion of the Church of England," if this condition leads to a home at Christ Church Hospital. In spite of all their worries, the good ladies, who, as Protestants, cannot pray for the repose of the souls of their two benefactors, must yet follow them with many tranquil, happy thoughts.

This, as we have said, is a man's charity, founded and governed by men, and it justifies their best opinion of their own management. The "Home for Incurables" belongs to women, and although they have an "Advisory Board" of men, the members of it consider a better title would be an "Indorsing Board," as all they do is to obey orders. It was founded on a legacy of one little gold dollar. There was in West Philadelphia a young girl who had been confined to her bed from early childhood, and she, often thinking of those who suffered as much but were not cared for as she was, longed to make them as comfortable. She used to talk to her mother about a home for incurables, and one day when a gold dollar was given her she said it could be put away as the foundation for a fund for such a home. It was a light enough fancy on her part, but it became an inspiration. After the girl died the money was remembered, and her mother and her friends determined to see her wish carried out. It was easy enough to arouse interest, as every one knew the need of such an institution. In the hospitals established for curative purposes there was no room for patients pronounced beyond help, and even at the Almshouse the transient pauper was preferred to the permanent patient. Every one knew of helpless sick who were suffering in poverty, or supported by hard exertion or grudging charity. There was need enough that the little gold dollar should be put to use. The women who were interested went to work determined to succeed. They held fairs and solicited subscriptions. Those of them who could, gave money, and all worked; and in 1877 they had raised enough money to authorize them in opening a home out on the Darby Road.

At the end of the year they had sixteen patients and a lengthening list of applicants. There were people in all stages of disease, and with every shape of it, asking for admission, but the managers had not only to limit the number admitted, but they had to exclude all diseases not easily managed in their building. A hospital for such uses demands peculiar accommodations and appliances, and the next step was to build one. So, then, this was accomplished. Men gave money to buy ground and women endowed beds, and the managers took care that as their mortar hardened no debt hardened with it. They had not money enough to build as large a house as they needed, but the plans provided for extensions, and there is ground enough. The house really looks like a home, and a very beautiful one. It is well arranged, and no detail of comfort or convenience has been neglected, and the result would have delighted and astonished the owner of the little gold dollar.

Because the building is yet too small, and the managers are not willing to hinder their work by a debt, they have still to turn away hundreds of applicants. They have no wards for men nor children, and can take no one suffering from consumption, epilepsy or cancer. The only vacancies are made by death.

These are a few of the charities of Philadelphia. They represent municipal relief and its abuses; out-door relief and its methods; a church home and a hospital. Each came because it was needed, and each deserves attention.

RECOLLECTIONS OF ARMY LIFE.

FEW days ago I met the Chaplain on the street. He was walking with a small boy, who went homeward with his school-books as we stopped to shake hands.

"Do you know," said the Chaplain to me, "that little chap has just given me an awful setting down."

"How is that?" I asked.

"Well, you would hardly believe it, but ten minutes ago that boy, bright as he looks, did not know whether it was the Revolution or some other war that you and I served in."

Wouldn't I believe it, indeed! Why, it was only a few days before that a young girl of fourteen or thereabout had made a remark in my hearing, which showed town, when something tugged at my coat, and turning I discovered that little fellow whom you saw.

"Well, my man," said I, "what can I do for you?"

"Oh, it's nothing much, sir. We fellows at school liked what you said yesterday first rate, but at recess we got a-talking about it, and we couldn't quite make out whether you was on the British or the American side." *"

Does any one for a moment hesitate in deciding on which side of Mason and Dixon's line this conversation occurred? Certainly no one who has ever traveled through or tarried in the South will suspect any Southern lad of such ignorance. To the young Southron there is only one war worth speaking of in his country's, or rather in his state's history. He has heard of it ever since he was old enough to follow a continuous story, and he is sure to have had a score of male relatives in every battle fought by the Confederacy. In school, he studies spe-that she did not know to which of our few wars the battle of Gettysburg belonged!

I said as much to the Chaplain, and he shook his head.

"My experience is even worse than yours," said he.

"Principal Smith sent for me yesterday to give his boys a little talk, and as it was the anniversary of the day we broke camp for that hard midwinter march of ours in Virginia, in '63, my mind naturally reverted to campaigning days, and I gave the boys a talk which, 'if I do say it that shouldn't,' kept their eyes and ears open till I got through. As for Smith—you know he lost a brother at Chancellorsville—the old fellow nearly broke down when he thanked me after I was done."

I could readily believe all this, for the Chaplain is one of the best story-tellers in the state.

"Just now," he continued, "I was coming down cial histories, which extol the valor of the Confederate soldier, and contrast him with the ultimately victorious Yankee—always to the disadvantage of the latter. The brighter ones of this rising generation are perhaps beginning to ask how it happens that, when every battle was won by the Confederates, surrender followed at the last, but to the average Southern boy the war exists as a sacred passage of history, and its record, so far as concerns Southern feats of arms, altogether glorious.

Let this total lack of correct information on the one hand, and excess of questionable information on the other, be what it may, there is no lack of popular interest in army reminiscences in either section of the country. The bibliography of the war has become voluminous, and notable additions have been made during the present season. One of the most recent of these is entitled "Bullet and Shell,"* whose author served an apprenticeship in a New York regiment, and became subsequently a war correspondent, and whose illustrator made all his sketches on the field. Preceding this was Carlton McCarthy's "Soldier Life."† This is cleverly illustrated by an ex-Confederate officer. Preceding this by a few weeks was "The Boys of '61,"* a thrilling narrative of personal adventure. Then there are the "Campaigns of the Civil War," now publishing at short intervals,† and a number of other books which we need not now enumerate, but which go to prove that there is a deep popular interest in the subject. We may be sure else that publishers would not be so willing to load their presses with works of this description.

Why, indeed, should it be otherwise? At least one-half of our fifty million souls remember the great conflict, even if they did not take part therein, and there are still enough veterans living, according to estimates of the Pension Bureau, to command the profound respect of politicians, and induce, at every session of Congress, renewed efforts on the part of a corrupt lobby to draw still more freely from an already over-taxed treasury.

It is not the purpose of the present writer to depreciate the fighting qualities of one army by comparing them with those of the other. That the South made a magnificent fight against terrible odds is conceded, but the fact that the Northern soldier was better clad, better fed and better equipped is not to his discredit. It was one of the necessary conditions of the war. Could these conditions have been reversed, and the North forced to fight, as it were, for its own firesides, the defense would have been just as gallant.

Be all this as it may, however, the romance of soldier-life has not been half told. Those four years of campaigning, with their days of action and weeks of weary marching or waiting, gave birth to no end of varied incident and adventure, the telling of which still starts the pulse of the casual listener as well as of the old campaigner.

THE RELIABLE CONTRABAND.

The etchings of Mr. Forbes, which illustrate the accompanying pages, and those of Lieutenant Shepard, in Mr. McCarthy's book, are perhaps the best exponents of actual army life that have been brought out. They convey, often in a slight and sketchy manner, a vivid idea of scenes and places and incidents which every old soldier will recognize as true to the life, and which a fuller explanation may render equally vivid to the non-military reader.

In active field work there are few more animated scenes than the laying of a pontoon, and ordinarily the spectator may observe it at his ease, for it is not usually undertaken in the face of an enemy. On the march the pontoon-train is a cumbersome and seemingly unwieldy machine. Usually a regiment, or its equivalent as to numbers, is detailed or enlisted as pontoniers and drilled in their duties. Each boat has its carriage, its mule team and teamsters, and its equipment of oars, anchors, joists, planks, ropes and wooden pins. It makes a formidable show in the line of march, winding its lazy length along at a snail's pace. But when a river is to be crossed, everything is galvanized into life. The carriages are hauled as near the water's edge as possible, and the boats are launched. No. 1 is anchored a few feet from the shore, and, in a trice, a row of joists is in place, their ends resting on the bank and on the boat, where they are securely fastened. Instantly the men begin laying the "chesses" or floor-planks, two being told off to make each fast as it is laid down. Meanwhile boat No. 2 is pulled out into the stream, and anchored in its turn some ten or twelve feet farther out; down go the joists between this and No. 1, and the active "chess" carriers, each with a plank on his shoulder, trot out "at the double," and throw down their burdens, returning briskly for more. Boat No. 3 is in position by this time; and so the bridge grows until the stream is crossed. As it lengthens, the two lines of men, going and returning at a run, present a very lively picture, and when the excitement is intensified by an active skirmish, as in the case represented in the sketch, the situation becomes thrilling in the extreme. The Rappahannock River was actually crossed in this way, in the face of a sharp resistance, by the Federal troops in 1862, just before the battle of Fredericksburg.

Crossing a river, even by a comparatively prosaic ford, is eminently picturesque, as the infantry pushes through the water waist-deep, while a squad of mounted cavalymen take position just below to pick up any unfortunates who may be carried off their feet by the swift current.

Artists who attempt to illustrate army life have, it would seem, an irresistible proclivity to avail themselves of the bayonet as a picturesque accessory, whereas, in point of fact, the soldier rarely "fixes bayonets" except when on guard or dress parade. On the picket line, on the march and in action, the bayonet is habitually carried in its sheath. It will be noticed that in Mr. Forbes' etchings the bayonet is never "fixed," except under exceptional conditions, and this fact lends an air of truthfulness to his drawings. The average artist, who never saw a regiment in the field would probably represent a battalion firing with its bayonets all fixed, but every soldier knows that such a performance would be decidedly out of the ordinary course. On the march, too, the fixed bayonet is an unmitigated nuisance, and dangerous to friends rather than to foes. The writer hereof has seen more bayonet wounds received by accident during improperly-conducted drills with green troops, than most men have seen in actual conflicts.

DOUBLE QUICK.

There is far more of pomp and circumstance in the illustrated papers than there is in an actual field campaign, and, if anything, less of the picturesque; but a change for the better is to be noted of late years in this respect. The illustrations of the recent English campaign in Egypt were in many instances redeemed by sketches actually made on the spot. During our own civil war there was a great deal of wholly inexcusable work done mostly in safe studios at home, which conveyed a false impression, but found, perhaps, a readier market than a more realistic article would have done.

In the sketches presented herewith there is always an air of "ready for duty" in the figures of men and horses, guns, tents and accoutrements. There is nothing "bandboxy" about them. Even Custer, as represented cross-questioning a Confederate spy, is ready for "boots and saddles" at any moment. Custer, by the way, had much of the dandy in his composition, and habitually wore a gold-embroidered velvet jacket, a soft hat and a red silk tie; yet there was never a suspicion of the starched and padded martinet about him.

Actual campaigning, indeed, quickly takes the starch and the padding out of most people. A day's march in the rain proves the superior value of the rubber poncho when compared with a well-fitting uniform, and happy is the man who can crawl into his dog-tent—made probably with this same poncho—at night, with nothing really wringing wet above his waist-belt. There is, however, something serious and workmanlike about a moving army in wet weather very different from the appearance of a militia regiment caught out in a sudden shower. The men tramp sullenly on, each keeping the lock of his piece covered as well as he may from the damp; the horses hang their heads, and the steady drip, drip of the rain, as it streams from hats and capes into the muddy and much-betrodden road, has a dismal and depressing effect. Nevertheless, amid all the grumbling the column will halt and bivouac with a brave show of good spirits, chaffing one another, singing "I Want to be an Angel," "Put me in my Little Bed," or "I Want to go Home," as if on a picnic.

Presently some one, in some mysterious manner, starts a fire; then, if the wagons have come up, or if there are still rations in the haversacks, there is hot coffee and reasonably good cheer till the drummers beat a lamentably spiritless "tattoo" on their water-soaked drums, and everybody bestows himself for the night. It is not altogether impossible, under such conditions, to sleep the sleep of the just, and arise measurably refreshed for another day's march through more rain and more mud. This sort of thing tells in the long run, however, and many a man who has not yet seen his fiftieth year justly ascribes sundry of his bodily infirmities to those days and weeks of cheerfully-endured hardship and exposure.

I have said nothing of the artillery as yet, though it furnished a most picturesque accessory on the march and in action. It is a sight to remember, to see a battery dash up at full gallop, the drivers lashing their horses and the gunners holding on to their seats for dear life as the heavy wheels leap over obstructions, until the bugle sounds "Forward into line—Action front;" and like a flash the guns wheel into position along the crest of a hill and send their shells howling over the infantry advance into the woods beyond.

This paper may as well conclude with an incident which, so far as I know, has never found its way into print. It is of a gallant officer now dead, Gen. T. W. Sherman of the regular army.

The General was a disciplinarian of the strictest, and a martinet withal, of whom his personal staff, as well as the rest of his subordinates, stood in wholesome awe. His division was in winter quarters near one of the larger Southern seacoast towns, captured and occupied early in the war, and with it was a regular battery of light artillery, which the general, being an artillery officer by training and choice, used personally to drill once or twice a week, just to keep his hand in as it were. A superb battery it was, with perfect appointments—brouze guns shining like gold, fine horses and a full complement of men trained in the strict school of the "old army."

Now, in the outskirts of the town was a large mansion, with a fine lawn, as Southern lawns go, in front of it, whose then inhabitants were three young and charming ladies, and one or two elderly chaperones, whose husbands, brothers and cousins were all with Lee in Virginia, but who, either because they could not see so many handsome young fellows in blue uniforms and abstain from conquests, or because they thought it good policy to be on friendly terms with the authorities, did not treat Yankee admirers with the utter contempt and scorn commonly maintained by the Southern belle. That they were rebels at heart goes without saying, but a select circle of officers, including certain of the General's staff, was welcomed on many a pleasant evening to their wide drawing-room.

On one of these occasions the talk turned on light artillery, and the ladies expressed a wish that the General would avail himself some time of their special and peculiar lawn to drill his battery.

The two staff officers present promised to see if they could procure the General's consent, and laid their plans accordingly on their way back to quarters.

Next morning at the headquarters' mess one of them remarked casually:

"We were at Mrs. Dorrroughbie's last evening, General, and found the ladies very agreeable."

"H'm! damned rebels, every one of 'em, I'll be bound," was the loyal answer.

"Well, that may be; but they are very agreeable girls for all that."

"More fools you!"

"Do you know, General," said the Adjutant, "they are in mortal terror lest Captain Aims should take a notion to drill his battery on their lawn. They are afraid he would cut it all up with his wheels."

"H'm! Serve 'em right, too!"

"I might give the Captain a hint not to go there if you say so, General."

"Never mind; I'll attend to it."

Not another word did the General say during breakfast, but immediately afterward he called his orderly, who entered, saluted, and stood in that graceful pose known as "attention."

"Give my compliments to Captain Aims," said Sherman, "and tell him that I will drill his battery this afternoon at half-past two. Tell him to have plenty of cartridges, as I shall do some firing."

A NEW-MADE GRAVE.

So far so good, thought the Adjutant.

At a quarter past two the General mounted his horse and rode down to the battery camp, accompanied by the two young men.

The battery was all ready, looking its best, and at half-past two precisely the bugle sounded forward, and the pieces wheeled into column.

"Head of column right, Captain!" said the General

That settled it, for the usual drill-ground was in the other direction, and the Adjutant and Aide silently exchanged a triumphant wink.

Such a drill as that battery was put through on the Dorroughbie's lawn that afternoon! They fired by sections and in "action front." They advanced and retreated firing; they unlimbered and not to be caught, and when the drill was dismissed rode away, remarking:

"That will do for once, I reckon," and so went back to his quarters.

At supper-time an old negro servant presented himself with a beautiful bouquet of early roses for the General, whereto was attached a dainty note, expressing the gratitude of the Dorroughbie ladies for the entertainment that had been afforded them, and begging him to accept the roses in token of acknowledgment.

The General never "let on" that he saw through the ruse. A keen lightning-like glance at his Adjutant and Aide was all he vouchsafed, but the battery was never drilled on that lawn again.

Poor man! A year later I saw him carried to the rear on a stretcher with his leg shattered by a rifle-ball, and he never was able to drill his beloved battery again.

He was a faithful and accomplished officer, and did good administrative service even after amputation left him crippled for life, and with his martial spirit broken by the pain which he never ceased to suffer.

It is all over now, thank Heaven! the excitement, the weariness, the hardships. Only the wounds remain, and these, be they of heart or body, death alone can cure. The mounted troopers ride forward, each waving a white handkerchief, the rattle of rifles dies away—Peace has come!

limbered up; they wheeled and doubled, and did everything else in the tactics, until horses were in a lather, and some hundreds of dollars' worth of Uncle Sam's powder had been expended in smoke.

And all through it the Dorroughbie ladies sat in the mild winter sunshine on their verandah, apparently enjoying the show much to the General's bewilderment.

During a pause for rest, the ladies urged the Adjutant, who had ridden up to pay his respects, to bring up the General and introduce him; but the old fellow was

CHAPTER XXXIV.

BLINDFOLD AND BAREFOOT.

BEECHWOOD SEMINARY stood just without the pur-lieus of one of the busy little towns that are hidden among the New England hills. The ceaseless groan of water-wheels, the breath of wheezing engines, the hum of lathes, the whirl of spindles, the ring of pulsing hammers and the hiss of glowing forges filled the steep-sided ravine along which the village was builded. It was a goblin's cave set in a quiet, peaceful scene. Its people were slaves who worked for the gnomes of trade. Motion and force were incarnate in their lives. They wrought with dull hands magical transformations. Earth became crystal beneath their touch. The misty fibre that the wind blew here and there became the snowy web that wrapt the limbs of beauty or the cable that bade defiance to the storm. Nature shrunk away from her busy, boastful rival. Where she had ended her work, science and art began theirs. They mocked at her tardy processes, and scorned her incomplete results. They stole her secrets; scattered her treasures; prisoned her forces, and made of the once silent glen a busy, bustling, throbbing hive of crowded, wearied, weighted life. On either side the hills rose sharp and stern. From base to summit they were clothed with a garment of verdure that even in winter hid half their ruggedness. The laurel thrust its contorted limbs across the gray cliffs and softened their outlines with its verdure. The spruce and hemlock screened the savageness that the birch and maple would have left uncovered when the summer departed, so that the beholder almost wondered that civilization was content with the narrow stretch which it had conquered for itself along the banks of the boisterous torrent. Less than a mile away, where the mountain swept down into a broad plateau, not only overlooking the bustling town but also commanding an outlook up and down one of those noble valleys that the icy rivers of the north cut through the granite ledges in their pathway to the steaming sea, stood Beechwood Seminary. By what chance this glaring three-storied caravansary, with its green blinds only breaking the vast parallelograms of white with which it faced the four cardinal points, came to be located in a spot of such surpassing loveliness, no man knoweth. It was just far enough from the town to feel its life, near enough to the mountain to partake of its solitude, and high enough above the valley to command all its beauty. With true Yankee disregard of nature, the original forest had been cut away in front, and the grounds of the institution "adorned," the catalogue said, "with rare and elegant shrubbery"—some stunted evergreens and a few hardy decidua which clung to the wind-swept terrace, doubtfully enough in winter, and leaved and bloomed in summer, weakly and sadly attempting to remedy the violence done to nature in the silly conventional attempt at improvement. A white picket fence enclosed the rectangled lawn known as the seminary grounds. At the back of it, however, nature had held her own. The quaint old farm-house which once occupied this classic spot had not been torn away, but rose up by successive steps from the very midst of the old orchard, beyond which was a narrow belt of rocky pasture land skirted by a gray-lichened wall half hidden under the brown-leaved undergrowth, and above and beyond the dark resinous woods where the pine cones and needles lay thick beneath, and the light was tempered by the inlocked foliage above. Thrift had done all that could well be done to mar the face of nature, but its beauty still survived.

It was upon this scene that Hilda looked the morning after the events described in our last chapter. She stood at one of the back windows of the seminary and gazed upon the mountain glowing in the sparkling splendor of a wintry morning. The season was a late one, and the snow had not yet come, but glistening rime rested on fence and wall, and transformed the white birch limbs into stems of silver filigree. The blades of grass and the brown leaves that autumn winds had piled here and there were touched with points of light. The background of evergreens was strengthened by the contrast and enriched by the sharp shadows that the newly risen sun threw over it.

Hilda was now almost eighteen. She had grown lithe and graceful in form, and her girlish impetuosity of manner had been tempered by four years of training at Beechwood. Yet in her great dark eyes was the same unshrinking directness, and her quick decision of movement showed that she had inherited not a little of her father's steadfastness of purpose. Unfailing health had left its matchless impress on her ruddy cheeks, and given to her eyes a light that was almost saucy in the revelation that it made of buoyant vitality. Her soft, liquid eyes glowed with evident enjoyment as she gazed upon the bright scene without, though a far-away look in their depths showed that her thoughts were wandering. Yet the little trace of care that was in them as she glanced out upon the sunlit mountain, was so foreign to her wont that it hardly tempered their vivacious brightness. A rich, warm-tinted morning robe encompassed her shapely figure, and her wealth of soft dark hair was wound in a shining coil behind, save only a fringe of rebellious ringlets that escaped control and clustered about her wide, full brow. There was a careless ease of manner that told better than words could, that she had slept on roses. Life had brought neither trouble nor care. A cloud had appeared on its horizon, but it was only a little one, and so very far off that she hardly felt its shadow. There was something in form and gesture that recalled her father. Bright and sunny in temperament she had yet enough of his thoughtful coolness to constitute a nature not easily moulded, nor likely to be turned aside from a purpose once conceived.

She had kindled a fire in the open grate of materials that had been placed ready for her hand the night before—snowy bits of pine, long, slender splints of creamy ash and heavy pieces of maple, with closely-curling cones of rich birch-bark for kindling. The flames roared up the chimney and awakened her from her reverie. She went and stood before the fire, stretching out her shapely hands to catch the grateful warmth. Then she drew back her robe, and held one slipped foot after the other toward the flame. After a few moments she looked at her watch, and stepping lightly across the floor to a half-open door, said softly:

"Amy!"

She listened until she heard the regular breathing of a sleeper, then glanced quickly within, and, with a smile, closed the door and withdrew.

"Heigho!" she said, "I do believe I am the only girl at Beechwood that likes to see the sun rise, and I am not sure that I would if it did not give me such a nice, quiet time to write to Martin. Poor fellow!" she added, "he must be having a very sad time."

She drew a little stand before the fire, and, arranging her writing materials, sat for a moment gazing at the bright flames as they leaped up the chimney's black throat, ere she began to write. This was her greeting—her orison to her absent lover:

"MY DEAR MARTIN: I have risen very early to write to you, for it seems to me that you are anxious and troubled, though I cannot tell why you should be. Surely your father's loss cannot be so very great as to be any good cause, and I cannot think that his illness is really serious—in the sense of danger, I mean. Of course, it is painful and unpleasant, but you will be able to do for him so much more than you would otherwise be allowed to undertake, that you must really enjoy showing him how well and willingly you can serve him. I wish I could be with you, and I would come at once if Papa had not enjoined me to stay until he came to fetch me. Dear Papa, how thoughtful he has always been, and how careful of my happiness! But he will come soon. I know he will, for I have dreamed of him every night for almost a week; and three successive nights, you know, is a sure sign, or all the wisdom of the witches goes for nothing. You used to call me a witch, and so cannot deny me the power of divination. It is odd, the repetition of this dream. Every time I see Papa in the stern of the dear old Sea Foam. The sails are set; she is standing in through the breakers along a narrow channel. The wind is abeam, brisk but not heavy. The moon is at the full, and makes it as light as day. Papa holds the tiller, and keeps her head in the track the moon makes on the waves. Beyond a narrow point the sea is as smooth as glass, and the glimmer of the moonlight on it is steady and full. It seems as if the Sea Foam were going to sail right on into the moon itself. I know the place very well. I have heard Papa and Unthank tell of it so often that I could not fail to know it. It is the old inlet—Hargrove's Inlet—where the buccaneers used to go in and out in the old days. Papa used to say that he was prouder of having found that narrow passage through the breakers, by which his rugged kinsmen used to come and go upon their lawless errands on the main, than almost anything else that he had done. It seems that he and Unthank are the only ones that know it now, though I have heard him tell the bearings over so often that I almost think I could take the Sea Foam in there myself.

"That is all there is of it; but every night I see the same—the brave old boat; the shining, seething sea; my father holding the tiller as easily as if he guided a toy, and watching the course with the moonlight shining on his dear face. I am sure he will come pretty soon, not because I dream about him, but because I think of him so much. Oh, he is sure to come to me, and then we will both come to you. I keep my trunk all packed up, so that there need not be any delay, and twenty times a day I go over the pretty little things I will say to him when he comes in, when we start off and all along through the sunset hills as we fly quickly on our way to dear old Sturmhold.

"Why have you not written me? It has been just an age since a letter came. Oh, I know! Of course you are so busy you have hardly time to breathe. I don't wonder that you have no time to write. Then, you are expecting me every day, too. Tell your father how sorry I am for him, and kiss your dear mother for me. I want them to think as well of me as they can before I come, for I am sure to impair their good opinion by some prank ere I have had time to outwear the freshness of their welcome home. I wonder why Papa was so particular to charge me to stay here till he came or until I heard from him? He never did so before. However, I shall stay. He knows that, and he will come here the very first thing.

"This is Saturday, and is a holiday. I am going to post this after breakfast, and then go for a stroll in the woods. It is cool this morning, but when the sun is well up, the open nooks among the evergreens will be warm and cosy. At any rate, I am going, just to be alone, and smell the pines. It is just the sweetest place in the world to sit and think—to paint pictures and dream dreams. Amy says it is sombre and lonesome among the rocks and under the trees, but I do not see how it could be improved—unless one's lover could be there, too.

"Well, good-by, dear. Amy has waked, and come like a half-frozen ghost and curled herself up between my red wrapper and the fire. I never saw such a cold, bloodless creature as she is. She has the most wonderful eyes, and hair that is as black as jet. She is very proud of it, and well she may be, for the great shining coils lie like a crown upon her small, shapely head, and make her slender neck seem slenderer still. Her dark olive skin has not a trace of flush, and its dull pallor contrasts so strangely with the great black eyes and mass of jetty hair that it sometimes makes her look almost weird. This effect is no doubt aided by the smallness of her features and the thinness of her lips. She seems like a child almost, and yet they call her 'Queenie,' because of her haughty and dignified bearing. She is a strange compound of pride and passion—strength and weakness. She is thin-blooded, and, I fear, cold-hearted, yet I cannot help loving and pitying her. We have always been great friends, yet I should almost doubt that she had any real affection for me were it not for her terrible jealousy of you. It is funny that my best friend should be my lover's worst enemy. Of course, I count it no hardship to choose between you; though it does make me feel very sad to think that I shall be with her only a few months more, for I am really the only friend she has, and I am afraid she is not likely to find new ones. Poor girl! I cannot but think how much happier is my lot than hers. Good-by. She will not let me write any more, and I do not think I ought to write such long letters, when I do not get even a line in reply. Remember me to the servants, and think of me often when you visit dear old Sturmhold. How I long to be there with you—yours always and altogether. HILDA."

For more than four years the cosy corner room, from one window of which she looked down the river, and from the other out upon the mountain, had been Hilda's habitation during the term-time at Beechwood. It was on the second floor, opened on the roof of the old farm-house, and had been chosen by her because the view reminded her of home, she said. Her father had stipulated that she should not be removed from this room, nor on any account debarred from the privilege of wandering at will on Saturdays in woods and fields, on foot or on horseback, wheresoever she would. This privilege had been accorded with hesitation; but Hilda had soon become such a prime favorite, not only with the principal and teachers, but also with her mates, that it soon ceased to attract attention, the more especially as it came to be applied to many of the other scholars as well. The room which opened off from Hilda's had been occupied for the same time by Amy Hargrove. Between these a very singular friendship had arisen. While both were brunettes, the dull pallidness of Amy's complexion was in strong contrast with the ruddy bloom that tinged the cheeks of Hilda. Both were considered beauties—one bright and cheerful, and the other cold and haughty. The one had many friends, the other few. They were alike in but one thing—they were both excellent scholars, and rivals for the honors of their class. Everybody wondered at their intimacy. They seemed to have so little in common, and yet they were almost inseparable. The fact was that their friendship was based as much upon the accident of contrasting physical conditions as anything else. Hilda's abounding vitality seemed almost a necessity to the meagre, thin-blooded little creature whom she took under her charge and petted and cared for almost like a child. She laughed at her whimsicalities, submitted to her pretensions, and when it was necessary, disregarded her fantasies. She had none of that self-consciousness that made her jealous of any of the really brilliant parts of her friend. She pitied her from her heart, for despite her arrogance and assumption, she was alone in the world. She had no near kindred, and the one vexation of her life was the fact that her guardian paid no heed to her existence save in providing amply for her comfort. She, too, had been secured special privileges at Beechwood. Her pony was not inferior to Hilda's; but she loved far better to have them harnessed together and driven through shady lanes by another than to mount and ride, as Hilda delighted to do, over the steep mountain roads. Despite these dissimilarities, there was rarely any difference between the friends. The one was happy to subserve the other's pleasure. The other was careful not to try her good nature too far. It was the everlasting puzzle of the strong and the weak; the broad and the narrow; the great and the small. Their natures were complementary, and for that very reason perhaps had so long harmonized.

The day of which we write was one of the rare occasions when the occupants of the two adjoining rooms did not agree. Ever since Hilda's engagement to Martin, Amy had been jealous of the young man's share in her companion's affection. It always put her in a pet to have Hilda write to him, and she spared no opportunity of manifesting, as far as she dared, her disapproval. On this day she had made up her mind that Hilda must drive with her to a town some miles down the river, to visit a friend whom she had met the summer before. As we have seen, this did not comport with Hilda's plans, and the result was that before the wayward little creature had dressed for the day she had worked herself into a fever of fretfulness. Hilda laughed at her angry expostulation, and when she stamped her little foot in rage, reminded her of a sheep at Sturmhold which was addicted to the same impatient gesture. The result was that the fiery little queen retired to her own room, closed and locked the door between, and when the bell for breakfast rang the excuse of a raging headache which she gave for non-attendance was by no means without foundation. She was prostrated by that curse of natures in which the nervous so far predominates over the physical—a sick-headache. Her room was darkened, and she became a solitary prisoner for the nonce. Hilda, reproaching herself for her refusal to comply with her friend's wishes, would have become her nurse, but the spoiled creature would not permit her to even enter the room.

She, therefore, rode into the town to post her letter, meeting the country mail upon the way, and wondering whether it contained any messages from her loved ones. As she passed along the narrow busy streets that led to the post-office she found herself curiously watched by those she met. The postmaster, a fussy, important man with spectacles and thin gray hair—a deacon in the church and one of the social and religious lights of the little town—drew her into conversation as she handed in her letter, and, on some artful pretext, kept her waiting while more than one of the townspeople came in and regarded her with a strange eagerness. Dropping into a store to make some slight purchases she noted the same unusual watchfulness on the part of all. There was some whispered conversation between the proprietor and a few men who stood near the stove, accompanied by meaning glances in her direction. She caught the clerk who waited on her telegraphing with his eyes, evidently in response to their looks of inquiry. The hot blood rushed to her face as she became conscious that she was the object of observation and remark. Thinking there might be some disarrangement of her attire which was attracting attention, she turned full upon the little knot at the stove with an angry light in her eyes, and then deliberately walked past them to a mirror which hung against the wall at the back of the store. Save her flushed face and flashing eyes the glass showed nothing unusual in her appearance, and the picture that was flashed back at her was certainly not one that need object to scrutiny. She was used to admiration. She had received it all her life. Her father had petted her and praised her beauty always, and every one who came under his roof-tree soon found that the shortest path to his approval was unstinted praise of his daughter. Since she had been at Beechwood she had been the belle of the little town. Everybody in it knew her. Her favor had been a matter of competition with several of the young men, even after it was generally understood that she was already engaged. She was probably better known through the country by her long walks and rides than any other girl at Beechwood. She knew admiration, and rather liked it. But this was not admiration. What could it be?

As she left the store she encountered a knot of men on the sidewalk. They tried to seem not to be noticing her. She knew them. They were a lawyer, a doctor, an editor and the son of a wealthy mill-owner. As she went toward her horse, which she had hitched near the post-office, they all gazed after her, and at once engaged in an animated conversation. Could they be talking of her? For the first time, she was allowed to lead her horse up to the platform that ran in front of one of the stores, and mount without aid. It was no inconvenience. She had as soon do it as not. She was so expert a horsewoman that only the slightest advantage of surface was needed to enable her to leap into the saddle. She did not care about the attention, either. She was too sincere by nature to desire to be a flirt. She loved Martin too earnestly to even seem to favor another. She liked attention; she desired to please, and was glad to be thought beautiful and attractive. It gave her father pleasure. She was glad to be dowered with beauty for Martin's sake, too. Besides that, she enjoyed seeing others happy, and was glad to be the cause of their happiness. Yet she had never sought such attention, and would not have missed it had it not been universally accorded up to that time. Almost every week for four years, saving the vacations, she had ridden at least once into the town, and never in all that time had she been without a knight to offer his hand for her foot when she mounted to ride away. Indeed, it had been an honor for which there had more than once been sharp competition. Now she mounted alone. Yet a half a dozen familiar faces were at the windows of the shops peering out at her. Not one of the men who stood scarcely ten steps away had ever allowed her to do so before. The young mill-owner seemed quite to have forgotten her existence. Yet he had lately been so pronounced in his attentions that she had wondered if it were not her duty to tell him of her relations with Martin, so that he need have no excuse for continuing them. What could be the matter? There must be something wrong with her attire. She looked herself over nervously, as well as she could. Lifted her habit to see if by chance it failed to fall properly. Wondered if a glimpse of her skirt had shown beneath its border. Her face burned with shame at the thought. She leaned forward in the saddle and breathed freer when she found that was not the cause. Yet what could it be?

She turned her horse's head, and, with a sharp stroke, started on a swift gallop for the seminary.

Hardly had she gone a hundred yards when she saw the good pastor of the village church beckoning to her and calling after her. She reined in her horse and he came out to her—into the middle of the street—the good man who had only bowed and smiled as she had ridden past him hitherto. There is trouble in his face, but he is very kind—very kind, indeed. She almost weeps as he takes her hand, raising his hat with scrupulous politeness, and looking anxiously into her face as he asks many questions, all very kindly and gently, of her father, of the fire at Skendoah, and all the other things that bear on her life. It is very strange she thinks. But meantime he talks on. What a sturdy, resolute face he has! As he talks, he rests his arm, over the horse's neck. Is the whole town watching them? She thinks so. He does not see it, however. He is not reproving her for her gayety, either, as he has done sometimes, but is telling her how trials should be borne. What can he mean? And when he has finished and shaken her hand once more, and she is about to start, he turns again and enjoins upon her anew to come to him if she ever needs a friend. "Come right to my house, my dear," he says, with his honest face aglow, "at any time of night or day. You will always be welcome—just as welcome as if it were your home. Remember, now." What a strange injunction, and how solemnly yet kindly given! What an odd look of inquiry and embarrassment was in his eyes, too! He really seemed oppressed with sympathy for her. Yet she needed none. Ah, could it be? Her father—had anything happened to him? Her heart stood still with terror as the thought struck her. But no, it could not be. It was not sorrow that she had seen in the eyes that stared at her. Sympathy is sweet and tender and kind. This was hard and furtive and mean. It was a low, jeering, hateful stare, that meant—oh, what did it mean? Anger and pride and shame repeated again and again the futile question. Her eyes flashed; her face flushed and paled by turns; her hands clutched the reins nervously, and she bit her nether lip until the blood started forth in her vexation. Then she gave her horse the rein and dashed over the frozen road to the seminary.

Had the world gone mad? From every window the faces of her schoolmates were peering forth with the same curious expression. Some were lit with furtive sympathy, and some bore the same sinister leer she had met in the town. The very servant who took her horse as she dismounted scanned her face and figure curiously as he did so. She ran up the steps and entered the hall. A dozen expectant faces were turned upon her with the same indefinable, searching glance. She rushed up the stairway and flew to her room. She saw them peeping at her from the rooms, and was conscious of opened doors and watchful observers after she had passed. Was she bewitched? Was there any strange thing in her appearance—any horrible gaucherie of dress or manner—that caused her to be observed and talked of in such an unaccountable way? Had she been transformed in a day?

She rushed to her room and ran at once to the mirror to find if she could a clew to the mystery. Her attire was faultless. She caught a hand-glass from the drawer, and turning from the mirror inspected her dress from top to toe. She walked away from the glass; she turned one side and then the other; raised one arm and then the other; lifted her trailing habit, inspected even her shoes—but could see nothing that should cause remark. Amy was passing back and forth in the room. By a side glance in the mirror she detected on her face the same speculative look she had seen on others; only in her case it was linked with something she had not seen elsewhere. There was a cold, hard look—anger, almost disgust, upon her proud, regular features. Her thin lips were surely half parted in a sneer. Hilda dropped the glass and sprang toward her friend. Amy drew back and raised her hands, as if to avoid her touch. Hilda noticed that she held some books and trifles of her own that in their community of use had been usually kept in this room rather than her own. She glanced around and saw that everything belonging to her companion had been removed—books, pictures, bits of needlework, trinkets which they had hung upon the walls or laid upon the tables, in girlish attempts at decoration. On the bed in careless confusion was heaped a mass of like trifles belonging to herself, which had in the same manner found lodgment in Amy's room. Slowly it dawned upon her. Amy had returned her trinkets and was taking away her own. Her amazement was increased a thousandfold. She grew faint and dizzy with mysterious apprehension. Was the world slipping from beneath her feet? Was mankind flying from her presence? Did she bear a leper spot that all should shun and jeer or hate? She could not think—only feel and fear and dread. Every nerve seemed burdened with indefinable agony. The blood tingled in every vein. Her heart thrilled with pain. Her head was a crucible of fire. She must, she would know what it meant.

"Oh, Amy, Amy!" she said in the shrill, wiry tones which only intensest agony can give, "what is it? Do tell me what makes you look at me so strangely—and the others—the girls—everybody?"

Amy pointed coldly to the glass, her lips now parted in an unmistakable sneer, showing the small white teeth close shut beneath them, while her eyes flashed with angry fire.

Hilda shot one more glance of inquiry at the mirror.

"What is it?" she cried in despair. "Do tell me! I can see nothing."

"Yet it is very plain to others."

Again Hilda looked.

"Oh, what is it? Please tell me! Do you not see you are killing me? Why does everybody shun me to-day?"

"Because they have only just learned the truth, I suppose," said the other coldly.

"The truth! What do you mean?" The question was asked in open-mouthed wonder. "What have you learned—what has anybody learned, that they did not know before?"

"Really one would think you did not know!" said Amy with a mocking laugh, as she entered her own room.

Hilda sprang forward.

"Amy, speak! What is it? I know nothing!"

She was entering her classmate's room, as she spoke. Amy turned upon her as she reached the threshold and pushed her violently back.

"Stand back!" she cried. "Stand back! Do not dare to come into my room! Do not touch me! The very sight of you is contamination!"

"Oh, Amy—Amy!" wailed the poor girl. "What do you mean? What has happened? Why are you so angry with me?"

"Why?" shrieked the friend, now transformed into a demon of hate. "Why? Because I do not choose to associate with such as you! Because I am a lady!

Because you have imposed upon and outraged us! Because the man you call your father—"

"Stop, Amy Hargrove!" The frenzied girl was transformed into an angry goddess in an instant. "Stop!" she repeated and strode toward the venomous little figure with an air of menace that made it shrink away in fear. "Say what you please of me, but do not dare to utter one word against my father."

"Your father?" sneered Amy, still retreating.

"Yes, my father! Is it anything strange that I should refuse to hear my father defamed?"

"Meaning, I suppose, Captain Hargrove!" hisped the white-faced vixen, while her eyes gleamed like burning coals with hate.

"Of course. You know my father. Everybody knows him!" wonderingly, but yet defiantly.

"Everybody thought they knew him," replied the other with a shrug. "Now they know better."

"What!" exclaimed Hilda, with a surprised, hysterical laugh. "Are you crazy, Amy? Pray, who is my father, then?"

"Ah, indeed! That is not important now. Your mother is known!" meaningly.

"My mother?"

"Oh, yes! Your mother! Don't try to put on that look of innocence. The game is played out. We know who your mother was—or rather what she was?"

"What she was? My mother? What do you mean?" cried Hilda, her hands clasped before her and her voice quivering with wonder and dread.

"What do I mean? I mean that we know now that your mother was a slave—George Eighth's negro wife!"

There was a shriek—a fall! Amy sprang quickly forward, closed and locked the door, braced herself against it, and stood shivering and pallid, with chattering teeth and eyes upturned in terror. Did she fear something that lay inanimate and still upon the other side, which the thin panels hid?

THE SNOW SPRITES.

'Twas a still, starry midnight, just after the snow,
And in lace and fine linen the earth slept below;
The moon through her lattice of light, fleecy bars
Was peeping askance, her fair head gemmed with stars,
While a shy little brook, from somewhere in the shade,
Just tuned his guitar for a soft serenade;
When, trudging back home, at the lane's farther end,
From an evening with Shakspeare, a pipe and a friend,
A medley of soft elfin sounds reached my ear,
And I knew that the Snow Sprites made merry quite near.

On tiptoe I crept through the wood at my side,
And soon gained a spot whence their revels I spied.
'Twas a mad masquerade on a clear, frozen pool,
Where the small skaters whirled, without method or rule,
In costumes so curious, airy, and bright,

That it seemed they would melt ere they passed o'er my sight.

There were gypsies, Swiss peasants and princesses fair,
Wee barons and harlequins light as the air;
Tiny courtiers and knights, not so big as my thumb,
And pigmy musicians, with pipe, fife and drum.

Titania and Oberon glanced o'er the ice
In a pearly sleigh-chariot, drawn by white mice;
And on miniature reindeers, caparisoned bright,
Fairy couriers and outrider flashed through the night.
On mere mites of sledges, another gay band
Sped down the smooth slope of a mound close at hand;
While others were pelting the skaters in fun
With snowballs no bigger than notes in the sun;
Or, with grins of delight on each speck of a face,
Took their turns in the line at some fine sliding-place.

The ring of the skates and the voices in tune
 Arose like the hum of a bee-hive at noon,
 Till the elfin musicians wound up with a crash,
 And each domino then was unmasked in a flash,
 Disclosing the faces of more than a score
 That had long been familiar through legended lore—
 Pucks, Ariels, Snowdrops, Prince Charmings, and all
 Robin Goodfellows told of in hovel and hall,
 When the back-log is cheery, and good wives are hale,
 And the curly-pates hang on the "ower true tale."

Faster and faster the weird frolic flew,
 Wilder and wilder the sprites' revel grew;
 Till at last from a farmyard a chanticleer's horn,
 Blown softly and drowsily, hinted of morn,
 When this way and that the small multitude broke,
 And, stamping my half-frozen toes, I—awoke
 In my own easy chair, where to sleep I had gone,
 And dreamed half an hour with my overcoat on,
 With such strange fancies filled as an evening may lend
 When passed with dear Shakspeare, a pipe and a friend.

BELINDA.

BY RHODA BROUGHTON,

Author of "Good-by, Sweetheart!" "Red as a Rose is She," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XIV.

"How can I ever thank you enough for having paved the way for me?" says Sarah next morning, as the two sisters sit awaiting breakfast. "I awoke to-day in such a humble, grateful frame of mind. I said to myself, 'Thanks to God and my good sister, I am out of my difficulty!'"

"Did you happen to mention that it was your seventeenth?" asks Belinda grimly.

"I said to myself," continues Sarah, feigning deafness, "I will put on a clean calico gown, and ask granny to let us have some champagne for dinner, to celebrate my little innocent festival. Really, joking apart, it was almost worth while to be engaged to him, for the pleasure of having it broken off. Cannot you understand that?"

"I have already explained to you several times that I would rather have been burnt alive than be engaged to him at all," replies Belinda trenchantly.

But the snub, like many kindred predecessors, passes airily over Sarah's yellow head, and leaves no mark upon her satisfied serenity.

"Punch," she says, taking the two dogs' forepaws in her hands, and looking gravely in their black faces, "Punch, I am free! Slutty, I am free! Go and tell the cats and the parrot!"

Belinda has sunk back into herself. She is wondering feverishly what is making the letters so late.

"I have not even made an enemy of him," pursues Sarah, loosing the dogs' paws, and sinking back with a sigh of complacency in her chair. "I believe that in his heart he was quite as glad to be out of it as I. He was the first of them," with a slight regretful pout, "who was glad to be off!"

"I think he was very glad!" says Belinda spitefully.

"Say one word more, and I will have him back again," cries Sarah, roused by this challenge.

But Belinda makes no rejoinder. To her, Sarah and her light loves have become distant and insignificant things. Her strained ears have caught, or she thinks so, the sound of a footstep. Of course it is only Tommy bringing in the breakfast; but he may be bringing her death-warrant or her evangel, too. It is the first day on which, according to her calculation of distances, it would be possible for her to receive a letter from Rivers.

"If you had heard," continues Sarah, smiling rosilily to herself, "the masterly way in which I indicated to him that it was only my consciousness of inadequacy to fill that high post, which made me regretfully retire from it, I think that even you would have admired me."

"Should I?" quite inattentively.

"He swallowed it all," continues Sarah, growing grave. "Good heavens!" throwing up her eyes, "what will not they swallow?"

That sound has died away again. It could not have been even Tommy.

"I cried a little," resumes Sarah, with that glow of modest retrospective satisfaction still diffused all over her, extending even to her pink cambric gown. "Do not ask me how I did it; I could not even engage to do it again were the same situation to return; these strokes of genius do not repeat themselves."

She stops, her attention diverted into a fresh channel, for at this moment Gustel throws open the door, and Tommy enters, his childish arms extended to their widest stretch to embrace the breakfast tray, upon which, beside coffee-pot and rolls, lies a heap of letters and papers. Belinda does not stir now that the moment so breathlessly longed for has come; she would fain put it off again, shove it away a little further.

A paralysis of fear nails her to her chair. She feels an impulse of anger against Sarah for doing what she herself is incapable of; for her quick movement toward the tray, her hasty turning over of the family's correspondence. There is a second's pause—a pause during which hope still lives; then in a moment it is dead. Sarah's voice would tell her that, even if her words did not.

"I am afraid there is nothing very interesting for you," she says reluctantly, tossing her three or four letters without looking at her. Belinda's heart dies; then suddenly there flares up a tiny flame of hope in it again. Possibly Sarah may not recognize his handwriting. Probably it is so disguised and disfigured by trouble and emotion as to be unrecognizable. Was not this the case with her note? She snatches at the letters and looks dizzily from one to the other of the super-descriptions. Alas, no! they are all in the handwriting of familiar and habitual correspondents. She has told herself all night that her expectations were not highly raised for to-day; that to-day is the first day on which it would be possible to hear; that, being only possible, it is not also probable; that her chances are better for to-morrow or the day after. And yet now that the disappointment has come, it seems to her ruinous and final. Her first movement is to dash the letters down on her lap; then, with that instinct of self-respect which parts us from the savage and the beast, remembering that Tommy's round gaze is upon her, she picks up one, and shakily unfolding it, lets her misery-shaded eyes fall on the page. Only for a moment, however; a fresh thought makes her drop it and fly to the papers.

In a second she has torn open one of the English journals, the Standard; and seizing the advertisement sheet, greedily turns to the column of births, deaths and marriages. She runs her eye down the names; she will not allow this horrible swimming to blind her; she will read for herself.

"Abbots, Ackers, Anson, Baker, Callcott, Frith, Forly, Harper, Key—when do the R's come? what a long, long list! Ah! here they are! Raby, Rashleigh, Retford—what a number of R's are dead! Yes, here it is! Rivers!" The swimming is gone. She can see it clearly; there is no mistake. "On the 24th inst., at Denver Hall, Yorkshire, John Appleby Rivers, M. P., aged 54."

At the same moment, Tommy, his functions ended, shuts the door behind him. For a moment or two Belinda stares dully at the announcement, then silently holds it out to her sister. But Sarah does not see it; her head is buried between the other sheets of the paper, which she has been too impatient even to cut.

"I knew it," she says, speaking suddenly in a voice that is a little tremulous, a little awed, and yet triumphant. "I knew it was his father; he is dead; he has committed suicide. Poor David! no wonder he looked odd. There is a paragraph about it."

"Committed suicide!" repeats Belinda with a gasp, turning as white as the tablecloth, and her great gray eyes dilating, while the image of her poor boy-lover and his whole-hearted devotion to, his innocent enthusiasm about his father, at which she had sometimes smiled, superior yet envious, darts painfully back upon her memory.

Sarah has snatched a table-knife and is rapidly and jaggedly cutting the paper. "We regret to announce the death, under peculiarly painful circumstances, of Mr. John Appleby Rivers, of Denver Hall, Yorkshire, who for the last ten years has represented the Borough of Denver in the Conservative interest in Parliament. The deceased gentleman had retired to rest on the night of the twenty-fifth in his usual health, but on the following morning his valet, on going, to call him at the accustomed hour, found his door locked, and could obtain no answer to his repeated knocks. The family becoming alarmed, an entrance was effected through the window, when the unfortunate gentleman was found extended lifeless on the floor, with his throat cut from ear to ear. Medical assistance was at once procured, but in vain, as life had evidently been extinct for some hours." Sarah pauses with a shudder of disgust, even her blooming cheek a little paled. "Why will people cut their throats," she says complainingly, "when there are so many clean ways of dying?"

"Perhaps he did not do it himself," cries Belinda, catching breathlessly at this hope. "Who knows? Perhaps he was murdered!"

"Wait a bit," replies Sarah, putting up her hand in prohibition. "Where was I? Let me go on: 'Been extinct for several hours; the razor with which the deed had been accomplished lay on the floor beside the corpse!'" Again she shudders. "Grisly word! why will they use it? Why do all newspaper-writers love it? 'It is surmised that distress of mind, arising from pecuniary embarrassment, was the immediate cause of the rash act.'" She stops for a few moments, and there is silence. Beunda has put her hands over her eyes, before which the ghastly sight is conjured up in its red horror.

This, then, is what has robbed her of him! This is the spectacle for which he has exchanged the spring-dressed, sun-warmed Grosse Garten. This is the errand, falsely and cruelly supposed by her to be a feigned one, which has torn him away. She shivers, and the shiver is followed by a warm rush of passionate pity.

What will he do? How will he bear it? Will he ever get over it? We ask ourselves and each other this senseless question, as often as an affliction a little severer than common alights upon one that is known to us; although experience, a thousand times repeated, has taught us its folly. But below the horror and the compassion, though both are genuine, there lies in Belinda's mind a thick, deep stratum of inexpressible relief and joy. It is explained then! Suspense is ended; at least for the moment it seems so. There may be a cessation of that weary sum-doing. She may think again of the wood at Wesenstein without writhing. Her past is restored to her. Surely she can live upon it until he comes back to give her a present and a future.

"Pecuniary embarrassments!" says Sarah thoughtfully. "I do not much like that. However," with a more cheerful air, "it is better than having insanity in the family. Poor man! it was a cowardly way of cutting the knot!"

"The twenty-fifth," says Belinda, dropping her hands into her lap, and staring with eyes still dilated, straight before her; "that was the day we went to Wesenstein!"

"There is more about him—another little paragraph!" says Sarah, resuming her reading. "Oh, now we shall find out whom he married. 'Mr. Rivers was born on the first of May, 18—' (Ah! Ten and ten, twenty, and ten thirty, forty—that would make him just fifty-four)—'and was the eldest son of the late Mr. Rivers, of Denver Hall, at whose death the property was sold, in consequence of pecuniary embarrassments.' (Hem! they seem to be addicted to pecuniary embarrassments.) 'It was repurchased, five years ago, by Mr. Rivers, who had amassed a large fortune in the iron trade. He married, on the third of June, 18—, the Lady Marion Lovell, third daughter of the late, and sister of the present, Earl of Eastwood' (bravo, David! I knew that he was not undiluted iron), 'by whom he has left issue'—(a good deal of issue, I am afraid). 'He was an enlightened patron of agriculture, and belonged to several agricultural societies. His death will be widely and deeply deplored.'" She lays down the paper. "That is all."

"All!" repeats Belinda in an awed voice; "and enough too!"

"What a mercy for David that he was not at home!"

"He will not think so," replies Belinda sadly.

"He will avoid most of the horrors—coroner's inquest and all!" says Sarah, with a shiver of disgust. "I wonder what day the funeral was? You could not expect him to write before that. I am afraid that now you must not hope to hear before we leave."

"Of course not—of course not!" feverishly. "Poor boy! I do not want him to think of me at all!"

"I expect that you are the one pleasant thing he has to think about," replies Sarah dryly. "I hope to heavens that the money—" stopping abruptly. "Will you believe it? There she is! I hear her voice. She has come to tell us. Tommy, Tommy!" flying headlong into the passage, "we are not at home—we are not at home to anybody."

But, as usual, it is too late. Punch, indeed, gallops out in aid, barking irefully. It is not that bark of boisterous compliment which he addresses to most people, but one of a different character—one not unfrequently accompanied by a nip at the heels of the person indicated; a bark which he reserves exclusively for tramps and Miss Watson. Slutty has instantly crawled on her stomach under the settee. To do Tommy justice, he has opened the door as little as he possibly could; but by thrusting her person into the aperture, Miss Watson has succeeded in considerably widening it, and now stands in it, talking loudly and brandishing a newspaper. As soon as she catches sight of Sarah—

"Have you heard?" she cries eagerly. "Have you seen it? Young Rivers' father's death?—suicide? I thought you might not have seen it."

"Of course we have," replies Sarah curtly; "of course we have our papers as usual. I am sorry I cannot ask you to come in this morning; we are so—"

"Do you think he was off his head?" asks the other, interrupting. "Do you think there is madness in the family? If so, no doubt they got it from the Lovells; there is mostly scrofula of one form or another in all those old families."

"What a comfort for the new ones!" answers Sarah with a sneer. "Well, I am afraid that we are so busy packing—"

"Were not you surprised to hear that he had married one of the Lovells? I had not an idea that he had married one of the Lovells. He did not get a penny with her, I will answer for it; they are as poor as Job. Eastwood is mortgaged up to the hall-door."

"Is it? Well, as we have already heard your news," taking hold of the door with a determined air—"come in, Punch, or you will be shut out!"

"What papers have you seen?" asks the other inquisitively. "I wonder is the account the same in them all. Would you mind my having a look at yours?"

Sarah shakes her head.

"Impossible! Granny has not seen them!"

"I would lend you mine with all the pleasure in life, only that I am just going to run round with it to the Freres and Gayhursts; they take only the Times; there are not so many details in the Times."

A surly silence is the only response.

"Poor fellow! it is too sad, is it not?" continues Miss Watson, her large face beaming with pleasurable excitement. "I do not know when I have felt so cut up about anything! I shall make a point of writing to him; shall not you?"

"She is going to make a point of writing to him," says Sarah with a grimace, rejoining her sister a moment or two later, a judiciously placed hint as to the probability of some one being beforehand with her at the Gayhursts and Freres having rid her of her visitor; "it may be a bad thing to lose a father, but it is very much worse to be consoled for him by Miss Watson.

By-the-by," with a change of tone, "David has your address, has not he—your London address—you gave it him, eh?"

"Yes."

"Ah," with a little sigh of satisfaction, "that is all right then! The sooner we get to England the better for all reasons."

Belinda echoes the sentiment. What is there to keep her or her heart here now? In the place of the drag which a while ago she would have put upon the days, she would now use whip and spur to them. If Time were to obey our impulses, in what a strange jerky manner would he proceed? It is beyond the range of possibility that she should receive a letter from him here. It would be the height of filial impiety. How dare she thrust her trivial self between him and the grandeur of his grief? How dare one thought of her cross his mind, ere yet his father is laid in his bloody and dishonored grave? But by the time that they have reached England, four more days will have elapsed.

Mrs. Churchill has stipulated that the journey shall be accomplished leisurely. Once in England, he and she will at all events be separated by only one day's post, less than a day's journey. In London there are so many posts in the day. Every two hours does not there come a double knock? and may not any one of these double knocks possibly—nay, why be irrationally downhearted?—probably bring her salvation? By dint of continued cherishing, her hopes soar higher still. Why should he write? What is there to hinder his coming himself? In her heart she hears his footfall on the stairs; it will fall more softly on the carpeted London steps than on these bare stone ones. Perhaps it will be less springy than of yore; grief may have made it heavier and slower. He will enter in his black clothes; she has never seen him in black, and tries to reconstruct him in this sombre habit. He will not smile, it would not be right that he should; but he will stretch out his arms to her—Tommy being gone.

At this point her face always falls forward into her hands, and the carnations overrun their borders. She can no more look at that picture than she can stare unwinking at the mid-day sun. But though she struggles earnestly to keep hope sober and low, it is with an elastic step and a bright face that she treads the platform of the Dresden railway station on the day and at the hour of their departure. The tickets have been taken; their own, that of the luggage, Punch's. Slutty is small enough to defraud the revenue by traveling in an ingeniously constructed house of her own, which has the air of a large dressing-bag, and under which Belinda, Sarah and the maid take turns to stagger. And now Mrs. Churchill and Belinda have already seated themselves and arranged their packages. Sarah still loiters on the step, half the German army gathered round her. She has asked them all to come and see her off, and not one but has answered to the call. Her hands are full of great bouquets that they have not stretch enough to hold. She is distributing more addresses than she has time rapidly to pencil. Apparently, every one of them is to correspond with her.

Belinda has no bouquet, and no one has asked for her direction. Even her last view of the fair city is obstructed by Sarah, who has monopolized the window to lean out and kiss her fingers, crying, "Auf Wiedersehen!" until the last glimpse of her dark-blue, light-blue, and green admirers is lost to sight. And yet it is with a light heart, that sometimes even dances, that Miss Churchill steams away toward her native shores.

Who that has a grain of self-respect left would not rather find himself stranded in a "Bettering-House," than in a "Poor-House," or even an "Alms-House"? Such was the comfortable name devised by early Friends for one of their worthiest institutions, as narrated by Louise Stockton in the illustrated paper which opens the present number of THE CONTINENT. In the same pages the general and special charities of the Quaker City are described, with their quaint and peculiar characteristics.

THE reproductions of Edwin Forbes' etchings, given in connection with "Recollections of Army Life," are taken, by permission of the publishers, from "Bullet and Shell," a handsome volume of reminiscences just issued by Fords, Howard & Hulbert. Mr. Forbes' large series of etchings published several years ago and entitled "Life in the Great Army," attracted much attention at the Centennial Exhibition in Philadelphia, and the artist was the first American etcher elected by the Paris society of "Aquaretists." Some of the illustrations of the volume referred to are reduced copies, made by Mr. Forbes from his large plates, but none of these, we believe, are used with the present article.

WHISTLING is not considered a particularly fashionable accomplishment, and has even been cast into ill repute by the rhymester who predicted untold disaster for whistling girls. The habitual whistler is rather a nuisance than otherwise, and his character has long waited for the vindication now suggested by a certain nervous New York lady whose duties call her frequently to pass through streets which may be respectable, but are certainly lonely at times. She says that she is never afraid of a whistler. He who "whistles as he goes for want of thought," or "to keep his courage up," cannot, so she thinks, be contriving highway robbery in his brain, so she carries her portmanteau defiantly in plain sight, and feels that her diamond ear-rings are safe from the hand of the spoiler. Of course this diagnosis of the case will at once suggest the ruse of whistling to the enterprising burglar; and a race of innocently whistling highwaymen, pocket-book snatchers and housebreakers will no doubt shortly be developed to meet the demand of the times.

THE record of fires, deplorably long at best in this prosperous and careless republic of ours, is particularly alarming at this season of the year, when Manitoba evolves a cold wave every week or two, and thus renders necessary a larger and more reckless expenditure of fuel. In these daily or weekly lists of fires, the "elevator" has earned an unenviable distinction. It is to this attractive flue that the fire and smoke instinctively rush. Through its doors and thin partition walls they eat their way into apartments and floors before untouched, and thus the flames spread more rapidly than they could otherwise do. Now the elevator—why not call it the "lift," by the way, after the sensible English fashion?—is a necessity of modern civilization—so, also, it is to be feared, are fires. Under these circumstances, why not make the lift-shaft a great conducting chimney, through which the flames may rush and roar for fifteen minutes or half an hour without doing any especial damage to the rest of the building? The first objection, of course, is the increased cost, and this can probably only be overcome through the insurance companies and legislation or a combination between the two. The plan is certainly recommended by very high and unquestionable authority—that of fire itself. Practically it has said a hundred times in emphatic language, "When I run away I choose to go through the lift-shaft." Let architects and builders take the hint, and give it every reasonable chance to do within bounds what it will do somehow. Thus shall life and property be saved.

The Dark Horse of 1980.

THE article by Professor Gilliam in The Popular Science Monthly for February, upon the "African in the United States," is somewhat remarkable from several points of view. The writer has the merit of being the first to point out, from a clear and careful analysis of statistics, the fact that in all probability the colored race will be in a majority in every state of the South within fifty years, and will vastly preponderate in less than a century. Professor Gilliam's figures are based upon the census of 1880, and, while they cannot be accepted as reliable aggregates, it seems indisputable that the estimated proportionate increase of the races may be very safely relied upon. His analysis of this very grave question of ethnologic relations is all the more valuable because it is made from a very evident Southern standpoint. The author writes with a most distinct bias against the colored man. The facts which he recites are the very opposite of what he would have them. He states the question as every intelligent Southern man ought to consider it—purely with relation to the future of his children and that section. It is very well known that the bias of the Southern mind against the negro, as a man, has almost always resulted in coloring their scientific speculations in regard to his future to a degree that has made their fallacy peculiarly noticeable. In the days of slavery it was an accepted hypothesis that the colored man would not work except under a master, and that he was entirely incapable of self-support in a state of freedom. The argument by which this was sustained seemed almost irrefutable. History did not furnish absolutely clear analogies to the contrary, and the à priori argument against it was not generally regarded as entirely trustworthy. The experiment that began in 1865 was one which very few of any class of thinkers regarded as certain to result favorably. The verdict of those years has settled the fact in every reasonable man's mind, certainly to this extent, that in the manual avocations, at least, the freedman is entirely capable of self-support. The increased production of the great Southern staples has forever exploded the old idea. It was a pet notion with all of this class of thinkers, too, that with freedom the colored race would decrease rather than increase. Hundreds of eloquent and positive articles predicted the rapid decline and early extinction of the race when squarely opposed in the race of life to the enterprising and vigorous Caucasian. It was the almost universal belief that the superior race would increase and the inferior one would decrease in numbers at a very rapid ratio. Instead of this proving to be the case, the very reverse has shown itself to be true. The negro has outrun the white man in the race of numerical increase to an amazing extent, and bids fair to continue to do so in the future, as the writer has very clearly demonstrated.

The prediction of Professor Gilliam must be peculiarly startling to those classes of our social and political thinkers who have been accustomed to consider the future of the negro in America as a question of minor importance. The facts now clearly demonstrated by the census of 1880 make the question one of peculiar importance to every Southern man, and must convince every reader that the great question for a century to come, both to the Southern people and to the nation, must continue to be the relations of the two races to each other in the whole region known as the Southern States. It is a question altogether above party politics of to-day, though out of it will no doubt come the issues that will divide the parties of the future. No man can afford to be insensible to its importance, and least of all any citizen of the South, whose destinies must be most intimately affected by it. The case is even stronger than he puts it, since he has omitted several of the elements which must very powerfully tend to produce the result indicated.

One very important fact that Professor Gilliam has failed to notice is that the increase of colored population must constantly act as a repressive and expelling influence upon the middle class of Southern whites. Outside of the very poorest and the very richest classes, even at this time, the proportion of Southern young men who come to the North and West to engage in business and the professions is very great. The acknowledged reason is not that the negro is already crowding them, but it is not far from the true one. Remunerative employment in the ordinary branches of manual labor for the white man is very hard to find. The colored man underworks him and outworks him. Even to compete with him is discreditable. The open field, brisk demand and honorable competition of the North are drawing daily upon the really best blood of the South to an incredible extent. New York and Philadelphia alone have more Southern "carpet-baggers" among their population to-day than the whole South has had residents of Northern birth since the war, or is likely ever to have hereafter. This influence must constantly increase. The progress of the colored man in intelligence, thrift and skill will enable him still more completely to monopolize the domain of handicraft, and constantly to circumscribe more closely the fields of labor which are yet securely held by the whites. The professions have already ceased to be exclusive. In teaching and the law they have a respectable foothold, while the numbers of their paid ministers are truly amazing. While these are limited in the main to the patronage of their own race, yet they are taking yearly more and more from the supporting power of the professions for individuals of the white race. The field for the Southern white young man who is compelled to earn a living is daily growing narrower and poorer. The "common-livers" of the South as a class, have always been great feeders of the West in point of population, and promise hereafter to be a not less important factor in the immigration which is filling up the interstices of our Northern life.

Not only is Professor Gilliam's conclusion that the colored man, if he remains in the South, must, within a century, vastly outnumber the whites of that region a seemingly correct one, but that result is likely to occur in very much less time than he anticipates. The remedy—if remedy be the term to apply to such a state of facts—which he proposes is as absurdly insufficient now as it was when the American Colonization Society was founded, in 1817. No possible power can remove the colored people. The very facts which he recites should convince him of that. Our pride of race may rebel against it, but no man who has common sense and arithmetical power sufficient to measure the ratio of increase, can doubt that two things are sure to occur within the period of a hundred years, to wit: (1). The preponderance of the colored element will have become such that, by mere force of numbers alone, it must overpower the white race at the South if the "color-line" is to be the point of demarcation still. (2). The increase of the inferior or hand-working race will gradually compel the emigration of the most enterprising and ambitious of the white laborers—"common-livers"—of the South to the North, where only white competition is to be met.

In view of these facts, and the apparent probability that in the lives of our grandchildren, if not of our children, not less than twelve states of the Union may be controlled by the colored race, at least if numbers are to prevail, how important does not the question of national education become? Not only are nine-tenths of this race actually illiterate, but they are only a few generations from simple and absolute barbarism. Education will not, it is probable, affect the result so far as the numerical relations of the races are concerned. That is simply the fiat of destiny. The race that is enslaved is sure to overcome the enslaver at some period of time, if they remain together on the same soil. The only question is in what manner it shall be done—whether the inferior race shall continue to be suppressed, held down and kept under by the force of superior intelligence alone, until it breaks through the restraint with a power that will destroy, or whether the higher civilization will reach out a helping hand to the lower, and not only assist it to rise, but by so doing remove its animus to destroy. Shall the 190,000,000 of blacks whom Professor Gilliam predicts will inhabit our Southern States in 1980, be half-civilized menials or the equals in intelligence and development, as near as may be, of the 90,000,000 whites he expects to be co-dwellers with them? It is a most momentous question. In forty years the blacks will at least equal the whites in all those states. Even of the white voting population now, almost one in four is unable to read his ballot. More than forty per cent of the ballatorial power of the South is wielded by men who are dependent on other men to tell them how to vote—who, even if allowed to vote without molestation, do not know that their ballots express their wishes. The time is very short. We must educate the colored voter of the South—we must educate the ignorant white voter there—or the preponderance of ignorance will yet bring ruin—not only to the South, but to the whole land. The duty of education devolves in a peculiar manner upon the people of the North—upon the nation—as well as the states most immediately affected. It is neither just nor reasonable to expect the South to transform this mass of ignorance into intelligence by its own unaided efforts. It has already done much. Northern charity has done much. The past eighteen years have a proud record of results in this direction. What remains to be done is a thousand-fold greater than what has been done, and the necessity for it is hourly growing more apparent. Yet the Congress of the United States has no time for its consideration. The great parties are so busy skirmishing for position in the conflict of 1884, that they are deaf and blind to this greatest of all the dangers which the future holds in store for the country.

ENGLISH women who have married since the first of January enjoy the privilege, never before accorded to any female subject of Great Britain, of holding and disposing of real estate and personal property in the same manner as if they were unmarried. Moreover, a woman may prosecute her husband in civil or criminal courts, and may even bring him into bankruptcy. This state of things results from the Married Woman's Property Act of 1882, the last of a series of acts that have entirely done away with the old rule of common law, which merged all the rights of a wife in the person of her husband—a rule, by the way, with which every lazy lout in the three kingdoms with an industrious wife was painfully familiar. The act makes some curious distinctions between women who were married prior to 1870 and those who entered "the estate" between that year and 1874. Women belonging to the first-named class are entitled to their earnings and to any property, the title to which accrues as from to-day. Their husbands, however, are liable for their debts before and after marriage. The husbands of the next class—that whose limit closes with 1874—are not liable for debts contracted before marriage, but the wives are sole owners of everything coming to them as heiresses. Women married after 1874 can make their husbands liable for debts only to the value of the property they have received from their wives. Now, these distinctions may all be very clear to law-makers, but the crucial test will arise when some complicated case comes before the average British jurymen. This personage will be very apt to cherish the national conviction that a man has a right to take his wife's money to buy his daily "pint o' bitter," and, perhaps, to beat her should she resist. To him, therefore, these nice distinctions between classes may well seem "stumbling-blocks and rocks of offense." The only Englishmen who seem thoroughly capable of utilizing this state of things in all its aspects are Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan, to whom it is respectfully recommended as possibly suggestive for next winter's play. A judicious "migma" of French and English marriages, with American divorces and confusion of property rights under the property act, would assuredly, in the hands of these playwrights, afford situations quite as perplexing as any that they have thus far been able to invent.

It is always a puzzle in the forming of a library precisely what edition of the innumerable editions of Shakespeare had better be chosen.¹ The enthusiastic Shakespearean student demands more than one, and hails with delight every announcement of a new rendering by anybody; but the mass of readers care more for the poet than the critics, and are satisfied even to own an edition with no notes at all. This has its advantages where the love of study and research is an instinct, and the owner has time enough to search out for him or herself, all the shades of meaning in words now obsolete, or in references that require a library for verification. But for practical people, borne along on this swift nineteenth-century current, which allows no stops for refreshment, there is the need of something definite and trustworthy. Research is the portion of only a favored few, who deliberately climb the banks, take their post where they will, so long as it includes silence and space for work, and who refuse, once for all, to be whirled on with the money-getting, money-loving crowd. The scholar is a rare sight in this busy day, a refreshing sight as well, for it is much to find one's self suddenly freed from the complicated demands of modern life, and coming face to face with a nature too single and genuine to feel the power of common motives or aims, and content with a simplicity we have most of us foregone.

And if one holds, as the present writer most firmly does, to the faith that no matter what the work, the nature and character of the worker are woven in with every thread of its texture, then the Hudson Shakespeare must represent something we can hardly do without. The student has grown gray in the quiet research that has filled and satisfied his life. His personality outside the widening circle of pupils who have learned to love him is half a myth to the every-day reader, though workers in the same field recognize him as one of the most earnest and successful editors and critics the poet has ever had.

The edition issued by Estes & Lauriat, of Boston, known as "The Student's Handy Edition," has been put into twelve volumes, each thoroughly revised and with additional notes, and with its flexible covers, tinted paper and clear print, is a temptation and a delight to the reader. The first six volumes were stereotyped and in print before the appearance of "The Collier Emendations," but the remaining volumes received the benefit of such use of them as the editor thought desirable. The first six have now been altered also, though as such alterations were made in the plate, foot-notes could not be added. But advantage has been taken of every light afforded by modern research. The editor mourns his "slender qualifications for the task," but those who know him, while admitting his absolute sincerity in the plaint, will smile at the disclaiming of a power no man has ever more fully possessed. His analyses of the plays given in the form of an introduction to each are of especial value, and the notes not less so, representing, as they do, twenty-one years of labor. If Mr. Hudson accomplishes nothing more, this work is a monumental one.

THE phrase "still-hunter" has been of late years so intimately connected with politics and politicians of a not altogether reputable sort, that it is pleasant to find it restored in the title of this book¹ to its original and legitimate meaning. The author is one of the best, if not the very best amateur hunters in the country, and is already well known to readers of sporting-books through "Rifle, Rod and Gun in California," and through various contributions to contemporary literature of a kindred character. To the born hunter, whose longing for the wild woods is as it were a part of his being, a book like this affords delightful winter reading. It differs from most sporting-books in that it goes quietly about the business of explaining the mysteries of still-hunting without any of the preliminary flourish that too often mars the value of such works in the eyes of those who are in the habit of reading the best contemporary literature. Mr. Van Dyke's experience with the "old hunter" of the backwoods has not been encouraging. That worthy person is not in the habit of giving away the secrets of his profession, and is apt, moreover, to draw on his imagination in laying down rules for the guidance of young huntsmen. Mr. Van Dyke, on the contrary, presupposes common sense and intelligence on the part of the would-be hunter. He points out to him the necessity of observing the local habits of his game—for the habits of all wild creatures differ in a very marked degree in different portions of the country. For instance, the hunter who assumes that because deer seek the uplands at a certain season in Maine they will follow the same rule in Northern New York or Pennsylvania, will find himself very much mistaken. The still-hunter's cardinal virtue, Mr. Van Dyke says, is patience, and no one who has tried it, whether successfully or unsuccessfully, will venture to contradict him. The inexperienced amateur is recommended to this book if he aspires to that combination of patience and philosophy which makes up a genuine "Leather Stocking." The work treats in a plain, comprehensible way nearly every set of conditions likely to surround the hunter. It devotes several chapters to the use of the rifle in hunting, as distinguished from target-shooting, and to general advice in regard to outfit and equipment. Altogether it must take rank as one of the best books of the kind that has as yet been published in this country. Moreover it does not infringe on the ground heretofore covered. Indeed it frequently refers to such writers as Judge Caton and Frank Forrester as authorities on details not included in the design of the present work.

PECULIAR titles are in order, and one announced in a London journal is not only peculiar but suggestive, being "The Childishness and Brutality of the Time."

THE entire American edition of "Mr. Isaacs" has been exhausted; the Macmillans are hastening to print another, and Mr. Crawford, the author, is the hero of the hour in Boston.

THE apostle of the sunflower has reached England in an exceedingly limp and disheveled condition, with an even more morose opinion of the Atlantic than on his first crossing of its disappointing waters, and announces that he shall be excessively severe in his book on America.

"THE PENMAN'S GAZETTE" is another addition to the long list of journals each devoted to a specialty, and all well printed and readable. It is devoted, in this case, to the popular system of G. A. Gaskell, which, if one accept the ground that every man must write alike, leaves nothing to be desired in the speed, accuracy and real elegance of the hand attained.

"THE WHEELMAN," published in Boston, is fast taking place as not only an authority in all bicycling and tricycling matters, but in literary ways as well, its quality improving with every number. What may be called middle-class literature, represented by many magazines and journals devoted to special topics, is often of surprising literary merit, even in execution, and evidencing a growing critical power and appreciation in readers that is one of the reassuring signs of the times.

"THE MODERN HAGAR: A DRAMA," begins in the middle, a previous knowledge of "Baby Rue" being necessary to any understanding of it; and, though presented in two volumes, gives no sign of ending, a sequel being indicated as a necessity. It is a story with a Southern background, of the days before the war, as well as during and after that period. It is in many points a striking novel, but the machinery is very cumbrous and very obtrusive, the author making the story a vehicle for an extraordinary jumble of opinions on all sorts of matters, from free trade to divorce. One volume would have given much more enjoyment to readers, and the author has real power enough to do far better work. (The Kaater-skill series, 16mo, pp. 369, 402; $2.00; G. W. Harlan, New York).

To those who recall Palgrave's delightful volume, "A Journey to Central Arabia," comparisons will be inevitable in taking up Mr. William Perry Fogg's "The Land of 'The Arabian Nights.' Being Travels through Egypt, Arabia and Persia to Bagdad." Mr. Fogg has little of the descriptive power or grace of style which characterized Palgrave's work, but the book has its own charm in a certain straightforwardness and simplicity. It is the record of a dangerous journey, made thus far by but one other American, and was published in England in 1875, meeting there a very cordial reception. The first American edition has been revised and enlarged, and with its many illustrations is one of the best reference books for the countries described. (12mo, pp. 350, $2; Charles Scribner's Sons, New York).

THOUGH physiognomy has, in great degree, taken the place of phrenology, the principles underlying both are much the same, and those who smile at the latter may well reflect on what share it has had in bringing about more rational methods of judgment. Mr. Nelson Sizer, who ranks now among the fathers in this science, has written a very amusing and suggestive account of his life-work under the title of "Forty Years in Phrenology; embracing Recollections of History, Anecdote and Experience." The book is a chatty and agreeable record, with no pretensions to style or literary grace, but very readable notwithstanding. It is practically a history of phrenology in this country, and there are countless hints which readers will find of real value and benefit. (Illustrated, 12mo, pp. 418, $1.50; Fowler & Wells, New York).

A RECENT English periodical devotes some space to a consideration of the question, "Is Merriment Declining?" and decides that while the capacity for uproarious mirth has died out the sense of humor has intensified, and that thus we enjoy more than our forefathers. But, as a whole, Americans still "take their pleasure sadly," though one man at least among us has devoted himself to educating our limited capacity for entertaining or being entertained. Mr. George B. Bartlett's reputation is quite unique, but has a much more solid basis than the casual reader may fancy, for while his purpose is to amuse, there is a good literary quality in all the little plays and adaptations he has given, and character even in his stage directions. A little book recently issued by Harper & Brothers, "New Games for Parlor and Lawn," is a charming collection, old favorites appearing among the new candidates for favor, while many of the plays hold suggestions from which the ingenious reader can evolve new combinations. (16mo, pp. 227, $1.00).

ESTES & LAURIAT have just published "The Young Moose-Hunters," by C. A. Stephens, author of "Camping-Out Stories," etc., which is the most fascinating of all books of adventure lately given to the public, and one of the most wholesome. Four energetic and ambitious boys band together in order to make a trip to the rough region in the vicinity of Lake Umbagog, in Maine. They take possession of an old logging-camp, from which they are driven by desperate "Cannucks," but which they boldly and bravely regain; and here they hunt, fish, trap and gather spruce-gum until their return to civilization, seven weeks later. There is a flavor of the woods about their story, a familiarity with its scenery and its wild inhabitants, a good, honest ring of real life, and a true picture of the difficulties and dangers attending the trip, such as make it a story of deepest interest. In truth, boys must look out, or those of larger growth will take it out of their hands. (8vo, pp. 288, $1.75).

BISHOP WILBERFORCE's reminiscences are stirring up as much feeling as Carlyle's, and Mrs. Oliphant declares that they are often inaccurate, especially where her "Life of Irving" and Mrs. Carlyle's views of it are concerned. Mrs. Carlyle is quoted by the bishop as pronouncing Mrs. Oliphant to be both "narrow and jealous, and greatly the cause of submitting him (Irving) to his foes." Mrs. Oliphant declares that she does not believe that Mrs. Carlyle ever said anything of the kind. "The Carlyles," she adds "are at present, I think most unjustly, the sport of every scribbler, and any kind of mud will stick that is thrown at their desecrated house. But I, for one, believe in what I know of my honored friends, rather than in what an analyzing biographer may deduce, or an irresponsible diarist jot down through the fumes of careless talk. My conception of Irving's character was drawn in some respects from the inspiration of Mrs. Carlyle herself, so much so as to offend and annoy friends on the other side; and I kept back the letters she wrote to me on the publication of the book from the number of her letters which I sent to Mr. Froude, on account of the too exuberant praise and report of her husband's approbation which was conveyed in it. The cynical reader will say, perhaps, that this is no reason why Bishop Wilberforce's report should not be true. I utterly decline, however, to receive it, were it vouched for by a dozen Willberforces." The promised volume of Mrs. Carlyle's letters is to be brought out shortly by Mr. Froude's publishers here and in England.

If horrors are the legitimate province of art, and the passion and anguish of human souls the only side worth minute chronicling, then "Quintus Claudius" fills the rôle as few books have done, and as, it is to be hoped, few books will do. Ernst Eckstein, the German author, from whom the excellent translation has been made by Clara Bell, has devoted himself to Latin archaeology with the same intensity that Ebers has bestowed upon the Egyptian, and the result is, so far as the customs and thought of the time are concerned, wonderfully vivid and natural. The period chosen is that of the horrible emperor Domitian, and involves a persecution of the Christians, in which horror after horror follows, till one actually hears the grinding of martyrs' bones under the jaws of the wild beasts in the amphitheatre. The characters are very real, and no one who reads will fail to gain a new sense of what Roman history really holds; but though the ending is peaceful it is a glowing sunset over a battle-ground, where the wounded still writhe and moan. The edition is carefully edited, with innumerable explanatory foot-notes, and the volumes are well made up. (2 vols., 18mo, pp. 313-303, $2.00; William S. Gottsberger, New York).

THE author of "Hector," Miss Flora L. Shaw, needs no introduction to American readers, and her latest story, "Phyllis Brown," just issued by Roberts Bros., has much of the charm of that early work. Phyllis is a girl of fourteen, loyal, sincere and proud, with a nature of intense devotion to both ideas and people nearest her. A young Polish cousin, as unworldly, romantic and adventurous as herself, but lacking the clear truthfulness and transparency of her nature, is the contrasting element, and the two go through many adventures, some a trifle too melodramatic, but none impossible. The father is the owner of great powder-mills, and there is much fine description touching their organization, as well as a flavor of the best English country life. The workmen's socialistic tendencies, the life of the neighboring poor and various social questions are all handled, a strong conservative feeling guiding the writer, but never making her lose sympathy with suffering. "Grip," the Socialist; the struggles of his forlorn little daughter to be "respectable"; the outlaw's attempt to blow up the mills; the flood, and his experience in the "trap," with the search of Phyllis and Lal for him, and their escape at last through the underground passage, are powerfully told—almost too powerfully for the nerves of sensitive children. But the tone is so pure and high, the style so attractive, and the whole story so unusual, that it must rank with the best work that has ever been done for children, while of equal interest to their elders. (16mo, pp. 385, $1.00).

DODD, MEAD & Co., of New York, are publishing a series of histories of the minor wars of the United States, and to it Rossiter Johnson has contributed a valuable and entertaining volume on the French war. He opens with a preliminary account of the first attempts at colonization, and gives a picturesque account of how Italian and Spanish, French and English made long voyages over the seas and planted their flags all up and down the long coast, laying claims only to be disputed or forsaken. The French, however, went farther, and sought to make a harvest for the kingdom of Heaven as well as for their own monarch. The English were content to employ the Indian, and the Spaniard to rob and massacre him; but the Frenchmen meant to convert him. They followed their explorations with a mission, and where the flag went the priest pursued. Sometimes the Huguenot disputed the Jesuit, and the two quarreled over the soul of the convert; but the Frenchman, whether Romanist or Protestant, knew how to conciliate, and the savage was generally their friend if not their convert. It is a little curious that the English have kept their political hold on this continent by conquering their hereditary enemy, and that a people of French origin, speaking their native language and adhering to native customs, should form the nucleus of the most contented of the English dependencies, while their own settlements so soon rebelled and have so steadily resented all English interference or influence. There is a great deal of romance as well as philosophy in these early histories, and Mr. Johnson has told his story in a picturesque as well as careful manner. The history runs from the earliest discoveries to the surrender of Canada to the British. (pp. 374, $1.50).

IN John Geddie's "Russian Empire" (T. Nelson & Sons, New York,) there occur the following suggestive passages: "The chief of all the European streams is almost the only one that does not mingle its waters with those of the other rivers of the earth, in the great circumfluent ocean, pouring them instead into a salt lake of Inner Asia. The Russian people also—the most powerful, in numbers, at least, of the European nations—had their faces long turned in the same direction as the current of the Volga, and dwelt, first by reason of an evil destiny, and afterward from prejudice and ignorance, a race apart from others. . . . Peter the Great seized the lagging Russian nation fiercely and roughly by the throat and dragged it from its moping seclusion in the Volga forests into the full light of modern civilization. Keeping a vise-like hold upon it, he entered upon one of the most stupendous 'matches against time' ever witnessed in the history of the world, spurning it forward with savage blows and kicks, until he had worn out in the struggle his own herculean strength, but had launched his country on the track of progress on which the nations of the West had already embarked. . . . It is clear that this great country has reached a crisis in its fate. The three chief powers to be reckoned with, it would seem, are a corrupt military bureaucracy, that has almost said its last word—that is clearly moving toward bankruptcy and ruin; a people still almost dumb and blind, and only half conscious that they have rights and grievances; and a party of wild political dreamers, strong as yet only by reason of desperation, that seek, as the sole panacea for the ills of society, the total destruction of order and law. What will be the issue for Russia it is impossible almost to guess; before it, as a French writer has said, there rises 'an immense note of interrogation.'"

A DISTINGUISHED English naturalist, spending the winter in Southern France, gives the following illustration of what is called "natural mimicry:" "I was much interested one day last week in observing a large insect of the order Lepidoptera come from above the olive trees overhead with the wild, dashing flight of the larger moths. Attracted apparently by the sheltered and sunny recess in which I was sitting, and by the scarlet geraniums and bignonias which were in full flower in it, the moth darted downwards, and, after a little hovering, settled suddenly on the bare ground underneath a geranium plant. I then saw that it was a very handsome species, with an elaborate pattern of light and dark chocolate-browns. But the margins of the wings, which were deeply waved or dentated, had a lustrous yellow color, like a brilliant gleam of light. In this position the moth was a conspicuous object. After resting for a few seconds, apparently enjoying the sun, it seemed to notice some movement which gave it alarm. It then turned slightly round, gave a violent jerk to its wings, and instantly became invisible. If it had subsided into a hole in the ground, it could not have more completely disappeared. As, however, my eyes were fixed upon the spot, I soon came to observe that all the interstices among the little clods around it were full of withered and crumpled leaves of a deep, blackish brown. I then further noticed that the spot where the moth had sat was apparently occupied by one of these, and it flashed upon me in a moment that I had before me one of the great wonders and one of the great mysteries of nature. There are some forms of mimicry which are wholly independent of the animals themselves. They are made of the color and of the shape which are like those of the surrounding objects of their habitat. They have nothing to do except to sit still, or perhaps to crouch. But there are some other forms of mimicry in which the completeness of the deception depends on some co-operation of the animal's own will. This was one of these. The splendid margins of the fore wings, with the peculiar shape and their shining color, had to be concealed; and so, by an effort which evidently required the exertion of special muscles, these margins were folded down, covered up, and hidden out of sight. The remainder of the wings were so crumpled up that they imitated exactly the dried and withered leaves around. Knowing the implicit confidence in the effectiveness of this kind of concealment, which is instinctive in all creatures furnished with the necessary apparatus, I proceeded to try and test this very curious psychological accompaniment of the physical machinery. I advanced in the full sunlight close up to the moth—so close that I could see the prominent "beaded eyes" with the watchful look, and the roughened outlines of the thorax, which served to complete the illusion. So perfect was the deception that I really could not feel confident that the black spot I was examining was what I believed it to be. Only one little circumstance reassured me. There was some hole or interstice in the outer covering, through which one spot of the inner brilliant margin could be seen shining like a star. Certain now of the identity of the moth, I advanced still nearer, and finally I found that it was not till the point of a stick was used to move and shake the earth on which it lay that the creature could believe that it was in danger. Then, in an instant, the crumpled leaf became a living moth, with powers of flight which defied capture.

FUNGI not only attack living and decaying vegetable matter, but also living animals, and especially insects. In New Zealand the caterpillar of the moth buries itself in the ground to undergo its metamorphosis, where it is attacked by a fungus, which rises in the form of a simple spike about six inches in height, from the head of the caterpillar, the body of which becomes a dry mummy; a second species is found in Tasmania, but it differs from the preceding in being branched; and a third species is found growing on caterpillars in a similar manner in China, and is held in high estimation as a medicine, said to possess the properties of ginseng. Another species has lately been discovered in Ceylon growing on a white grub; it rises two to three inches above the ground; its upper part, which contains the spore-cases, is thickened and of a red color. It is said to be a new species of the genus Torrubia. In the West Indies wasps are affected with a species of sphaeria, which grows on the head like two horns: the spores impregnate them when alive, and the fungus grows to a considerable size before the wasp dies. It is generally understood that fungi do not grow in water, but it is, nevertheless, now considered that the flocky matter that grows on and destroys gold-fish and salmon is a fungus. Within the last twenty years great loss has been sustained by the silk cultivators of Europe, consequent on the silkworm being attacked by a microscopic mould fungus, allied to the salmon fungus. The thready mycelium covers and perforates the body of the caterpillar, which becomes mummified. This disease has become endemic to the silk-producing countries of Europe, which has rendered it necessary to procure fresh eggs annually from Japan and other countries not yet affected by the disease. In the autumn the common house-fly may be seen dead and adhering to the window-pane, the glass surrounding the body being dim; on examining the fly with a lens it will be found to be involved with white flocky matter, the mycelium of a mould fungus, the germ spores of which had been taken up by the fly in some kind of food. It is said that a blue-bottle fly might carry about "sufficient fever spores to infect a parish."

SOME interesting effects of lightning have been observed by M. Alluard at the summit of the Puy de Dôme, where on a circular tower is an iron mast about twenty feet high, supporting an anemometer of the Robinson type, with four copper cups. There is also a ladder and stand (both made largely of iron) to allow of access to the anemometer for cleaning. Two metallic cables connect the system with copper plates in the ground. Under these conditions St. Elmo's fire often appears at the salient points of the mast, stand, etc., and a slight hissing is sometimes heard. All the cups of the anemometer show numerous signs of fusion by lightning, and only in their upper half. Their connecting iron circle has also been fused in some places. Wherever such fusion has occurred the metal has been raised like a small volcanic cone in the centre of a crater. Some exterior force seems to have raised the melted surface.

THERE is said to be a remarkable hill of moving sand in Churchill County, Nevada, some sixty miles from Land Springs Station. The dune is about four miles long, a mile wide, and from one hundred to four hundred feet high. The sand is so fine that if an ordinary barley-sack be filled and placed in a moving wagon, the jolting of the vehicle will empty the sack, and yet the sand has no form of dust in it, and is as clean as any sea-beach sand. The mountain is so solid as to give out a musical sound when trodden upon, and oftentimes a bird lighting upon it, or a large lizard running across the bottom, will start a large quantity of the sand to sliding, which makes a noise resembling the vibration of telegraph wires with a hard wind blowing, but so much louder that it is often heard at a distance of six or seven miles, and it is deafening to a person standing near the sliding sand. A peculiar feature of the dune is that it is not stationary, but rolls slowly eastward, the wind gathering it up on the west end and carrying it along the ridge until it is again deposited at the eastern end. Mr. Monroe, a well-known surveyor, having heard of the rambling habits of this mammoth sand-heap, quite a number of years ago, took a careful bearing of it while surveying government lands in that vicinity. Several years later he visited the place, and found that the dune had traveled something over a mile.

SCIENCE still meets with many difficulties in its progress into China, and the electric light is the latest improvement which has excited the suspicion and dislike of the Mandarins. The foreign settlement at Shanghai has for some time been lighted on the Brush system, apparently to the comfort and delight of the denizens of the "model settlement," as the foreign portion of the city is generally called. The promoters appear, however, to have reckoned without the Chinese officials. They probably thought that where gas was permitted there could be no objection to electricity. The Chinese governor of the district appears to be of a different opinion. He has addressed a letter to the senior foreign consul requesting the removal of all the electric lamps. He has read, he says, in translations from European papers, that terrible accidents have arisen from electricity, and flatly refuses to permit the residents of Shanghai to be exposed to such dreadful risks. Hundreds of thousands of houses might be destroyed, millions of lives might be lost; even the walls of the city might be blown down if anything went wrong with the machines. He has strictly forbidden his own countrymen to use it, and has peremptorily ordered those who have already adopted it to discontinue it forthwith.

REPORTS come from Mexico of the discovery, near La Paz, of the largest pearl the world has ever seen. It is of light color and oval form, one inch in length and three-quarters of an inch in its shortest diameter, and of surpassing lustre. No doubt the oyster was glad to be put out of its misery, for its tenant was too large to be accommodated and too strong to be dispossessed. For a long time the poor bivalve had been unable to close its habitation. The owner of the pearl estimates its value at $50,000.

THE DRAMA.

THE incandescent electric light will be used for the interior illumination of the now completed Cosmopolitan Theatre in New York. This is the first theatre in New York to adopt this system of lighting, and the second in this country—the Bijou, in Boston, being the first.

MR. LESTER WALLACK's old theatre, on Broadway, corner of Thirteenth street, New York, not having proved successful in its German rôle, has come under Mr. Wallack's control again. It is to be called the Manhattan. Attractions not suited to the up-town house will be presented.

THE Bijou Opera House, New York, is to be under the control, next season, of a well-known manager of Cincinnati, Mr. R. E. J. Miles. Extensive alterations are to be made, and the lighter character of entertainments will be presented. The present incumbent, Mr. McCaull, is to be manager of the New York Casino, and the traveling companies connected therewith.

It is stated that Mr. Henry E. Abbey began his managerial career by "managing" a tight-rope walker at country fairs, and collecting donations during the performance in a cigar box, dividing the proceeds equally with the performer. (In the theatrical vernacular, paying his attraction fifty per cent of the gross receipts.) The distance is indeed great between the mountebank's assistant and the director of a tour, say like Mme. Bernhardt's, and the responsibility, at the same time, of several additional important ventures.

SIGNOR SALVINI's son, Alexander, who has been playing "Romeo" with Miss Mather this season, was intended by his father for a mercantile life, but before entering the business house of a friend of his father's in Baltimore, was invited by Mr. A. M. Palmer to play a small part at the Union Square Theatre, New York. He accepted, acquitted himself satisfactorily, and determined to adopt the stage as a profession. He has thus far been quite successful. The Signor lately made a special trip from Baltimore, where he was fulfilling an engagement, to Philadelphia, to witness his son's performance of "Romeo," and was so pleased with the promise of future excellence that he determined to subject him to a course of study under his personal supervision during the coming summer.

THE first performance of "The Silver King" in this country, at Wallack's Theatre, was very successful, and the play is probably destined for a long run. It is a melodrama, but differs from the "World" and "Romany Rye" by its pronounced literary and dramatic strength. The theme is psychological and full of interest, being that of a man who, in an intoxicated condition, receives great provocation from an enemy, and determines to be revenged by killing him. He goes to the enemy's house; is chloroformed there by burglars as he enters. The owner returns and is shot dead by the cracksmen with the pistol of the drugged man, who, when he recovers, believes that he has really committed the murder. Filled with remorse, he flies and is pursued by the police. The train bearing him away is wrecked, and he is believed to be killed. He escapes, however, to America and becomes rich, and is known as "The Silver King." After many years he returns, to find his wife and child in poverty, but he cannot disclose his identity, fearing detection. By an ingenious device he learns of his innocence, and everybody but the villains are made happy. Mr. Osmond Tearle played the hero with great ability, and scored a great hit, as did Miss Coghlan also, who played the wife. Some magnificent scenery was shown, and, all in all, the play was eminently a "go."

Enigma.

"BEAUTIFUL one ! fain would I sing to thee,
While sinks the moon beyond the western sea.
"I will not ask reply in flowing rhyme,
Nor specify restrictions as to time.
"What tho' responsive tone greet not the ear,
I am content with but thy presence here.
"Tho' oft thou seemest all the world to me,
I can but know my love is naught to thee.
"Yet could I bear to part from thee, my own,
And wander thro' a world like this alone?
"Light for my darkness only thou canst give,
And bring to me the joy for which I live.
"In heaven itself I seem almost to be Thro' the sweet hours I spend alone with thee ;
"And yet, for all that thou hast been to me,
Thou canst not walk, nor talk, breathe, hear or see ;
"Nor ever know the wonders thou hast done,
O mute, unconscious, soul-inspiring one !"

Camomile Tea.

It was many and many a year ago,
In a cot by the Irish Sea,
A decoction I knew of which you may know
By the name of Camomile Tea ;
A stuff which was brewed with no other end
Than to plague and be drunk by me.

I was a child, a mere bit of a child,
When I lived in that cot by the sea ;
But I hated with hate which was more than hate
That horrible Camomile Tea ;
A hate that was visible, I have no doubt,
To the eyes of my Aunt MAGEE.

And this is the reason, I happen to know,
Why she always was down on me,
Whenever I had the least malady, filling
A tumbler with Camomile Tea,
And drenching me three times a day with the same—
The horriest bore that could be—
And shutting me up in my bed-room for hours,
With a tract and more Camomile Tea.

The slaveys, not half so weary at work,
Went whispering, pitying me ;
And what was the reason, I'm blowed if I know,
Why they left me with Aunt MAGEE,
A wretched young shaver, by day and by night,
Swilling and swilling her Camomile Tea.

But my hate it was stronger by far than the hate
Of a Templar for neat eau-de-vie,
Of a Jew for a piggy-wig-gee ;
And neither my Aunt, who strove early and late,
Nor her myrmidon old Doctor B.,
Was ever so clever as me to inspire
With a liking for Camomile Tea.

Even now, strange as it seems, I have hideous dreams
Of that horrible Camomile Tea ;
Of its taste when I think I still shudder and shrink
At that nauseous Camomile Tea ;
And I muse in amaze at that old woman's craze,
On the loathing, the loathing I felt in those days,
When I lived in that cot by the sea,
In that cot with my Aunt MAGEE.

At Thirty-five.

THEY tell me, sweetheart, my life work 's half done !
Ah, no ! that is not so ;
My life began when I thy fond heart won,
Only ten years ago !

They tell me, sweetheart, I am growing old !
Ah, no ! that cannot be ;
Though hair turn gray, the heart can ne'er grow cold
Companionship with thee !

TIGER TAIL, LATE CHIEF OF THE SEMINOLES.

ISTÉ SEMOLI.*

IN the southern portion of the peninsula of Florida, far within the swampy Everglades and Big Cypress, is living the remnant of a people who fought desperately for the lands which their ancestors claimed by the right of conquest, and who prefer to drag out, in pride and poverty, a mere existence in this least desirable portion of their once powerful domain, rather than trust the Government's promise of a better home, school-houses and riches, with a title in fee simple, beyond the Mississippi. The same mistrust and dread of exile which actuated those who refused to sign the treaty for removal in the times of Osceola and "Billy Bowlegs" haunt them to-day; but the period is not far distant when, through the rapid encroachments of the whites, they will be compelled to assimilate with them or accept expatriation—their much dreaded fate.

As they cling to their home, so do they to their primitive style of dress, ancient customs and religious rites. In fact, the Seminole in Florida to-day is the Seminole of fifty years ago. He is self-supporting, the Government neither providing anything, nor exercising any control over him.

The Seminoles were originally Creeks, but, owing to continued misunderstandings, separated from the main body about the middle of the last century, and settled in the centre of the peninsula. They, at various times, adopted into the nation remnants of the Yemasees, Uchees and Micasaunkies, until they had become a people, "numerous, proud and wealthy," and so continued while under the Spanish government. But when Florida became a territory of the United States, many difficulties arose between the white settlers and these Indians, until finally the Government decided that the easiest way to solve the problem was to remove them west of the Mississippi.

An attempt to enforce this brought on a war, which lasted seven years, costing us sixty millions of dollars and the lives of nearly two thousand men. Those who were not captured, and would not surrender, fled farther south, and were permitted to remain in peace until the continued encroachments of the whites brought about what is known as the Billy Bowlegs War, when he and many of his followers were captured and sent to join their brethren in the West.

Tiger Tail, Tustenugga and old Chitco, with a few followers being still at liberty and refusing to surrender, fled into the very heart of the Everglades, where many of them with their descendants still continue to live, asking for nothing but to be "let alone."

Their numbers are variously estimated at from four to six hundred, which are divided among several villages, the main body living in the Big Cypress Swamp, near the head-waters of the Ock-holoa-couchie.

It was early one morning in March, after an unusually dry winter, that the Doctor and I, fully equipped, accompanied by Eph, who was to make himself generally useful, stepped into our boat with the intention of visiting these people in their central stronghold. Our start was made from the shanty of one of the last settlers on the Caloosahatchie, about twenty-five miles above Fort Myers.

We rowed all that day up this, the second largest navigable river of Florida, whose sluggish waters offered but little resistance as they flowed in their serpentine course through a luxuriant growth of semi-tropical foliage on their way to the Gulf. Alligators, lazily basking in the sunlight, slid noiselessly into the water, and water-turkeys darted into the river to raise their snake-like necks among the lilies and bullrushes, and stare at us as we passed. We camped that night on the former site of Fort Deynaud, the location of which we never should have known, save upon the map, but for a tall cypress tree that had been blazed by the cattle-hunters to mark the memorable spot.

As we proceeded the next morning the river grew narrower and narrower, and the overhanging branches of huge live oaks, covered with Spanish moss, came nearer and nearer, until meeting overhead they formed a perfect bower. Then sand bars and fallen trees obstructed the channel, over and around which we were compelled to work our way. As we neared the rapids at Fort Thompson the country began to expand into a beautiful prairie of six or eight hundred acres, covered with a luxurious growth of tall grass. This prairie is geographically known as Lake Flirt, but is only covered with water about six months of the year.

Landing a short distance below the rapids we shouldered our rifles and started for the trading post. On the way we passed by the ruins of Fort Thompson. A few charred stumps of the palisades are all that remain to show where once stood one of the most important stations of the Indian wars. We were made exceedingly welcome by Clay, the trader, who apologized for his stock in trade by informing us that he had been waiting some weeks for the arrival of a cargo of goods from Key West; his present stock consisting of whisky, guava jelly and a few quinine pills. We had just completed arrangements for the hiring of his oxen and cart, and were talking over the possibility of reaching the Indian village, when we heard the bugle-like tones of the cattle call, and shortly after a party of six Indians, with two ponies carrying enormous packs, emerged from under a grove of huge live-oaks to the north of the river. Their packs consisted principally of buckskins and rawhides, with a few pots and kettles attached, which kept up a continual clatter as they approached.

Their dress was uniform and rich in color, and their silver ornaments and brass mountings of their long Kentucky rifles shone brilliantly in the sunlight. On going out to meet them we were greeted with a hearty shake of the hand and a "how d'y." They were good specimens of physical development, graceful and active, of medium height, with broad shoulders and swarthy complexions. Their dress consisted of a tight-fitting "hickory" or homespun hunting-shirt, belted at the waist with a band of rawhide, from which hung a long sheathknife. Their coarse black hair was shaven from the sides of the head, excepting just above the temples, and a crest on the crown that terminated in a carefully-braided scalp-lock at the back. Enormous turbans, extending the width of their shoulders, and each formed of several bright red shawls, savored strongly of the Orient; powder-horns and rawhide pockets slung from their shoulders completed their attire. They were Big Cypress Indians, and were returning from a visit to the Creek band, near Lake Istok-poga.

Here was our opportunity. While they were removing the packs from their ponies, preparatory to camping for the night, the Doctor informed Tommy, the medicine man, of our desire to accompany them to their village. After this they obstinately refused to talk

THE BIG CYPRESS.

"Isté-hatka (white man's) talk," and, pretending not to understand, kept up quite an animated conversation among themselves in their native tongue. Finally Clay convinced them that we had no connection with the authorities at Washington, and had come a long way to make a friendly visit. To this Tommy said, "Hint-lostchay!" (good), and extended a very cordial invitation to "go Big Cypress, eat heap Injun's su-cah and chok-see" (pig and pumpkins).

All the necessary arrangements having been made for an early start, we returned to our boat, and, after removing our packs, sunk it, to protect it from the rays of the sun.

We were just seated to enjoy our morning repast, when Tommy appeared, followed by his five companions, and being invited to partake, all squatted upon the ground. The way our coffee, bacon and biscuit disappeared caused us no little alarm, until exclamations of "heap full!" told that the feast had ended, and "heipus-tchay" (I go) that we must prepare to follow. Shortly after the caravan moved forward in true Indian style, Tommy taking the lead, followed by his five bare-legged companions, the Doctor and myself; Eph driving the oxen, with the ponies attached to the tail of the cart, brought up the rear.

Our course now was by the Indian trail, in a south-southeasterly direction, over prairies, through pine-woods and palmetto thickets, a section of land that is entirely submerged during the rainy season. We had just entered the pines, and were slowly moving to the clatter of the pots and kettles jostled about in the cart, as it bounced over the roots of the saw palmetto, when an exclamation from Eph, dire and deep enough to shake the tops of the tallest trees, discovered to us that the tire had dropped from one of the wheels. We dispatched him in all haste, mounted upon one of the Indian ponies, and he returned an hour later, accompanied by Clay and the necessary implements. We began in earnest to repair the damages, while the Indians seated, dignified, and in a semi-circle, looked on with characteristic stoicism.

Dinner over, and all in readiness, the caravan again moved forward to the tune of the pots and kettles. At sunset we camped on the border of a large "gator" pond, and were joined shortly after by three of the Indians, who had left the trail to hunt for "e-chaw" and "pinnee-wah," and were successful, for they brought back a deer and a turkey, which replenished our commissary department to such an extent as to relieve us of all anxiety for the remainder of the journey. We were lulled to sleep early in the evening by the "Ump, ump, ump!" of the alligators, to awaken the next morning and find our oxen gone. An inquiring look at one of the Indians elicited the remark, "Hul-pit-tah (alligator) he eatum." This proved to be only an Indian joke, for shortly after we saw Eph approaching, leading the oxen, they having dragged the tether-stake from the ground and wandered off during the night.

About mid-day we reached the saw grass bordering on the Big Cypress, and were compelled to abandon the cart until our return. So while we were fastening our packs upon the oxen the Indians put on their leggings and moccasins as a necessary protection. We entered a narrow trail; the serrated blades of grass, six and seven feet high, pulled and tugged at our clothing as we brushed by, until we came to the Big Cypress—a damp, dismal-looking swamp, with such a dense and tangled growth of vegetation that it almost totally excluded the rays of the sun. Stumbling over cypress knees, sinking into soft black mud and splashing through slime-covered pools, we dragged our oxen after us, as we threaded our way between tall cypress trees; now to emerge upon a pine ridge, or an island of live-oak, and again plunging into the loathsome swamp. About dusk we came out upon a prairie, dotted here and there with clumps of palmetto thicket; beyond this prairie, in the pine-woods, lay the Indian village; darkness overtook us, but the glimmer of camp-fires and barking of dogs, as they came bounding toward us, told that we were nearing our destination.

Tommy led us to one of the fires, around which were seated several men, women and children. While the warriors welcomed us, the women spread bear-skins for us to sit upon, and busied themselves broiling venison and baking coontee cakes for our refreshment. We had been seated but a short time when those of the population who had been informed of our arrival surrounded us. The old men were exceedingly sociable and very entertaining, but the young warriors were dignified and reserved, and the women, being very shy, kept well in the background. They were wild and picturesque in the extreme, and were made doubly so by the light of the fire as it brought them into strong relief against the background of darkness.

The evening was spent in singing and telling stories.

A CONSULTATION.

A SEMINOLE LADY.

Charley E-math-la, an old Indian, related an amusing incident, which was decidedly at their own expense; but their hearty laughing showed a keen appreciation for the humorous side of the story. It was told in jargon, supposed to be English, but was really a mixture of Seminole and very bad English, slightly sprinkled with Spanish. The substance of the story was this: Charley, with some others, was one day quietly paddling down the river on their way to the trading post at "Fortie Myer," when they came to a wire crossing the stream (the continuation of the Havana cable crossing the Caloosahatchie about fifteen miles above Fort Myers). This was something beyond their comprehension, and the order, "Starn all!" or whatever may be its equivalent in Seminole, brought the expedition to a stand-still. What could it be, this mysterious line reaching across the silent river and disappearing in the dark forest on either bank? Landing, they followed it two or three miles to the north, returned and followed it to the south, and, much bewildered, sat down, and talking the matter over, concluded that the white man had placed it there to mark the boundary of the Indian country; so they dare not venture beyond. There they remained in a very unsettled state of mind until a party of cattle hunters who came up the river explained that it was a "talking wire," and need not concern them.

It required much coaxing and several songs from Eph to induce Billy Tustenugga, a young warrior, to sing. The air, which we heard many times after, was a particularly favorite one, and ran thus:

Andante con spirito.

We slept that night in a vacant shanty that had been assigned us, and where our packs had been deposited early in the evening. In the morning we discovered that the village or settlement was composed of some thirty shanties, scattered about singly or in groups of three or four each, half a mile intervening in many cases. They were carefully constructed of four posts, that supported a slanting roof covered with palmetto leaves, and open on one or all sides; the furniture consisted of a platform of logs raised two or three feet from the ground, and extending the width and length of the structure. From under the roofs and near by, upon limbs and poles stretched from tree to tree, hung fawn-skins filled with honey, bladders, pots and kettles, demijohns, rawhide bags, leggings, blankets, and all kinds of female apparel. Chickens and pigs meandered around, and a host of dogs and naked children frolicked everywhere. The men were preparing to hunt or work in the field, and the women were busy cooking, dressing skins or washing coontee-root.

The women were exceedingly neat and clean, evidently taking great pride in their personal appearance. They were of medium height and well proportioned. Their luxurious growth of raven-black hair was gracefully tied in a knot on the crown of the head and "banged" in front. They wore tight-fitting jackets, and two or three skirts of different lengths, the inner one reaching to the ankles, while the outer came only to the knees. Their jackets, which were short, did not meet the skirts by two or three inches, thus leaving exposed a belt, so to speak, of unadorned Seminole; around their necks were strings upon strings of large blue and white beads, completely covering their shoulders and extending upward to the chin; numerous silver ornaments and soft buckskin moccasins completed their attire. The dress of the old women was somewhat similar, but not so elaborate, while that of the children under twelve was limited to a string of bright-colored beads.

We had been stirring about but a short time, when a dignified old Indian, whom we had not seen the night before, approached and introduced himself. "Me Tiger Tailie; heap big officer under Osceola." He was a noble specimen of an old warrior, a veritable "Chingach-gook," about six feet in height, well-proportioned, with a countenance striking and prepossessing. About his head was bound a bright yellow bandana, from under which straggled his iron-gray hair, gracefully covering his shoulders. Though past eighty years, there were few outward signs of advanced age, and, being still agile, he hunted for deer and did his share of work in the corn-field. As chief, he seemed to command the respect of all the Indians, young and old. This was Tiger Tail, the old veteran, who had fought so desperately in the two wars to retain the title of lands on which he and his people were living. Since our visit the fine old fellow has gone to the "happy hunting-grounds" of his fathers.

Accompanied by the old chief, we visited several of the fields, situated some distance off in the rich hummock land, where they had cultivated extensive patches of ground, in which were growing corn, sweet potatoes, pumpkins, beans and sugar-cane, with a few banana plants and orange-trees. It is a pleasant characteristic of Seminole life that the labor of the field is equally divided among the men, women and children.

From the fields we went beyond to a group of shanties, and being invited to "hum-pit-tchay" (eat), we gathered with others about the mutual pot of "sof-gah" (thin stew of meat and rice), in which was placed an enormous wooden spoon. Streetee Parker, a sub-chief, and father of the household, presiding, seized the spoon, stirred vigorously, and, partaking, passed it to his handsome daughter, Mrs. Sammy Billy, who also partook and passed it to her neighbor; and so on until it had completed the circle. I like "sof-gah," but prefer it on the European plan. Next came venison-steak, served on the end of a long skewer stuck in the ground, at the base of which were heaped sweet potatoes just as they had been raked from the ashes.

Beside the yield of their gardens, they depend largely upon the "ah-hah," or china-brier, and coontee-root, both of which furnish them with large quantities of farinaceous food. Fish and game are abundant, and these, with their live stock of cattle, pigs and chickens, keep their larders well supplied. At the traders' their deer-skins, raw-hides and surplus stock of cattle are given in exchange for tobacco, sugar, coffee, calicoes, powder, and the few implements and cooking utensils they may require. So their wants, which are few, are well supplied, and all that the Seminole asks is to be allowed to enjoy his swampy solitude undisturbed.

Our visit extended over several days, and when we departed we were escorted in safety to the trail beyond the Cypress. Many times I met these people as they paddled their canoes to and from the trading-post, and found them ever kind, generous and hospitable, and surely they are deserving of a better fate than that which threatens them in the not far distant future.

UNFULFILLED.

WITHIN a poet's heart a song
Throbb'd wild and sweet the whole day long;
Yet ere he sang age came and stole
The music of his tuneful soul.

An artist felt the impulse fine
To paint a masterpiece divine;
Yet while he dream'd years passed away;
Death knocked upon his door one day.

A rapt musician by the sea
Ponder'd a mighty symphony;

Yet with him in his grave it lies—
Mute are its wondrous harmonies.

O thou who, in thy secret heart,
Dost nurse some life-long dream of art,
Be wise to-day! Essay thy might!
Make large with toil the hours of light!

Lo! o'er the landscape dim and brown,
How silently the night comes down!

ROBERTSON TROWBRIDGE.

AN OLD FRIEND IN A NEW DRESS.

UPON the crest of one of the hills that rise, slope after slope, to the west of the old city of Georgetown stands an old college of the Jesuits. The site is one of unrivaled beauty. The grounds cover an area of one hundred and seventy acres, comprising the most beautiful woodland heights and valleys of the region. The receding hills are crowned with their primitive forests of oak and chestnut, and at the foot of College Hill itself flow the rapid waters of the Potomac, which, though long released from their rocky fastnesses, have not lost the swiftness of a mountain stream. Along the further shores lie the Virginia Hills; nearly opposite is Arlington, over which the flag is ever seen waving as enthusiastic botanist, who, in these undisturbed nooks, increases his collection of the district flora by at least three distinct species, found nowhere else, to the truant school-boy, who studies nature on the sly.

Our New England institutions of learning, and those springing from them throughout the country, are essentially different from anything in the Old World. "American" has come to signify a type peculiar to ourselves. The survival of European characteristics in the Catholic University of Georgetown is all the more interesting because of its rarity.

Having its beginning in the first Catholic colony of the New World, the interests of the college have ever been gladly and brightly as though it marked not the resting-place of thousands of the country's dead; and, further on, a film of smoky haze but partially obscures the spires and roofs of Alexandria. To the left lies Washington, crowned by the marble Capitol, standing in dazzling relief against the more distant Maryland hills. Close at hand, creeping up to the very gates of the college, are the old streets of Georgetown, and the Heights, famous in history and in story, where still are seen the ancient houses that were the scenes of stately revelry in that "olden tyme," when every man was brave and every maiden fair. On the slope of an adjoining hill stands the many-gabled cottage of the novelist, Mrs. Southworth. The western boundary of the grounds has been recently extended to take in the land on which stood, not long ago, the old "Decatur Cottage," where for many years lived, and, in 1860, died, the widow of Commodore Stephen Decatur.

The rare good taste that has left the large grounds much in their natural state merits the gratitude of student and visitor. Through them wind the walks, a mile in length, lined by overhanging trees, that afford a grateful shelter from the southern sun. Slight rustic bridges are thrown over the little stream that threads its way through the wood, and foot-paths wind in and out, made by strollers of every class, from the allied with those of the society in the Old. Its founder, John Carroll, Archbishop of Baltimore, was the grandson of a Catholic gentleman, who, with his two sons, emigrated from Ireland and joined Lord Baltimore's colony in 1680. He had been one of the ministers of James II, and had lost vast estates because of his fidelity to the Roman Church. He was made Judge and Register of the Land Office under the Proprietary, and was also agent and receiver of rents for Lord Baltimore. The family became influential in the young colony, and their name is inseparably connected with the early history of the nation. The eldest son, Charles, became the father of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. The younger, Daniel, was the father of Archbishop Carroll.

Daniel Carroll was a gentleman of education and culture. His wife had been educated in France, and it is no wonder they sought for their young son better advantages than the school of their faith in this country afforded. From the little academy of the order in Bohemia Manor, Maryland, the boy was sent, at the age of twelve years, to St. Omer's, a school established in French Flanders for the education of the Catholic youth of England, debarred from schools at home unless they renounced their faith.

It was an eventful step in the life of the young boy, as it also proved to be in the history of the Jesuit interests in America. Twenty-seven years passed before he returned, a mature man of forty, saddened and chastened by the misfortunes of the society to which he had allied himself, to follow his sacred vocation in his native country. In a little church which he himself built at his mother's home near Georgetown, Father Carroll pursued the duties of his priesthood until 1776, when he was called upon to take part in the stirring scenes of the Revolution. He was known throughout the country for his outspoken devotion to the cause of the colonies, and his able and earnest eloquence was depended upon to induce the Canadian Government to aid them, or, at least, to remain neutral. At the request of the Continental Congress, he went to Montreal with its delegates, Benjamin Franklin, Charles Carroll and Samuel Chase, upon a fruitless mission, and nothing remained for him but to return home and henceforth aid, by his counsel and advice, the struggle for independence.

In 1789 he was appointed the first Bishop of Baltimore, and about the same time accomplished his sole ambition—the founding of an institution of learning in Maryland. Two years before he had dispatched to friends in England a petition for funds for this purpose, but the needed assistance was never obtained. During the early part of the seventeenth century, the missionaries belonging to the Society of Jesus had acquired large estates in Maryland under the "conditions of plantation," which entitled every settler who brought five able-bodied men into the province at his own expense to two thousand acres of land; and these possessions were increased by donations from the Indians for building churches and supporting priests in the Indian nations. This property had been, since the suppression of the society in 1773, held by a corporate body under the title of the "Catholic Clergy of Maryland," and it was determined to apply some part of the income derived from these lands—the only support of the members of the society in this country—to this purpose.

The site was selected and the erection of a modest building begun. This was two years before Washington was selected as the seat of government, and Bishop Carroll's most sanguine hopes could hardly have added this as a possible advantage to be considered in placing the school.

The college was opened in 1792. The first president was the Rev. Robert Plunkett, and the first pupil upon the rolls was William Gaston, the eminent jurist and statesman of North Carolina; his name is still shown, carved in rude school-boy text upon the wooden jamb of a window in the old building. Another member of this class was Benedict Fenwick, afterward bishop of the Catholic see of Boston. The college may well point with pride at its roll, containing, as it does, the names of men eminent in every profession, from nearly every state in the Union. The success of the undertaking was such as to require another building for the accommodation of the pupils. Protestant and Catholic alike looked with favor at the young college, and availed themselves equally of its advantages. Much interest was manifested in all quarters.

A legend of the college is that in 1797 General Washington rode unattended to the gate, dismounted, and, hitching his horse to the paling, entered the college, to be welcomed not only by the reverend father in charge, but by a poetical address from one of the pupils. Be this as it may, the records of the college show that he and many of his successors visited the college commencements and conferred the medals and diplomas upon the graduates.

The observatory was erected in 1843, a year after the erection of the National Observatory at Washington. It surmounts a little knoll to the westward of the college, and is a prominent object viewed from the river, with its revolving dome for the equatorial telescope and two apartments on each side for the transit and other instruments connected with astronomical research. If not the most completely equipped of observatories, it still has the honor of having been presided over by the most famous astronomers the country has known. In 1848 the revolution in Italy exiled to this country many priests, whose name have become famed in the annals of science and discovery. Among these was the astronomer of the Roman Observatory, De Vico, who, with Sestini, another astronomer whose name is familiar to students, conducted the observations at the college for some years. He was accompanied in his exile by Father Secchi, the famous physicist, who afterward succeeded him as astronomer at Rome, and to whom the world owes so much for his indefatigable observations on the spectra of the fixed stars. Father Secchi is described as a deep-browed Italian, with massive features, like those of Daniel Webster.

From this time until the breaking out of the war of the Rebellion, the increase and prosperity of the college was unexampled, under the vigorous and energetic supervision of the Rev. B. A. McGuire, the eloquent pulpit orator.

On the fall of Sumter it was impossible to repress the excitement of the students, and in forty-eight hours two hundred were speeding northward, westward, southward to their homes, leaving but one-third of their number behind. Even these were for a time wild with the exciting events that crowded upon their quiet.

The president, Rev. Mr. Early, placed the resources of the college and the use of the observatory instruhospital, and the school routine was again interrupted. Still, so perfect was the school discipline that it was found possible to continue the education of nearly one hundred students who remained at the institution during the years it was so occupied. Many a veteran who languished in hospital ward and convalesced under the shade of the grand old trees he decorated with his name will recall the many incidents that served to enliven invalid life; the unfortunate music teacher, who, forgetting the password, climbed the college wall, only to be arrested on the other side by the sentry and confined ments at the disposal of the Federal officers sent to the Heights to locate sites on the Virginia side. The boys, most of whom were from the South, were drawn up in ranks on each side of the driveway as the officers rode away, and, at the word from their young leaders, gave three rousing cheers for "Jeff Davis and the Southern Confederacy." Many of them still remember the surprised silence in which they broke their ranks as the captain turned in his saddle, and, smiling, exclaimed: "Hurra, boys, hurra! I was once a boy myself!"

The buildings were given up as barracks for the daily arriving troops, and professors and students confined themselves to the smallest possible accommodations for several months, and kept up their scholastic exercises among the bustle of parade and drill, and the novelty of military rule. Hardly were they freed from this when the sadder emergencies of war turned the college into a in the guard-house, his confused stuttering being taken as indications of fear and guilt; the delight of his pupils at his discomfiture and their own liberty; the horse-racing around the grand campus after the day's parade; the confusion and terror when the burning of a dwelling on the Virginia side, in the middle of a dark night, convinced all that the enemy was at hand; the insubordination of the whole hospital when a nearer fire, between them and Washington, aroused the convalescents to the fear that the Capital was attacked and they were needed for the rescue; the ignominious drumming-out which followed any transgression of the careful discipline that rendered even a soldiers' hospital no improper place for young boys to while away their leisure and beguile the tedium of the soldier's sick bed.

The erection of a new building in addition to those already standing was determined upon, and the archiarch and the sculptured capitals tell us that we have a specimen of Rhenish Romanesque, that type that reached its highest development in conservative Germany, and flourished side by side with the early Gothic.

Like all good architecture, it is built upon essential principles of construction; the building forms the style which is its dress and adornment, not the style the building. Standing without, an architect can follow the interior plan from story to story by the arrangement of windows and courses. Here, in this corner of the court, is a difficulty of support and light cleverly avoided by throwing across an "arch of discharge;" there you can see where the stairway mounts, window by window, in the tower.

Surely nothing could be better chosen for this Old World college. It speaks to us of the early churches, the glories of Worms, Speyer and Mayence; of the castles of feudal barons and of Norman chateaux. It is the type selected by the Jesuit fathers in Europe for their colleges, Smithmeyer and Pelz, of Washington, commenced work in 1877. The new building forms one side of a parallelogram, facing the east; the northern and southern sides are formed by the old buildings, and the fourth side is open to the west.

We have become so accustomed lately to novelties of design in architecture that the unsophisticated might not notice the striking contrast to the modern styles afforded by the yet uncompleted front. An architect notes at once that this is far removed from the style by which Queen Anne again reigns so absolutely. Here is but little ornament, severity without coldness, chastity without rudeness; the round leges and academies of learning. There are four specimens in this country, St. Mary's Catholic Church in Boston being the principal example. The stone is well chosen for the demands of the style. Blue gneiss from the upper Potomac, cool in tone, is contrasted with soft gray Ohio free-stone and finely-cut blue-stone from the Hudson.

The balancing of the masses in the building shows the taste of the architect. On the left is a square pavilion, containing the library, the scientific lecture-room and laboratory, and adjoining this a tower surmounted by a belvedere, from which can be seen the outspread cities of Washington and old Georgetown, and the blue waters of the Potomac broadening and widening as they leave the narrow channel and trend toward the ocean; on the right is the Aula Maxima, or Commencement Hall, the Museum, the reception-rooms and grand portal. Between the two, and supporting in the middle a slender clock tower, runs the curtain-like front, its monotony to be relieved by a central portico of excellent design, to be called the "Scholar's Porch." The roof-line viewed from the river, well marked against the western sky, is remarkably pleasing and picturesque in effect. The same principles of design are carried out in the interior. The rooms on the main front open out from long vaulted corridors, with cylindric arches, the niched windows on the other side of the corridor opening on the court. All features of construction are plainly displayed. Carved beams and capitals, turned wooden columns and brackets, where bay-oak and Southern pine are brought into charming contrast; corbels of chiseled free-stone and massive stone stairways lend variety.

A CORNER IN THE LIBRARY, WITH LORD BALTIMORE'S TABLE.

The air of the place is of seclusion and studious quiet. Were it not for the newness of everything here we might expect to see a file of monks pass down these aisles, and hear the chanting of the "Benedictus" borne through the open windows. The fathers, passing and repassing in their black gowns and beretti, seem much more a part of the scene than the noisy crowds of American boys who scamper up and down the stairways, clamor in the court and meet one at every turn. Wherever they are, however, be sure the black-robed father will not be far away—sitting upon a stone at the edge of the campus; directing the exercises in the gymnasium; watching, book in hand, the plays of the younger boys, little fellows who are not let to miss their homes in the care and gentleness bestowed upon them here; sitting in the teacher's chair, still book in hand, watching the shame-faced youngsters who find in curtailed freedom their severest punishment;—the director and umpire of play and work alike, the father manages, from first to last, to maintain a pleasant and friendly intercourse with every one. Looking over the College Journal one finds such anecdotes as this: One of the teachers of mathematics had offended the pupils by a rigid discipline in class. One day on entering the class-room he was confronted by a monster drawing upon the blackboard of a goose wearing a beretta, surmounting features whose lines bore a likeness unmistakable. With an imperturbable face he picked up the chalk and drew, in procession, fifteen goslings, the number of his class. The entente cordiale was at once restored.

In America we cannot have the ivy of centuries and the mellowness of tints that come from long ages of use; we can neither rival Oxford, with its Gothic halls, nor show the worn steps by which generations of students have passed to the lecture-rooms in old German universities. The little we have is not the less picturesque by its contrast.

The room for the library overlooks the river, commanding a view of exquisite beauty. Here, too, the individuality of the college asserts itself. That large oval table in the centre is a massive structure of solid mahogany, requiring nine men to lift it. It was the dining-table of Lord Baltimore, brought from England. Around it the Council of the Maryland colony under Leonard Calvert sat, and many a question of religious toleration, of war and of civil polity has been discussed across this board. For more than a century it was in the possession of the clergy at the Church of St. Inigo's, Maryland. When the residence in which it stood was burned, the fathers devoted their energies to rescuing it from the flames, and it was the only article of furniture saved. In the cases are some of the rarest books in America. An old manuscript prayer-book on vellum, supposed to be of about 1280: its initial letters, painted by hand, are fine. Here is another, "The Epistles of the Ecclesiastical Year 1376." In early printed books or incunabula the library is particularly rich. Among them are "The Etymologies of St. Isidore of Seville," a "Synopsis of Human Knowledge," bearing date 1472; a Latin Bible of 1479; "Euclid's Geometry," 1494; and "Virgil," 1502. This old law book, with beautifully illuminated initial letters, is the Pandects of Justinian, published in Venice in 1477; and beside it, still bearing the chain that insured its safety in some old court of law, is a "Synopsis, Commentaries of Paul de Castro" upon the Justinian Pandects, printed in 1483. An English black-letter prayer-book of Queen Mary's time bears date 1555. Here is its title:

When we recall that not until 1460 was any book printed on both sides of the leaf, and that Caxton's Bible, the first book printed in England, bore date 1474, the rarity of this collection will be realized.

Here also is a copy of the first edition of Pine's Horace, the text and many illustrations all printed from copperplate, bearing date 1733, and believed to be the only copy in the country. With a merry twinkle, the aged father who exhibits these treasures pulls out an Irish dictionary printed in Paris in 1756. "A most useful book," he says. "I keep it within easy reach. The Irish laborers hereabouts, when they are taunted by their fellow-workmen with having no language worthy a name, bring them here, and triumphantly display the grammar and dictionary of their tongue."

The museum of a college, if the institution be at all old, is always an interesting place. Here an altar ornament from a small church built by Lord Baltimore, now demolished; an ancient dress sword of the Carrolls of Duddington, and a silver pomander that some lady of that date wore "pendante from ye left arme," as the fashion is described, take us back to the Maryland Pilgrims. Here is General Washington's liquor-case, set in a small traveling-chest, the square cut-glass bottles still dotted with gilded stars. Could it speak, how many tales could it tell of Old Put, Mad Anthony Wayne and Light-Horse Harry, and the convivial meetings in the General's tent! There is a fragment of the chain which stretched across the river below West Point during the Revolution, to keep Sir Harry Clinton from ascending the river; a medal presented to Stephen Decatur, Sr., the father of Commodore Decatur, for his service as captain of a privateer that did good service for our young republic during the Revolution. On one side are the arms of the family, with the chivalric inscription, "Pro Libertate et Patria Dulce Periculum;" on the reverse a ship under full sail, above which is engraved, "Success to the Royal Louis," and, beneath, "Step: Decatur, Commander, 1781." Of the gallant Commodore there is an excellent portrait, and a curious memento of the battle off Tripoli—a Mohammedan prayer-book, written in Arabic characters within a broad margin defined by a black line. This little book was taken by Commodore Decatur from the neck of a Moorish soldier killed in the fight.

Some of the coins are of great value, notably two silver coins of Sicily, B. C. 450, and one of Alexander, B. C. 336; a coin of the Ptolemies, and Roman coins from Pompeii; medals of every land; a gold one presented Father De Vico by the King of Denmark, and a set presented by the family of the Mexican Emperor Iturbide. Figures and relics found in the Roman excavations bring us near to Rome when she was mistress of the world. The Old World jostles the New. Here are relics of our American Old World—Indian handiwork and ancient pottery from New Grenada

The few works of art have found their way here as gifts brought from the Old World—a statuette copy of Canova's Paulina Buonaparte, a bust of St. Aloysius by Cassano, and other minor pieces.

One of the most valuable possessions of the college is a genuine Giordano, formerly belonging to the famous collection once in the Academy of Fine Arts in Philadelphia, known as the "Meade Gallery." This collection comprised a large number of paintings brought from Europe by Mr. Richard W. Meade, a native of Philadelphia, who, at the beginning of this century, settled in Cadiz, Spain. Being a man of wealth and a connoisseur of art, he collected many valuable pictures in his travels. In addition to these, a great number were brought to him during the siege of Madrid, in 1810. They were taken from churches, monasteries and private collections—often cut from their frames in the haste to secure them and to place them under the protection of the American flag. Many of these treasures of art were purchased by Mr. Meade. Among them the "Vocation of St. Matthew," by Lucca Giordano, was remarkable for its beauty of composition and coloring. The picture is a large one, the canvas measuring seven feet by nine, and the figures are nearly life-size. It represents the Apostle at the "seat of custom" at the moment when the Saviour, in passing, called him to leave all and follow Him. The glowing colors upon the canvas seem as fresh as if just from the hand of the artist. The picture was presented to the college by a daughter of the collector, and it is fully authenticated. There are few paintings of its size and value in the country, and it should find a place among more suitable surroundings. The college has no gallery where it can be properly displayed, and it is virtually lost to the world, unless its purchase and removal are effected.

Another fine painting here is "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." It was taken from the walls of a church in the City of Mexico, during its occupancy by the American army, by a private soldier, who cut it from its frame, wrapped it about his gun, and brought it away as one of the trophies of war. It was given to the convent near by, and by the Lady Superior sent to the college.

At the foot of the hill, to the west of the college, nestle the graves of eighty-two of the fathers. Rank upon rank they lie, soldiers in death, as they were in life; soldiers who pressed forward in unselfish devotion, and who now await the last marshaling.

"They rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

ROMAN RELICS.

LEAVES FROM THE JOURNAL OF A TRAMP.

March 4.—Washington should have a special calendar. Everything dates from the beginning of the civic quadrienniate. The year itself should begin with the Fourth of March. So my journal shall open when first the south wind plays softly amid the sturdy pines and melts the snow beneath their branches. To-day the shadow of the great dome falls across my feet, but in the distance the blue hills of Virginia beckon and invite. What care I for President or Cabinet or Congress? O heart of mine, that loveth nature, I know thy answer! Unto thee, O hills, I come!

It is Thoreau, I think, who says that no matter how early you go into the woods, you will find that spring has been there before you. Spring has a fair start of me to-day. The sap is in the young trees, the raspberry bushes are purple with new life, the grass is fresh and green. I notice buds on the arbutus, and the water-cress has begun its sturdy growth. As yet, however, wild flowers have not appeared. The tiny white corollas of the Draba verna cover the hillside, but no other blossoms announce the coming of spring, except two hepaticas half hidden by dead leaves. Nevertheless, I find as I go home that my pockets are full of trophies—bits of arbutus, ferns, violet leaves and scarlet partridge berries.

March 20.—On the map of Washington and vicinity which lies before me, it is easy to notice that the long slanting line marked Boundary Street is in reality a division between the city on the one hand and the country on the other. The hills of Maryland come rolling up to the very edge of the city, like waves breaking upon a beach. You step from the asphalt pavement into broad fields and green woods. An hour's walk from the Capitol will carry you into secluded recesses, where only the voices of nature disturb the silence. There are places in Rock Creek Valley where the sounds of civilization are not heard. Washington, therefore, is a city where a lover of nature can make his home with peculiar advantage. The time may come when this shall no longer be. Let me then, to-day, go out into the woods and hear what spring is whispering to the earth.

April 15.—Out into the woods, with only my thoughts and the wild flowers for company. By the corner of an old fence I noticed a violet growing. Stooping down to pluck it I glanced along the bottom of the fence and saw with pleasure a long line of blue violets. They had grown close to the sheltering fence, and the deep, rich color of their blossoms contrasted prettily with the gray lichen-covered boards.

May 5.—A warm rain last night, and the air balmy as June. In the park I heard, for the first time this season, the sound of the tree-frogs. There seemed to be myriads of them, and their music—for it was music—filled the air. Where did they all come from so suddenly?

May 9.—The colored women who crowd the sidewalk on the outside of the market are a study. I have come to know them, and I suspect they know me. There is a fat old woman, in a gingham gown, ragged and dirty, and a more cleanly one, whose blue check apron is tied in an artistic bow. One aged negress sits with her head sunk down to her knees, and rarely stirs; but most of them are more wide awake and anxious to solicit my custom. One colored girl, standing sideways against the wall, looks like some dark figure carved in relief against a red background. The strong sunlight upon her throws a shadow that makes the impression all the more vivid. Her dress is artistically negligent, and her head is covered with a black hood. She is apparently unconscious that she would make a splendid subject for a sketch.

There is one woman who watches me as I saunter up and down, with my hands in my pockets, as if I were a detective in disguise. Different from her is the pleasant negress who calls me "honey," and, with soft cajolery, always induces me to buy several more bunches of flowers than I really want. I notice, too, that these women have different ways of caring for and arranging their wild flowers. Some keep them in great pans of water, fresh and bright, as if they had a feeling for the little blossoms. Others lay their bunches on the hot, dry bricks, until the flowers are withered and dead. Some arrange the colors so that they blend together and are made attractive.

May 13.—I have been reading Thoreau's "Maine Woods," and it has stirred my heart to seek the wild-wood. Were such a thing possible, I should at once, with blue shirt on and knapsack strapped across my back, strike for the deepest wilderness.

It seems to me sometimes as if I must have some Indian blood in my veins, which draws me almost irresistibly to green fields, waving trees, running brooks and perfumed flowers. Possibly, a long time ago, some of my ancestors worshipped Athena, the Queen of the Air. The blue of the ægis, her sky-shield, I love; before the beauty of her wonderful cloud-forms and the glorious tints of their raiment, "which no covetousness can rob," I bow down and worship. Her breath is my inspiration, and the winged birds that sail and soar and rest upon her bosom, are to me messengers of joy.

Oftentimes, when the routine of work becomes wearisome, I send my thoughts out upon the country roads, to travel fast from town to village and from field to forest; to the spots where I have camped; to the springs where I have quenched my thirst; to the paths that lead to valleys watered by murmuring streams; and when these rambling thoughts of mine return—and they return most reluctantly—I am all the better for these mental wanderings in places where my body cannot go.

May 30.—Coming down out of the woods to-day, bearing a bunch of ferns, we met a young man, who looked at it with longing eyes, and said that ferns were the very things he had been looking for. The idea! looking for ferns on a dusty roadside with never the woods in sight. Ignoramus! "He is looking for the walking-fern," said my companion, "something that will come right to him." I hope he did not find a single specimen.

June 25.—We found a field of dewberries to-day. It is on the crest of a hill, where the wind blew fresh and strong in our faces. My friend, the Professor, seems to possess an unerring instinct, which leads him where the ripest, largest, sweetest berries grow. This out-door life makes one sharp-eyed and quick-witted. It broadens one's whole nature, too. You cannot help taking in the far-reaching sweep of country, with its broad-lying fields, and getting something of their generous fullness into your heart. It is this feeling which makes your companion say to you, "If you are not finding berries, come and share with me." Selfishness has no place out here in the woods—everything must be fair and equal.

I am imbued to-day with the spirit of the Greeks and Romans, and pour upon the ground a libation to the gods before I drink the water of the mossy spring. Ferns—cinnamon-ferns and royal flowering-ferns—grow tall and rank around me. The air is laden with the perfume of magnolia and swamp azalea; the chinquapin bushes are also in bloom, their long, yellow, feathery plumes waving gracefully. Down through the woods we go to an open field, where we find larkspur and the common pansy escaped from cultivation—the latter flower dwarfed by its wild, uncared-for life in the fields. Should I grow dwarfed if I escaped from cultivation? I think not.

I quote to my companion what Ruskin says of the larkspur: "It ('the charm of the dragon') enters like an evil spirit into the buttercup, and turns it into a larkspur, with a black, spotted, grotesque centre, and a strange, broken blue, gorgeous and intense, yet impure; glittering on the surface, as if it were strewn with broken glass, and stained or darkening irregularly into red." The Professor listens until I have finished, and then laughs and says, "Intensely unscientific."

July 18.—How little the country people know of that which is at their very doors! While we were walking to-day, a discussion arose as to the common name of a certain flower. To settle the dispute, we referred the matter to a "native" who was passing in a wagon, and then to other "natives" in a house near by. None of these could enlighten us, nor did they make the least excuse for an ignorance of which I should think they would be ashamed.

July 20.—A cherry tree by the roadside offers a temptation to climb which even the dignity of a lawyer and a journalist cannot withstand. Throwing our coats upon the ground, we are soon amid the branches. The scene around us, when at last we have surfeited ourselves with the sweet, juicy, transparent fruit, attracts our attention. The country is spread out like a vast panorama. There is only one house in sight, and that is a considerable distance off. Fields beyond fields stretch away in the dim distance, until they meet the circling sky. Over to the north we can make out the deep valley through which the river passes, and beyond are the Maryland hills. The road beneath us is like a great, glistening serpent, whose shining body extends for miles to the right and to the left of us. It is high noon, but a gentle breeze fans our faces. The sound of our voices, the rustling of the leaves, the hum of the grasshopper and the momentary echo of a distant dinner-horn alone break in the mid-day silence. Not a human being is in sight. If we are not lords of all we survey, there is at least no one present to dispute our right.

As I reclined upon the ground waiting for my companion to descend, I looked up at the sky through a fretwork of grass and yarrow, daisies and blackberry bushes. A great yellow butterfly floated airily around the flowers at my head, in consciousness of perfect safety. There was a dreamy stillness in the air that soothed me. It was a day such as Longfellow has described:

"O gift of God! O perfect day!
Whereon shall no man work, but play;
Whereon it is enough for me
Not to be doing, but to be."

Here there came to me another quotation, and I laughed softly at the humor of its application as I repeated it to myself:

"Here rests his head, upon the lap of earth,
A youth to fortune and to fame unknown!"

July 21.—We can never get entirely clear of civilization. We came out into the woods to-day to rough it and cut loose from town-life, and the very first thing we do is to spread a table! The conventionalities of custom bind us tightly. I remember once that out in the woods we dined from a table of bark, which was not quite as bad as it might be; but alas for the time when we actually built a table under a tree, as if we were in a house, and had come to stay.

The blaze of our fire surrounds us with a wall of impenetrable darkness. We smoke, of course. A spring is the joy of the traveler along the wayside, but a pipe is his comfort in camp at night. The smoke floats dreamily away on the air, as idle as his thoughts. He is at peace with all mankind, and he smokes his pipe, as the Indian does, to show it. The dainty rings lose themselves, like gray spectres, in the darkness, and he falls into a reverie. Aye, in the solitude and quietness he becomes almost reverential. I should not wonder if reverie and reverential originally sprang from the same root.

August 12.—I noticed to-day that the sound which the scythe makes in cutting grass is exactly the same as the singing of the locust. The similarity of the two sounds startled me as I came through the park this afternoon.

August 22.—That was a quaint expression that I came across to-day, in reading about Thoreau—that he experienced Nature, as some men are said to experience religion.

August 24.—To Battery Cameron, by way of the Ridge Road, to see the sun set. On the crest of the Virginia hills was a low, heavy bank of clouds. Above this the sky was dappled with fleecy flakes, such as my friend calls "angels' heads." Sinking behind the clouds the sun appeared like a globe of fire. Against its red disk the edges of the clouds assumed queer shapes. Once it was a crane or stork, outlined plainly, standing beside a rock. As the sun sank the crane moved upward, and the rock became a four-footed animal grazing. Then the great glowing ball disappeared. Overhead the sky was full of delicate colors. The hills of Virginia were crowned with a blue haze, which seemed to change gradually, until away up in the zenith it became a deep red, the tint of the departing sun.

It was the rainbow over again, from the violet to the crimson.

The bunch of wild flowers which I gathered was worthy of a painter, if, indeed, any artist could have done justice to its brilliant coloring. There was the rich, deep yellow of the cone-flower and the dainty yellow of the golden rod and St. Andrew's cross; the lemon color of the toad-flax contrasted with the bright orange of the butterfly-weed; the pink purple of the phlox and the pure purple of the iron-weed; the lavender tint of the mist-flower with the greenish-white of the wild carrot and the dead white of the spurge to subdue the brightness of the rest. Back of all was the fresh green of the sweet-scented cedar, its silvery berries matching the color of the milkweed pods.

September 10.—I imagine that the young farmer whom I met driving home his hay wagon, while riding this afternoon, regarded me with envy. I would not have changed places with him; yet suppose a piece of harness had broken or a part of my buggy become loose. He could have stepped up and repaired it, while I should have been compelled through ignorance to stand by almost helpless. In that one thing, at least, he was wiser than I; and, in so far as that knowledge extended, he was better than I. He could have taught me something, and I should have had to respect him. He could have lorded it over me and told me to stand aside, and I should have been compelled to obey.

September 11.—Emerson says, "Everything good is on the highway." Yet I think the highway is lacking in its goodness if there be not a spring of clear, cool water hidden somewhere in a bordering field or under a tree by the roadside. Without such a spring it is weary to the traveler and a reproach to the country through which it passes. The walker cannot love it, and even the very animals seem hastening to leave it behind.

Our ignorance, however, may lead us astray in this matter. I have walked over a highway which seemed as dry as the dust under my feet; but afterwards, when I have passed over it with one who knew the country, he has shown me hidden springs of whose presence I had no suspicion.

September 14.—The linden tree is one of the first of trees to show the approach of fall. The gum and oak and maple die like some old warriors, flaunting their colors in the face of their foe; but the leaves of the linden shrivel, as if they dared not offer resistance, even at the first approach of autumn. The edge of each leaf first turns brown and curls up, leaving a green centre. This, indeed, is rather a pretty sight, when the leaves are viewed collectively, the colors contrasting well and the brown border being distinct.

October 5.—Like a strong, vigorous old man, who has lived on beyond his allotted time, and is at last stricken by a sudden and fatal heart disease, summer died while it was yet in its prime, though it was October. When the sun set last evening summer was with us, but ere the dawn it had disappeared. There was a death-struggle in the night that we knew not of. Out of the west came a whistling wind, cold and cruel, and a dark, overhanging cloud. The battle-royal which summer fought for life was not long. Its heart, so warm and generous, was touched by a killing frost. There were a few quiet convulsions, the flowers wept and the earth was sad. Summer was dead.

And then, out of this wind and cloud, there was born to us in the night while we slept a new season. It was no puny infant, but sprang, Minerva-like, full-grown into being. It was as strong in its youth as was the summer in its prime. It laid hold on the tender leaves and they withered in its grasp. Its breath fell upon the woods, and the trees cast off the colors of the departed summer and attired themselves in the gorgeous livery of the new king. The golden rod and aster alone lifted their heads, nor bowed in reverence to the wind as it went by. They were of the household of the young monarch, and had been waiting on the hillside and in the valley for his coming. They, with the painter's brush and marigold, shall be his crown of glory.

And he shall not die nor leave us—no, not even though the south wind come with its baneful breath—not even though the Indian summer come and apparently take possession of his throne.

December 6.—I came down the road to-night through an atmosphere thick with a frozen mist. The moonlight fell upon the earth as through a gauzy veil. The hoar-frost was unusually heavy, and covered the country with a perfect beauty. The fence-rails were as white as if a light snow had fallen, and a motionless log by the roadside was as a corpse wearing a silvery shroud. The fields stretched away into the distance, hidden beneath a white, sparkling dress—a robe de nuit of finer texture and more beautiful workmanship than mortal hands e'er made for mortal wear.

"He scattereth the hoar-frost like ashes," says the Psalmist; but ashes are dull and opaque, while every tiny frost-crystal reflects a ray of light.

December 8.—The last leaf has fallen; the last golden rod has disappeared; the chestnut-burr has opened; beneath the hickory and the walnut trees is the ripened fruit; the Indian summer days are gone, and the air is cold and bleak. Upon the throne of the year sits a royal monarch, hearty and bluff and rugged, whose mantle is whiter than ermine and softer than down.

December 9.—The branches of the aspen in the winter-time seem more flexible than those of any other tree. They present in this regard a great contrast to the limbs of the linden tree, which, no matter how hard the wind blows, are stiff and unbending, as if there was a rod of iron in the centre of every branch.

December 12.—A spring thought came to me this dreary, rainy December day. The rains of April melt the frozen earth, and in the place of snow and ice come violets and roses. The people who do good in the world melt the hard crust of the world's selfishness, and where malice and discontent abounded, bloom the beautiful blossoms of charity and love.

December 14.—How persistently summer is resisting the attempts of winter to gain a foothold. A few nights ago winter got so close upon the enemy's stronghold as to cast into it several thousand snowflakes, and I thought that the battle was surely ended. But the south wind has come to summer's assistance. To-day is fresh and warm, and winter has again retreated, I know not where.

December 15.—The crows are having a hard time of it this afternoon trying to reach their resting-place in the Virginia pines across the river. Their wings flap in a quick, desperate, convulsive movement as they battle with the wind. One old crow, who has made pretty good progress, is caught at a disadvantage, swung a little to one side, and in a moment is carried—a mere plaything of the gale—far back into the east, almost out of sight. Many of the crows make a strategic move, flying up perpendicularly, and then sailing down at an angle in the face of the wind. But even this does not avail them much.

No breath is wasted. The long line of battling, struggling crows is silent. Not a single "caw" is heard, although usually the crows make a noisy clatter while flying home. This silence and the desperate flapping of the wings are expressive.

December 17.—Winter has set his death-mark on the fields. I notice everywhere great patches of blighted grass, and over all is a sickly hue of yellowish brown. How prettily the gilded vanes shine in the sunlight here and there all over the city!

December 23.—To what shall I liken the smell of the pine needle?

Coming down the street this morning I picked up a little branch of a pine tree from the pavement. I stripped off the needles, bruised them thoroughly in my hands, and took a long inspiration of their fragrance. It was a bit of the country transplanted to the city. It filled me with a new life. Again and again I held the handful of green to my nostrils.

Far better than the insipid sweetness of cologne is this strong, healthy, woody, aromatic odor of the pine needle.

All day long I have kept the handful of needles on my desk, and ever and anon my mind wanders to a forest of stately trees, green in winter, and their tops moving to and fro in the wind.

December 24.—Midnight. My heart is open. Spirit of Christmas, enter!

I would not paint Christmas as a man, but as a maiden, ever young, ever gentle, ever kind. Not as a king, but as a queen, before whose loving sceptre all should bow; whose countenance should be the happiest that ever mortal gazed upon. Her crown should be of holly branches, and her sceptre a branch of cedar. And I, adoring, would bow before her throne.

December 25.—I am glad that this Christmas day is perfect. It only needed this to round out, fully and completely, a typical week.

First there came in the early part of the week a down-pouring of rain. So, too, there was a cloudy and tearful time in the history of God's chosen people; a time of weeping and wailing and lamentation among the prophets over the sinfulness of Israel.

Then followed the strong northwest wind blowing back the clouds and foretelling a blue sky. So, too, the powerful, self-reliant prophecy of the coming of Christ was uttered while yet there was darkness in Israel; so, too, the clouds of superstition and of error broke.

Yesterday was an almost perfect day, the air almost calm, the sky azure. This was the world becoming ready for the Saviour's birth. Do not historians tell us that at the coming of Christ the world was better prepared to receive Him than at any other time? Yesterday, over again, the earth was waiting.

So I am glad that this Christmas day is perfect. It ought to be. Christ has come into the world.

The clear, transparent blue above is the infinite tenderness of the Christ-child.

HENRY LITCHFIELD WEST.

ROBIN IN THE SNOW.

ROBIN, singing in the snow,
Where the March winds wildly blow;
Peering through the blinding storm,
I can see thy tiny form,
On the paling's sharpened height,
Quiver with the song's delight.
Clouds above and death below,
Yet thou singest in the snow!

Not a twig on any tree
Holds a nesting-place for thee;
Not an inch of forage-ground
Bare in all the country round.
On the unswept window-sill
Scattered crumbs have been thy fill,
Scanty provender, 'tis true,
For a hungry wight like you,
Minstrel, wandering to and fro,
For thy dinner in the snow.

Trill and twitter in the gloom,
"Sunshine bringeth leaf and bloom;
Soon on yonder snow-clad tree
Mate and nest and warmth for thee.
One who cares is over all—
I have heard His Easter call;
Trust Him, though the storm may blow,"
Sings the robin in the snow.

Oft the story has been told,
In the legend sweet and old,
That thy bosom's stain of red
Trickled from the thorn-crowned Head;
Watching in the twilight gray,
Ere the stone was rolled away,
Perched the sepulchre a-near,
Rose thy song of faith and cheer.
I can well believe it so,
Robin singing in the snow.

PERIOD II.

"Je ne comprends pas comme on peut tant penser à une personne : n'aurai-je jamais tout pensé ?"

CHAPTER I.

It is November; the second November since the Churchills' return from Dresden. A second summer has raced after a second spring, and a second autumn is pursuing both. The full tale of eighteen months is complete. Time has swung by on his mighty wings, which all the centuries are powerless to tire, bearing in his arms diverse gifts. To some he has brought satisfied ambition; to some grinding poverty; to some a surfeit of pleasure; to some a mad-house; and to some a grave. To many only a bundle of little nagging cares and pigmy pleasures, that passed without much heeding.

To the Churchills he has brought—what? To Mrs. Churchill a beautiful new râtelier; to Sarah, six new lovers and one new dog; and to Belinda, a knowledge of the postman's step, whether distant or near, that she might defy any inhabitant of this or any other street to rival. Before her return home, she had congratulated herself upon the convenience and number of the London posts. Ere six months are out, she execrates their frequency.

For eighteen months Belinda has been listening, and not once have her ears been filled with the sound that they are ever strained to catch. Not once has Rivers written. Not once has he come in person to explain his silence. He has gone—simply gone out of her life. That is all!

He was free, of course, to come or to go; as she tells herself, she cannot quarrel with him for that. The why she is at issue with him is that he has taken the taste of her life with him. For her he has taken the color out of the sunsets, and the music out of the larks. She looks at the beauty of our mother earth with a grudging, sullen eye. The summers with the glories of their roses; the autumns with the glories of their sheaves, are to her absolutely waste and worthless.

"Even if he came back to me," she says to herself; "even if I lived to be ninety, and saw him henceforth every day, every minute, until I die, I could never fill the emptiness of these days; they will always have been dead, dead loss!"

Now and again she rises up in revolt against the tyranny of the idea that is eating into and corroding her prime. She will cut him out of her life; will cut off that portion of her life in which he had concern, sheer away, like a precipice.

"I did well before I knew him," she says to herself, with a sort of indignation; "he was in the world, and so was I; he smiled as he does now—does he smile now, I wonder?—and I was none the worse for it. He did not blot out the sun; he did not make it up-hill work to eat, to speak, to breathe. Let things be as they were then. Why cannot they be? They shall be!"

For a moment she is strong and light-hearted; sings a gay verse of a song; feels the goodness of youth. Then a sick qualm comes over her. It is gone, done with! and the whole earth, the whole of life, is empty, hideous, void!

It is November; the afternoon is drawing toward its close. Tea has been drunk, and visitors are gone. The hour of dressing draws nigh. This, however, is a fact that neither Mrs. Churchill nor Sarah are willing to admit; Mrs. Churchill because her drive has made her sleepy, and fire and owl-light are drowsy and soothing; Sarah because she is absorbed in the ingenious, if not useful, employment of painting the large white terrier lately added to the establishment, in colored stripes and spots to represent a clown. Jane is, happily for herself, not a sensitive dog, and submits with stolid good-humor to a process that would penetrate Slutty's heart with agonies of undying shame.

"Belinda is late," says Mrs. Churchill, drawing herself up into a sitting posture, the first preparatory step toward the unavoidable, dreaded move up stairs.

"I hope she will not come back until Jane is finished," answers Sarah warmly, hesitating for an instant in the choice of a pigment; while Jane opens her mouth in a large, bored, patient yawn.

"Perhaps she did not find it so tiresome as she expected," says Mrs. Churchill, reluctantly taking the second step toward departure, and rising to her feet.

"Perhaps not," replies Sarah absently, drawing back her head the better to judge of the effect of a large splash of gamboge, just applied upon Jane's right cheek.

"What an object you are making of that poor dog!" laughing lazily.

"She likes it!" replies Sarah gravely. "She thinks it is becoming. Do not tell her it is not. If she is a success, I mean to paint the others as Harlequin and Columbine!"

"I wish Belinda would come," says Mrs. Churchill, with a little comfortable curiosity in nowise akin to the loving, foolish solicitude that thinks that some unlikely misfortune must have happened to its beloved, if he or she be detained five minutes beyond his or her usual time.

"I hope she will not come until Jane is finished!" repeats Sarah seriously, working away with redoubled ardor.

"I think she must have been amused."

"H'm!" replies Sarah dubiously. "If she is, she is the first person in whom that emotion was ever provoked by an afternoon drum; and Belinda is not easily amused. I think," with quiet pride, "that Jane will amuse her. Ah, how provoking! Here she is!"

In effect, as the last words leave her lips the door opens, and her sister enters. If your eyes were shut, or if you were blind, your ear would never have told you that it was a young person's entrance, so measured and unelastic is her step.

"Do not come here! Do not look at Jane!" cries Sarah in an agonized voice, hastily throwing the cloth on which she has been wiping her brushes over Jane's long-suffering back. "Stay where you are! No! Now you may come!"

"Which am I to do?" asks Belinda; and her voice has as little spring in it as her step.

"Well?" cries Mrs. Churchill in a voice of cheerful expectancy, ready to abridge her dressing-time, to sit down again and be amused.

"Well?" replies Belinda unresponsively.

She has advanced to the fire, and now stands there, a foot on the fender, for the evening is chill, while the cheerful flames, upspringing, play upon the uncheerful beauty of her face, and lend a little of their own dancing to the "Eyes too expressive to be blue, Too lovely to be gray," that have no dancing of their own in them.

"You are the worst person in the world to send out," says Mrs. Churchill, disappointed and cross; "for all the news you bring back, you might as well stay at home."

A couple of years ago, Belinda would have pleasantly acquiesced in her own lack of observation; would have cheerfully tried to remedy it. Now she only answers, with a sullen look:

"What is there to tell? What is there ever to tell about a drum? There was a mob of women, and a smell of hot sealskins!"

"Not a man, of course?" asks Sarah from the distant corner of the room, whither she has retired with the inchoate Jane, to pursue her artistic labors unseen. "How glad I am I did not go!"

Belinda smiles. When she smiles, you see even more clearly than when she is grave the inexpressible hardening which has happened to her face.

"There were two or three men."

"The usual refuse that you meet in a second-class literary salon, I suppose," rejoins Sarah contemptuously. "Dirty little poets, and greasy little positivists?"

Belinda still smiles a smile that is without gayety, but is not without satire.

"There was one man there whom you did not think too grimy to bestow a good deal of your notice upon at one period of your history?"

"Who?" asks Sarah, pricking up her ears with awakened yet puzzled interest. "You would not be likely to meet any of my friends there, I should hope."

"Guess!"

"Je vous le donne en trois; je vous le donne en dix; je vous le donne en mille!" says Mrs. Churchill, who at the unsealing of her granddaughter's lips has recovered her good-humor. "Was it—pooh! what a memory I have—Signor Valetta, the singing-master, who went down on his knees in the middle of the lesson?"

"No."

"I have it! It was the German who wrote 'Ich liebe dich!' on the fly-leaf of the grammar!"

"It was not!"

Sarah has paused, brush in hand, her brows furrowed by her efforts to repass in her mind's eye the crowded phalanx of her suitors.

"They were the nearest approach to literature I ever made," she says doubtfully; "except"—a sudden rush of color and animation into face and eyes—"except—no! it could not have been; it was not—was it—Professor Forth?"

"It was Professor Forth."

"How awkward for you!" cries Mrs. Churchill, interested; "and of course he is not man of the world enough to carry off the gêne of such a meeting!"

In the emotion of the moment, Sarah has unintentionally released Jane, who now trots composedly back to the fire, her incomplete face, white on one side and garishly painted on the other—a fact which, even when taken in connection with the distrustful and angry wonder of the other dogs, is powerless to rob her of her stoic calm.

"Did he speak to you? Did you speak to him?"

cries Sarah in high excitement, running back to the hearth.

"I talked to him for a good half-hour."

"He accepted the situation, in short," says Mrs. Churchill. "Well, that was more than I should have expected of him."

"Did he mention me? Of course he mentioned me?" asked Sarah eagerly.

"He inquired after granny; and then he put you in as an afterthought."

"I dare say that he could not command his voice to ask after me at first?" cries the other, laughing. "Did his voice tremble at all? I hope it trembled."

"Not in the very least."

"You talked to him for half an hour? What did you talk about?"

"We talked about Browning's poetry."

"Browning's Poetry!" with a disgusted accent. "What a bore for you! I thought that of course you would have talked about me!"

"Bore!" repeats Belinda, with a sort of bitter animation. "I thought it such a blessing. I did not want to talk about you, or myself either, or granny; we are always talking about you and myself and granny. It was such a relief to get away once in a while from people, and turn to things!"

"I must say that Browning is a great deal too clever for me," puts in Mrs. Churchill contentedly. "I am very fond of poetry; but I like something that I can understand."

"But did you talk about nothing but Browning's poetry?" inquires Sarah, incredulously lifting her eyebrows. "Did you talk about it the whole time?"

"We had hardly exhausted the subject in half an hour," replies Belinda, with a disagreeable sneer. "And then he read aloud; he was asked to read aloud!"

"And you all sat round worshipping!" exclaims Sarah, breaking into new laughter. "That is exactly what they did at the house I first met him at. You may not credit it, but I sat round worshipping, too!"

"They were rather fulsome!" replies Belinda, her lip curling at the recollection.

"And what did he read? Did he read anything amusing? But of course he did not!"

"He read 'The Grammarian's Funeral.'"

"'Grammarian's Funeral!'" repeats Mrs. Churchill with a shrug. "What a name for a poem!"

"'The Grammarian's Funeral!'" echoes Sarah, but with an emotion different from her grandmother's coloring her tone. "That was the very poem he read the night I first met him. I could not make head or tail of it; but I pretended that I thought it very fine. Belinda, beware! or this family may have a second time cause to rue that that Grammarian ever was buried!"

"How curious, your meeting him!" said Mrs. Churchill, with an amused, leisurely smile. "How it must have reminded you of Dresden!"

Belinda shudders a little. There is so much need to remind her of Dresden! And yet she herself has been surprised at the extra vividness with which the sight and bodily presence of one of the subordinate actors in the little drama enacted there has brought it back to her. Is her memory growing habitually dull? Oh, if it were so!

"Is his mother alive still?" asks Sarah, striking hastily in to divert the conversation from the channel into which her grandmother seems disposed to direct it. "I hope you were not behindhand in civility; and that as he remembered to ask after our old lady, you remembered to ask after his."

"I did not; I thought she might be dead, but I do not think she is. He mentioned her; he said something about 'My mother.'"

"Then of course she is not dead!" answers Sarah decisively; "if she had been, he would have said, 'My poor mother!' Granny, when you are dead, I mean always to talk of you as 'my poor granny!'"

"Do you indeed, my dear!" rather sharply. "Let me tell you that I have no intention of giving you the opportunity just yet!"

"Did he say anything about coming to call?" asks Sarah, with an interested look.

"Not a word."

"Did he give you the impression that he was contemplating it?"

"Not in the least."

"Do you think that he will?"

"I should think certainly not; indeed he is going back to Oxbridge to-morrow. I wish I were going to Oxbridge to-morrow! I wish," restlessly, "that we lived at Oxbridge."

"To be near him?" asks Sarah, laughing.

Her sister joins in the laugh, but without heartiness.

"Not exactly; but from what he says—from what every one says—there must be such a continual stir of intellectual life going on there."

"Good heavens!" cried Sarah, shocked; "what has happened to you? You are growing to talk just as he does; those are the kind of things he used to say to me, and expect me to provide them with suitable answers!"

"It does sound high falutin'," answers Belinda, rather ashamed; "but it is not, really: it is only that I would give anything to get out of our own little groove into any other."

"I like our little groove," says Sarah, contentedly; "by-the-by, that reminds me—Jane where are you? Jane, how dare you? How can you be so indelicate as to present yourself half dressed to Punch and Slutty? Come here this instant."

But Jane, though giving a slavish leer and a sycophantic wag of her disfigured tail, makes no movement toward exchanging her warm couch on the deep rug for the uncomfortable glories of the palette and the brush.

"It may not be a bad little groove for those who like it," rejoins Belinda, discontentedly; "but it is pleasant to get a glimpse beyond it now and then. I do not know when I have been so little bored as I have been this afternoon."

CHAPTER II.

SHE says the same thing to herself in the solitude of her own room—that solitude where the least truthful speaks truth. She says it again when she awakes next morning. Is it possible that an avenue to renewed interest in life may be opening before her? Others—Professor Forth, for instance—have lived and live by the intellect; live to all appearance worthily and contentedly. Why may not she too? What—her heart being stone dead—is there to prevent her?

"If you please, 'm," says Tommy next day in the afternoon, appearing in the doorway of the little back sitting-room, litter-room, dirt-hole, where a special cause has gathered the three ladies of the Churchill family, "there is a gentleman from Higgins and Rawson in the hall."

It is a new Tommy; the old one, having bloomed out into increased size and new vices, has been superseded; a new Tommy with a cherub face, but an education for his profession that as yet leaves much to be desired.

"A gentleman from Higgins and Rawson!" repeats

Mrs. Churchill indignantly; "there are no gentlemen at Higgins and Rawson—it is a haberdasher's shop! Ask him his business."

The cherub retires, trembling, and his mistress' attention returns to the object from which his entrance had diverted it; the object which has called both herself and her granddaughters hither. It is the washing of the dogs, a function periodically celebrated and revelled in by Sarah.

Jane is already washed; she is a pushing dog, always putting herself forward, and claiming the chief seats in the synagogues. Candescents white, cleansed from stain of indigo and ochre, no longer comic, but gravely beautiful, she lies in glory, drying on a blanket. It is now the martyred Slutty who is in the wash-tub, dripping resignedly, while Sarah's strong white arm is employed in vigorously scrubbing her fat back, and the soapsuds are falling into her dreadfully goggling eyes.

Punch is seated in a deep dejection not usual with him a good distance off, well aware that his fate also is hurrying to overtake him, but trying to imagine that he may avoid it by remaining seated in the middle distance, and totally refusing to reply when addressed.

Belinda sits by, occasionally lending a helping hand when Slutty struggles, and occasionally turning a page of the volume of Browning, which, in pursuance of her intention of living henceforth by the intellect, lies open on her knees.

Tommy has again appeared.

"If you please, 'm, there is a lady with a tambourine—"

"A lady with a tambourine!" repeats Mrs. Churchill, in an awful voice. "What do you mean, Tommy? Ladies do not play tambourines about the streets! You mean a woman with a tambourine! Send her away."

A second time Tommy retires discomfited, but not for long. After a short absence he returns.

"If you please, 'm, there is a person in the hall wishes to speak to you."

"A person!" echoes Mrs. Churchill commendingly. "Come, that is better! A shopman, I suppose! Did he say what shop had sent him?"

"Please, 'm, I do not think he is a gentleman from—I do not think he is from a shop at all. He said his name was Forth, and asked me to give you this card" (presenting one).

As her eyes fall upon it, Mrs. Churchill jumps up with a little shriek.

"Good heavens!" she cries, aghast, "it is Professor Forth! What do you mean, Tommy, by calling him a 'person,' and leaving him in the hall? Show him up to the drawing-room at once!"

"Please, 'm," replies Tommy, whimpering, "you said as how I was not to call 'em gentlemen."

"So he has come!" cries Sarah, in a rather triumphant voice, raising a beaming face from the middle of the steam and suds. "Do not you think he would like to see the dogs washed?"

"I cannot think what has brought him," says Mrs. Churchill, in a vexed voice; "that class of people has no tact. I never could find a word to say to him. Now, pray, Sarah, do not make a fool of him again! It is all very well for you, but you do not reflect what a nuisance he is to Belinda and me!"

"He is no nuisance to me!" replies Belinda coldly; "I am glad he has come. I wanted to talk to him! I do not think he has come to see Sarah; I think he has come to see me!"

She says it with cool, positive, indifferent composure. With as much coolness, as much indifference, as much composure, she walks up the stairs and into the drawing-room, pursued by her sister's message :

"Tell him that I am coming directly, but that, with me, even Love cedes to Duty, and I must finish washing Slutty."

Mr. Forth is looking toward the door as Belinda enters; and an indescribable air of relief steals over his countenance when he perceives that she is alone.

"I have taken the liberty of calling," he begins formally; but she interrupts him.

"I am glad to see you," she says, with a direct look of cold sincerity. "I wanted to talk to you. Will you sit down?"

And yet, now that the opportunity for gratifying that want has come, she seems for a while to lack the power.

According to his chilly wont, he has chosen the seat nearest the fire, opposite the window, and she has placed herself on the other side. As she looks in his face, a cataract of agonizing memories pours storming over her heart. In the throng and bustle of last night, memory had not been half so busy. She had thought that she could see him without pain; with only that dull numbness with which she sees small and great. But now she finds that for her in each wrinkle traced by thought about his eyes—in each pucker of discontent around his lips—there lurks a demon of recollection.

The little wintry, fog-thickened London drawing-room has changed to the sunny Dresden salon. It is full again of Sarah's pungent pleasantries at her lover's cost, and of Rivers' resounding laughs at them. A hundred worthless speeches of Rivers', ridiculing the other's foibles, his muffetees, his parsimony, his digestion—speeches trivial and merry when spoken, now solemn and woful, rush back upon her mind. Oh, if her heart should turn out not to be stone-dead after all! But it must!—it must!—it shall!

Her silence has lasted longer than she is aware, and there is a slight tone of offense—to that, too, a memory is tied—in her visitor's voice, as he says:

"I hope I have not chosen an inopportune moment for my visit?"

"Not at all!—not at all!" she answers hastily; but the composure with which she had entered the room, had first addressed him, is gone; a fever has come into her cheek, and a hurry into her words. "As I told you, I am glad to see you. I want to talk to you. Why have not you gone back to Oxbridge?"

"I am to return by the 4.45 train," he replies; "and I thought that I could not better utilize the moments left me than by—"

"Yes, yes, I understand," she cries, brusquely pushing aside his civilities. "I want to ask you—I want you to tell me—I suppose that you are a competent judge—is not it quite possible for a person to live entirely by the intellect?"

He looks at her doubtfully. Such a question in the mouth of a Churchill, his experience of Sarah has taught him profoundly to distrust.

"I mean," she says, nervously plucking at the Japanese hand-screen that she has taken up to shade her face—hot, but not with fire heat—"I mean," panting a little, "do not you think that that is the best life—the most satisfactory on the whole—the least liable to interruption and disappointment—that is built upon—upon—upon books, you know—upon the—the mind!"

"You must be aware," he answers frigidly, "that the whole tendency of my teaching is to show that the pursuit of knowledge is the only one that really and abundantly rewards the labor bestowed upon it."

"You think so?" she answers, breathlessly, leaning eagerly forward, and fixing her large heart-hungry eyes upon him. "You think that it would be enough—that it would satisfy one—that one would not need anything beyond?"

There is an inexpressibly sorrowful yearning in the accent with which she pronounces this last phrase. Oh, if he could but furnish her with this anodyne, how she would fall on her knees and bless him!

"Since there is no limit to the domain of the knowable," he is beginning, when again she breaks in upon him:

"No, no! of course not! I understand! but how to get at it, that is the question! I thought—I imagined—I hoped—that perhaps you might help me—might direct me!"

Again he looks at her suspiciously. Is not this the very same request with which the mendacious Sarah had opened her fire upon him? Is this a thirst for learning of the same character, and that is likely to be quenched with the same surprising ease?

"Of course," she goes on hastily, mistaking the source of his hesitation, "I cannot expect you to waste much time upon me; but I thought that—that—perhaps you might be inclined to set me on the way; to—lend me a book or two every now and then."

"I am not in the habit of lending books," he answers, still suspiciously; "but I should be happy to make an exception in your favor, were I convinced that your desire for self-education were a genuine one."

"Genuine!" she cries, indignant and astonished. "Why what else should it be? What motive could I have for feigning it?"

A slight look of embarrassment, mixed with mortification, crosses his face.

"You cannot have forgotten," he says, "the interest in literature counterfeited by your sister—"

He stops suddenly; for, as if the mention of her had conjured up her bodily presence, at the same instant she enters, protected by her grandmother and by a tempest of clean dogs.

"How are you?" cries she, holding out her hand to him with the same easy, jovial smile as if they had parted yesterday on the best of terms. No confusion born of the recollection of their last meeting troubles her good-humor. No doubt as to the present visit being addressed to her ruffles her mind. None such apparently results from the precipitancy with which, upon her entry, her ex-lover begins to seek his hat, and murmur of his train.

"And about the books?" says Belinda, with a hesitating wistfulness when her turn comes to be bidden good-by to. "You will not forget about the books?"

It seems to her as if he were carrying off her new, faint, feverish hope with him, and she cannot let it go without a struggle.

"I will think of it," he answers hurriedly, with a distrustful glance at Sarah; "I—I will let you know."

"What about books?" asks Sarah inquisitively, as soon as the door has closed upon him. "Is he going to lend you books? The old villain! it was with books that he first beguiled my young affections. I believe that he is like Jacob: not having been able to obtain Rachel, he is going to try and put up with Leah! eh, Leah?"

"What an untidy way he has of sitting!" says Mrs. Churchill pettishly, advancing to set right the chair lately occupied by their guest; "these loose chair-covers are a mistake. I am sure I hope that he will be in no hurry to repeat his visit. One thing is certain; not one of us expressed the slightest wish to see him again!"

"If I did not express it, I felt it," answers Belinda perversely. "I wish to see him again."

Mrs. Churchill's sole response is a silent shrug, a mode lately adopted by her and Sarah of receiving the starts and frets of Belinda's temper—that temper once so smooth and sweet—a mode of expressing that they are to be endured, not argued with.

"How curiously ugly he is!" cries Sarah, chuckling at the recollection. "I could hardly help laughing when I looked at him; he is like Charles Lamb's Mrs. Conrady: 'No one ever saw Mrs. Conrady without pronouncing her to be the plainest woman that he ever met with in the course of his life. The first time that you are indulged with a sight of her face is an era in your existence ever after. You are glad to have seen it—like Stonehenge!'"

Mrs. Churchill laughs lazily. "What a memory you have, child!"

"I can go on, if you like," continues Sarah, encouraged by this praise. "'No one can pretend to forget it. No one ever apologized to her for meeting her in the street on such a day and not knowing her; the pretext would be too bare.'"

"You have always grossly underrated him," says Belinda severely; "there is a side of him, an intellectual side, which you are totally incapable of appreciating!"

"Totally!" assents her sister placidly; "and so, I hoped, were you!"

"At least I know that it is there!" cries Belinda angrily, beginning to walk restlessly about the room after a fashion that she has adopted during the last year—a fashion that is somewhat trying to her housemates' patience. "I recognize it; I admit it; I would imitate it if I could!"

"Since when?" asks Sarah dryly.

There is something in her apparently harmless question which jars upon Belinda's sick nerves.

"It is very hard," she breaks out, reddening, "that one should be thrown back and ridiculed here, when one makes any least effort to improve one's self! What is the use of making any attempt in such an atmosphere as this? What is the use of struggling—of trying—"

She bursts into stormy tears, and leaves the room.

"Her temper is becoming impossible!" exclaims Mrs. Churchill, holding up her pretty old, white hands.

But Sarah only says, "Poor dear!" in a very lenient voice, and kisses all the dogs.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE LOST ESTATE.

WHERE the deadly nightshade grows,
Where grim shadows now repose,
Once the morning stars arose
In the golden olden time.

Fairy footprints sparkled there;
Heavenly music filled the air;
Darkness, Silence and Despair
Fled on noiseless raven plumes.

Spring awoke the dreaming flowers;
Birds in hymeneal bowers
Sang away the halcyon hours
On the hyacinthine shore.

Love and Beauty, hand in hand,
Wandered through this wonder-land—
King and queen, at whose command
All its teeming treasures lay.

Then their hearts no sorrow knew,
For their love was warm and true;
Fields were green and skies were blue;
Life was rosy with romance.

Lordly mansions they possessed
In this "island of the blessed,"
By enamored waves caressed
Into slumber on the deep.

Never, in her wildest flight,
Gleamed, on Fancy's eager sight,
Fairer gardens of delight,
Or in cloudland or Cathay.

How the desolation came—
Whether pestilence or flame,
War or famine, were to blame—
No one, living now, may say.

Voyagers on passing ships
Whisper yet, with whitened lips,
Of the wan and weird eclipse
Fallen on that high estate—

Tell of cruel lust of gold,
Beauty haggard, love grown cold,
And disasters manifold
Wasting the enchanted isle.

Ivy frets the palace wall;
Crumbling arch and column fall;
Mold and canker over all
Hold a ghostly carnival;

Light and music flown away;
In the courts no fountains play;
Death holds undisputed sway
From the mountains to the shore.

Ah! had Love his truth maintained,
Then his kingdom had remained,
And his dynasty had reigned
O'er that Aidenn evermore.

CHAPTER XXXV.

BORN OF THE SPIRIT.

BEECHWOOD SEMINARY had a wide reputation. It not only afforded exceptionally fine advantages for the education of young ladies, but it was eminently respectable. To have been admitted to its classes was of itself a certificate of social rank. To have graduated from Beechwood was to hold a master-key to good society everywhere in the land. Twenty years had passed since the Misses Hunniwell began with three boarders, whom they taught in the parlor of their father's house, upon the front of which the Seminary building proper now abutted. Their father had been a merchant who had saved from ruin, in the "crash" of '37, only this old homestead and the little hill-side farm, whose chief value was that it furnished firewood and shelter. His daughters had been well educated, and were too proud to descend from their former high social position to any menial avocation, and too "capable," as the saying of that region is, to be dependent upon others. Their mother was dead. So between them they managed the household and the scholars, and managed both so well that their fame soon came to the ears of others—parents and pupils.

Then the father died. Their pupils filled the house, and some even obtained board at the neighbors'. They builded a separate school-room; it was soon more than full. Then a small legacy fell to them. They borrowed what was really a large sum in those times, and erected the comfortable structure that now bore the name of Beechwood Seminary. In a few years the debt was extinguished. One of the sisters died, and the other wrought with still greater pride and devotion because of her memory. It was a high-priced and high-toned institution; but it was a thoroughly good one. Its founders contemplated their own advantage, yet they were strictly honest, and would have scorned to take pay for anything without giving a fair equivalent for it. They were, above all things else, ladies. They were descended from one of those old families of the colony whom the age of vulgar shops and factories overtook and drove in upon themselves. They were types of that aristocracy which somehow or other grew up and stood, proud and cold and self-respecting, among the barren hills which mechanic art invaded with its army of hand-workers—men and women—whose labor was to build the foundations of the aristocracy of to-day. The Hunniwells were an old family. Their blood was very clear and very blue. The chilly purity of that creed whose great expounder had once dwelt almost in sight of the seminary, had left its impress on their hearts. To "be a lady forever" was a Scriptural injunction that followed hard upon the decalogue in their minds. To be in all things "under the breath of good repute" was a prime pre-requisite to favor with them. They pitied the poor. They would cheerfully serve the humblest. Suffering never cried to them in vain. Conscience and sincerity were to be seen in their soft, refined, yet sharply cut faces, as clearly as the blue veins that showed through the silky skin. The calm gray eyes were full and strong, but they were kind and, in a way, tender. They were interested in their neighbors of the busy borough that had grown up so near the old farmhouse by them. They patronized the public schools which nestled about among the hills. Rarely did one of these close a term that one of the sisters with a few of their pupils did not honor the closing day with their presence. The white slender fingers pointed out errors on the blackboard or the slate. The silky brown curls that framed the calm, refined faces and softened their serene severity, rose and fell with the little nods of approval which they gave for the encouragement of merit. Their aristocracy was not one of scorn or self-assertion, but of infinite self-respect. They did not like new things or take kindly to new ideas. The proprieties of the olden time ruled their convictions. They kept aloof from "isms" that smacked of question of the old doctrines. As the delegated guardians of the pupils intrusted to their charge, they held it a sacred doctrine to see that these imbibed, while under their care, no doubtful dogma. They were not ascetics. They did not shut their pupils away from the society that surrounded them, but required them to attend church upon the Sabbath, encouraged them to attend the prayer-meetings, and with the parents' assent allowed them sometimes to attend social gatherings and to receive, with scarcely a show of restraint, the visits of the young men of the neighborhood on certain specified evenings. The Misses Hunniwell were ladies and had no young ladies at their school whom they could not trust. So, too, they were not unreasonably severe in regard to girlish escapades, recognizing that young life must break from its leading-strings now and then. Their pic-nics, "recreation evenings" and holidays were festal occasions full of sweet innocent pleasure, not only to their pupils but to the favored youths who were deemed worthy of admission to this hill-side Eden.

Since the death of the elder sister, and especially since the coming of Hilda and Amy, even the former seemingly light discipline had been somewhat relaxed. Hilda, especially, had become a prime favorite, despite her apparent disregard of some of the minor proprieties. Much was forgiven, because of the free, untrameled life of Sturmhold. The privileges which Captain Hargrove had demanded as the condition of her coming had been granted with some reluctance. Perhaps no man of less evident gentility—certainly no man whose Southern birth and lineage did not entitle him to ask such a thing as a concession to the home life and custom of his daughter—could have obtained the consent of the lady principal of Beechwood to the keeping of a pony for his daughter's use. It was with no little misgiving that it was granted. After a time it seemed to prove so innocent a pleasure, and Hilda's abounding health as well as her frank good nature, cheerful application and marked superiority in her studies had thoroughly overcome the good lady's fears, that more than one sleek pet stood in the stable of the institution. She was not at all averse to the added income, though no temptation of gain could have induced her to lower, in the least degree, the standard of excellence or the tone of exclusiveness and propriety which clung around this pride of her lonely life. Since these innovations had come she had even allowed herself a pleasant luxury, which she had never before dreamed of indulging. Having now to keep an assistant for the man-of-all-work, who spaded the garden, milked the cows, prepared the wood and did the purveying for the institution, she had set up her carriage in a modest way, instead of relying on the village livery when she needed a vehicle for any purpose. So it happened that Beechwood had come to be regarded as not only a respectable and exclusive institution but even in a sense a luxurious one. All this added to its prosperity and popularity until the number of pupils who were refused admission, year by year, almost equaled the number accepted.

Yet let it not be supposed that there was any lack of wholesome discipline at Beechwood. Woe to the young lady who transgressed in any really important feature its regulations. She found that beneath the gentle nature of the principal there was a will of iron. Concealment of any fault or evasion of any duty was certain to receive merited reproof and humiliation. Falsehood in word or act was the most heinous sin. The unworthy, incorrigible or persistently neglectful were weeded out with the most summary firmness. She was tender in her care but inflexible in her requirements. Among the things most rigidly prohibited was all mention of the question which had grown to be the absorbing topic of the day. Holding herself to be the parent pro tempore of her pupils, she considered it a sacred duty to see to it that the home teachings of each were not perverted while under her care. Having pupils from the South, as well as the North, she counted it needful, both for her own interest and as a trustee of their interests, not only that discussion and dissension should be avoided, but that ideas which might be repugnant to the respective parents should not be imbibed by them while under her control. So while the life about her became a seething mass of heated controversy, Beechwood felt none of its influence. To this fact Miss Hunniwell owed no little loss of prestige among the people of the town. She was said to be bitterly proslavery in her views, and the seminary was regarded by some of the most rancorous of the abolition fanatics as a nursery of the most pestiferous doctrines.

This opposition naturally inclined this self-reliant woman to a more positive and pronounced hostility to that sentiment which had gradually worked its way into so many of the institutions of the North. So when a family of colored children found their way into the schoolhouse of the little village she ceased her customary visits there, and so far overstepped her own rule as not only to speak somewhat bitterly in reference to it in private conversation, but also to refer to it in her customary Wednesday afternoon talks to her pupils. She did not like slavery. She even regretted its existence, and was truly sorry for the slave's hard fate. But, on the other hand, she did not like the negro. She thought he had a right to the proceeds of his own labor—to be a man and have a home—but that did not make him white, or entitle him to be the equal of the white man. She gave liberally to the Colonization Society, and hoped the day would come—indeed, she prayed for it daily—when Christianized slaves would be reshipped to Africa by the million as missionaries, who should convert their barbarian kinsmen to Christianity. She took no note of probability or possibility. She never stopped to consider of their fitness, and it did not once occur to her that the untaught slave was, at best, a queer emissary to bear the message of Christian freedom to the continent whence Christian hands had ravished slaves for centuries to minister to Christian greed. Her only feeling was that they ought not to have been taken from thence, and, being here, ought to be gotten rid of as soon as possible. There were very many who sympathized with these views, but in the region where she dwelt the antipathy to slavery as an act of personal injustice to the slave was fast overcoming the antipathy of race and color.

It was to this community and to this woman that the report had come, so well supported that none could doubt, that a favorite pupil of this exclusive institution was a threefold social leper—illegitimate, the daughter of a slave—perhaps a slave herself—and cursed with that befouling taint, the blood of Africa. The metropolitan journals had brought the news, now fully confirmed, of the death of Captain Hargrove in the attempt to remove the slaves from Mallowbanks, together with the further information, derived from papers found upon his person that removed all possible doubt, that the daughter of George Eighmie and Alida had been entered as a pupil at Beechwood. The village paper, which was rampantly Abolition in its tone, had referred to it with a sly touch of gratification at the position in which the principal would find herself, combined with a really sympathetic allusion to the young lady herself. Another journal, of opposite proclivities, published in a village a few miles away, had discoursed upon it at considerable length, taking occasion to express its entire confidence that Miss Hunniwell had been imposed upon by the accomplished kidnapper and the girl whom he had represented as his daughter. It added that the latter was said to be gifted with that rare beauty which the quadron sometimes possesses, but was easily recognized as having colored blood when the fact was once suggested to an observer. Three letters had also come by that morning's mail to the lady principal, which brought vividly before her mind all the horrors of the fact she had learned. Two of these were from Southern patrons. They were bitterly indignant at the fact that their daughters had been made the victims of such an infamous fraud, and demanded their instant return to their homes. They denounced her in unmeasured terms for the very sin she hated most—deception. She felt that their anger was justified. She was angry herself at the imposition which had been practiced upon her, and utterly appalled at the disgrace which must ensue to her beloved seminary. The other letter was from Mr. Robert Gilman, in his capacity of attorney for the heirs of Eighmie, informing her that they had positive information that "a certain negro girl, belonging to the estate of said Eighmie," was kept and harbored at the seminary under her charge, under the name of Hilda Hargrove, having been entered there as the daughter of Merwyn Hargrove, deceased, who had the said girl in his possession, claiming to be the testamentary heir of said Eighmie, though in fact held only to be an administrator de son tort of said estate. A reward of one thousand dollars was offered if she would hold and detain the said negro girl until the duly authorized administrator could take measures to reclaim the same as the property of the estate. He added that the administrator would arrive in a very short time—perhaps nearly as soon as his letter—fully prepared to substantiate his claim and take the necessary steps to recover possession of the slave.

A cry of horror escaped the lips of the teacher as she threw the letter from her, almost before she had finished its perusal.

In an instant she was transformed. The anger of her patrons, the pecuniary loss, the shame that would attach to Beechwood and its loss of prestige—all were forgotten in the horrible vision that rose up before her of the fate that impended over her favorite pupil. Till that moment she had not been conscious of any exceptional fondness for Hilda. Her beauty, her winsome frankness and her affectionate disposition had made her a favorite with all; but this foster-mother of twenty generations of alumnæ, this alma mater of a thousand spotless girls, would have counted herself unworthy of her trust had she admitted in her heart an hour before that she could love one of them in any great degree more than another. She would have dismissed from her employ at once any teacher who had manifested a like partiality for any particular pupil. All her life she had been as impartial as Rhadamanthus, and had fixed her pride upon and given her care and tenderness in almost equal degree to all. Now, the heart of this gray-haired, childless woman burst the bound of habit, and cast aside all the wisdom and pride of her life. She forgot every one that was under her charge save this lone child of a nameless union—the hopeless Pariah, the incurable leper, before whom waited only a life of shame and suffering—this nameless waif of the Dead Sea of Slavery. She saw it all—the chains—the block—the mart—the life of shame—the death long waited for and welcomed because an end of life. Within her breast the mother sprang to life. Born of this spirit-travail Hilda became at once her child—her one ewe-lamb—her very own. Her father's death had given her back the mother she had never known.

"Oh, my darling! my darling!" cried the childless woman, as she clasped her arms across her bosom and walked back and forth across the study floor. "My child! My Hilda! What shall I do? How shall I save you?"

That moment she caught the fire of the enthusiasts. In that hour she became a fanatic. The one thought which was seething in the heart of the people had found entrance to her own, and drove out all others. No argument, no exposition of theory had ever touched her calm, conservative nature; but the very thought of this Nessus robe, which must forever encase the fair young form in the room above, overturned at once her life-long convictions, destroyed all thought of prudence, and set her in battle array against an institution of which Hilda's peril was but an incident—rare, perhaps, but possible. With her nature it was not enough to feel or believe. She must act. She ceased her rapid walk across the room, took the letter of the attorney from the floor, and carefully read it again. Her soft cheek burned and her eyes flashed with anger. She sat for a long time with her head resting on one hand, her lips close shut, and the letter crushed in the clinched fingers of the other. She was thinking—thinking what she could do, what she must do. She had decided without thought what she ought to do. She hated this attorney who could speak so coolly of the fate that impended over her favorite. Yet he was a good man, an honest man; a loving, tender-hearted father and a conscientious attorney. In writing this letter he had performed a simple duty which the law imposed upon him. If he had known her thought, he would no doubt have been surprised. He would have felt that she was unjust, and he, in his turn, would also have been unjust. Cruelty was as foreign to his nature as to hers. He was only the product of a system she could not understand, as she was the creature of a development of which he knew nothing.

She heard the shriek and then the fall in the room above. In an instant she comprehended what had passed. She knew that the fatal message had reached Hilda's ears. She sprang to her feet, rushed out of her study, ran along the hall and up the stairs with the crumpled letter in her hand. The curious pupils, who had come from their rooms at the sound of the shriek, shrank away from her as she passed them in amazement. She did not speak to them nor look at them. No one had ever seen her manifest excitement before. A teacher, with a white, terrified face, met her at the head of the stairs, and asked her a question. Miss Hunniwell thrust her rudely aside without reply, passed straight on to Hilda's room, turned the knob without knocking, entered, and closed the door behind her.

Without there were pale faces, quivering lips and hushed, wondering whispers. The premonition of a sad, mysterious tragedy that was being enacted in the midst of them had hushed the chatter of an hour before.

THE VANISHED LIGHT.

FRAIL, lovely lamp of workmanship divine,
Some ruthless hand hath quenched thy gleaming light;
No flush of pink now stains the marble white
Of thy cold, sculptured form. Harsh Death, 'twas thine
To work this wanton deed. Thou gavest no sign;
But with one breath hast wrought for me such blight
As Time can ne'er undo. Thou 'st doomed to night

The life whereon that pure, clear flame did shine;
On radiant reach of some fair heavenly slope,
The light here quenched now gloweth like a star.
Death hath no foothold in that realm, whose scope
God's angels scarce do know, and naught can mar
The beauteous flame; while I in anguish grope
O'er paths unlit and ways that darkened are.

AMERICAN MANNERS.

NOTHING is more common than criticism of American manners, the causes assigned for their shortcomings being as various as the complaints are loud and frequent. One censor attributes all faults of decorum to the American's want of reverence, another to his lack of leisure; still a third finds a cause in his unpicturesque costume, and, with a fond glance backward at knee-breeches and lace ruffs, holds the modern trousers and stiff linen responsible for the evils.

In all these cases there is an assumed disorder, the source of which is sought. That is, American manners are assumed to be bad manners, and society is probed to find the origin thereof. The search reminds one of the story of the wise men puzzling their heads over the problem why a jar of water weighed no more after the fish was put in than before. It was a long time before any one suggested that the jar be weighed to see whether the case was truly stated, whether the jar actually did weigh no more with the fish than without it.

We propose to ask in the outset: Are American manners bad, and, if so, in what respects? What, in the first place, is the standard of comparison? Pressing the question closely, we shall be apt to hear a good deal about "gentlemen of the old school," about a "queenly carriage," "courtly grace," etc., with perhaps some references to "the good old times when George the Third was king"—from which we may infer that English society in the latter half of the last century presents itself as one model of politesse. If we accept this as the only or the best model of manners, we must resign at once any claim for our own time and country. The sweeping courtesy, the studied obeisance, the quaint ceremonials of those days are out of date; no one now attaches the same importance to the exact angle of the feet and elbows on entering a room; the "Art of being Easy at all Times and in all Places," the most popular work of the time, is now out of print. Along with these traditions, however, have come down to us other traditions also, which leave no doubt that this same imposing "gentleman of the old school," this model of deportment in the presence of ladies, or under the tranquilizing influences of a state dinner, sometimes used very ugly words when with those of his own sex alone, and it is quite certain that even that pattern of all the feminine graces and accomplishments of her time, the Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, was not wholly without reproach in the private relations of life.

Evidently, to consider the subject at all, we must first come to some sort of definition. We must know what we mean by manners before we can classify them as good or bad. In the first place, I think we must discard the Sunday-school theory that good manners are synonymous with certain virtues, as unselfishness, amiability, consideration for others and the like. Had I not long seen its fallacy, I could have had no more convincing proof of it than has come to me during the present writing. A gentleman called on me, who commands my entire respect, both by reason of his able mind and his generous heart. Nay, more than this. When I think of the perseverance by which he has gained an education, despite of poverty, discouragement and difficulties of various kinds; of the industry by which, though still young, he has made for himself a place in his profession; of his goodness of heart toward the unfortunate and sorrowful, my respect quickens into admiration. Yet this man of true and tender soul, calling upon an errand which did credit to both head and heart, stood before me with his hat on his head and his hands in his pockets; and, when I had arranged to go with him at an appointed hour to co-operate in his benevolent mission, asked me "if it would be too much out of the way for me to call at his office!"

On the other hand, a gentleman (so-called), whom I have every reason to believe is a veritable scoundrel, places a chair for me with a grace that I have never seen equaled, and says "good morning, madam," with such empressement that I feel like a princess for many hours thereafter. And this man of the gracious mien but wicked heart finds a welcome in society, and really good society, too, where my noble friend, if invited at all, would be laughed at, except by the few that know him well enough to forgive his blunders.

Neither are fine manners synonymous with talent or education. You shall see the scholar of wide and accurate knowledge abashed and ill at ease the moment he leaves his study, while a mere simpleton will have the air of savoir faire in every situation.

Plainly, this thing, which is neither virtue nor wisdom, but which, more than either, is the passport to the "best" society, is not of trifling import; but while always instantly recognizable, it is nevertheless so impalpable as almost to elude definition. Perhaps we can get no nearer to a definition than by saying that manner being the deportment of one person toward other persons, fine manners consist in suitableness. A really fine manner is susceptible of infinite shades and gradations, but each suitable to the time, place and person. A manner which is suitable in addressing a person of twenty years of age is not suitable toward one seventy years old. A gentleman does not address a lady with the same familiarity that he uses toward one of his own sex; a tone which is proper from a parent to a child is not proper from a child to a parent. An obtuseness as to the relations of things is the mainspring of bad manners, and makes life, for some people, one long, unconscious impropriety.

Suitableness, then, being the test of manners, we may apply it to ourselves and ask, Are our manners suitable to the age and to our social atmosphere? If we are to compare American manners with English manners, for example, we must first compare the two societies. In so doing, four important differences are at once apparent:

First. In this country there are no distinctions of rank; no titles of duke, earl, baron, knight, esquire, etc., and, consequently, no code prescribing with as much exactness as the number of pints in a quart or ounces in a pound, the exact amount of reverence due one man from another.

Secondly. The American man, unlike the Englishman, attaches small importance to etiquette and social forms; consequently, here, much more than there, society is in the hands of women.

Thirdly. In this country young people step upon the social stage at a much earlier age, and there is far greater freedom allowed them.

Fourthly. There is a vast difference in the home atmosphere of the two countries; there, the relation of parent and child being one of authority and deference ; here, one of mutual good-fellowship.

For all these reasons, social intercourse is far less formal here than in England. Richard Grant White tells of an American who went to England, honestly desirous of getting acquainted with English people, whose design was completely frustrated by the kind letters of introduction he carried with him. He found that the presentation of one of these letters meant invariably an invitation to a very grand and ceremonious dinner, and there an end. In despair he said, "I don't want their dinners; I want them," and kept his remaining letters in his pocket. Had the case been reversed, and an Englishman presented similar letters here, he would very likely have found himself taken home to a mid-day family dinner, without ceremony or announcement; afterward, pater familias having hastened back to his office or counting-room, the guest would have had an hour's friendly talk with the ladies of the household, or the pretty daughter would have taken him to drive; then, if he had shown himself worthy, he would have been invited to come and pass an evening quietly or with friends, at his option. What manner can be more pleasing to a stranger than this which makes him feel instantly at home! And what hospitality can be finer than this which bears evidence of disturbing in no way the usual easy household ways!

We can well conceive the astonishment of the Prince Regent when, being a little slow in beginning the conversation after being introduced to the American belle, she said: "They say I am not to speak to you unless you speak to me; is that so?" This was not pertness on her part. If his highness was embarrassed, as, being a man, he might be expected to be, it was her place, as a woman, to put him at his ease; nor, had there been occasion, would she have hesitated to add any words of advice upon his public or private duties that might have occurred to her. Why should she not? For society is her realm, wherein she is the absolute ruler, making its laws and enforcing them.

One may learn Greek or the planetary laws late in life, but a fine manner, like the correct use of one's mother tongue, comes only from early and habitual intercourse with refined people. In America, nurseries and governesses being the exception, children out of school hours are admitted to the society of the elders of the family. Such association is the best possible school of that tone and manner which we call "well-bred;" a child thus favored will possess a diction and a facility of expression impossible to acquire by study in later life; it learns, with some tact and patience on the part of parents, that most graceful of arts, the art of listening.

The rudest family of children I have ever known were the children of some wealthy English parents living at a fine place on the Hudson. Until quite well grown they met their parents and parents' guests at table only once in the week, at the Sunday dinner; and they were on much closer terms of intimacy with nurse, servants and governess than with either father or mother.

By contrast with these children I recall the charming courtesy of a little fellow of ten, accustomed to share in the hospitalities of his father's modest home. Seeing me coming one day he ran to open the gate and relieve me of the large books I carried. I told him he might take one, but more would be too heavy. "Pray, allow me," he said, gently taking the whole burden.

"Happy is the man," says Richter, "who reverences all women because he first learned to worship his own mother." In that home where the mother is centre and authority—in that society where woman is the ruler and lawgiver—there shall you find men of the comeliest manners. Such is the rule of the American home and of American society. Therefore, too, as a rule, the real spirit of chivalry, that obligation by which the mediæval knight bound himself to the service, protection and defense of some lady fair, has nowhere else so close a parallel in modern times as in the relations of American manhood to American womanhood. For the exceptions women are themselves to blame.

ONE MAN AND ONE WOMAN.

THE mountains nurse the Man to life,
His soul is fed with storms,
And Nature's rugged forces lend
His heart and brain their forms.
He star-ward grows and God-ward; climbs
To peaks that touch the skies,
And far below him lie the vales
Whence silver mists arise.

But in the mist-clad valley wakes
The tender Woman soul;
Sweet influences of bird and flower
Her pulsing veins control.
She walks her own sweet way, but finds—
Scarce knowing why—her eyes
Uplift at times toward the peaks
That touch the far-off skies.

He feels, afar, his bosom thrill
With longing strange and sweet,
And musing plucks the little flower
That blossoms at his feet;
He yearns amid his hurrying clouds;
He feels across his sleep
A nestling head upon his breast—
And all his pulses leap.

God wills it. Love doth calmly wait
In her abiding-place,
Till Strength shall leave his lofty hills
To look upon her face.
Yea, all God's miracles are great—
Birth, death, woe, gladness, pain—
But greatest that sweet marvel wrought
By His "Be One, ye Twain!"

MOLLIE E. MOORE.

THE HOUSEHOLD—HOW?

"DRAINAGE is for the rich," a correspondent wrote the other day. "They can submit to plumbing extortions calmly; but how about the people with small incomes and equally strong desires for perfection? Are there any rules that will help them out, supposing that water is suspected and the drain of the present establishment a surface one near the well?"

The inclination is to answer such a correspondent in some old words, very applicable to many conditions in the homes of to-day: "Flee to the mountains; look not behind you." But even on the mountain, unless one selects the very top, there is still danger that the drain of the neighbor just above will undo all one's own precautions. There must be some general rules for all, and these are very few and simple, requiring no great expenditure of either time or money.

In the first place, all suspected water can be boiled, though neither boiled water nor boiled germs are a particularly fascinating drink.

In the second place, if one is too poor to have a drain made long enough and tight enough to carry every drop of refuse water to a safe distance from the house, there is another plan. Have a large tub or barrel standing on a wheelbarrow or small cart, and into this pour every drop of dirty water, wheeling it when full to orchard or garden, where it will enrich the soil and make a return, not in disease and death, but in sound fruit and vegetables. If there is a well, let it have certainly a roof, and, if possible, a lattice-work around it to keep out flying leaves, dust, etc. A door can be cut in the side of such lattice, which will admit air fully, though not stray mice, kittens and frogs, the essence and tincture of which we sometimes drink.

In the third place, allow no open cesspool or surface drain to poison either air or water about the house. Sink it at the right distance from the house, and connected with it by a drain so tight that the contents cannot escape. And for all such pools, whether in town or country, one rule is absolute. Let every drain entering it be thoroughly trapped, and a ventilating shaft be added, so that none of the gas, always forming, can find its way back into the house. This shaft is of vital importance, as such gas when formed, if it cannot at once escape, condenses and becomes a cold, creeping, intense poison, slower in action but no less fatal than prussic acid or strychnine.

If the cesspool cannot be an elaborate brick-lined cistern, then it can be an old hogshead, thoroughly tarred within and without, and sunk in the ground, and in either case it is, in country life, one of the most essential adjuncts to a fine garden. No richer fertilizer is known, and there are great market-gardens near London treated with sewage and yielding enormous crops, which but a few years ago were barren and unproductive wastes. To use such a pool to best advantage, it is worth while to make a pile of all decaying vegetable matter, leaves, weeds, etc.—give burial-place in it to all dead cats or hens, and wet it at intervals with liquid from the cesspool.

Having been mistress of such a pile, I know it to be a less unpleasant task than it sounds, and in the use of all waste material in this manner, we fulfil the great agricultural duty of mankind—to return to the soil as fertilizers all the salts produced by the combustion of food in the human body.

For those who live in cities the water-supply, of course, comes from a common reservoir, and over that we have no control. But we can see that, once in the house, every water and waste-pipe is in the most perfect condition; that the best and most scientific traps and other methods of preventing the escape of sewer-gas into our houses are provided; that every stationary washstand or basin has the plug always in it, and at night, when infection is most insidious, a little water left standing in each. Every water-closet should also have a ventilating pipe or shaft, high enough to carry off all gases. Add to all this the frequent use, especially in summer, of simple disinfectants, chloride of lime, carbolic acid or a solution of copperas.

Absolute cleanliness for all seasons completes the list of rules. And if any thought has entered that much of this is a man's work, it being his business alone to attend to cellars and cesspools and all the other "horrid things no lady should touch," dismiss it at once, for only a lady can do such work thoroughly. Men are much more willing to pay doctors' bills than to spare any time from business toward overlooking drains. Moreover, in many men, the sense of smell is blunted or half-destroyed by the combination of tobacco-smoke and stale air in which many seem entirely content to spend the working-hours of the day, and thus only woman's more sensitive nose can test truly the presence of objectionable odors. Smell alone, however, is not to be trusted, furnaces doing their work toward vitiating the air as thoroughly as tobacco; not because they are furnaces, but because no suitable arrangements for free ventilation accompany them.

For every woman who has or expects to have a home is the duty of learning the simple laws of both ventilation and drainage. Let the location of every drain in the establishment be marked out, and then insist upon its being kept, relatively, as clean as the china in daily use. And if it seem a disagreeable, even detestable, necessity, be sure that nothing which can make life better can be either common or unclean. Before either literature or art, or any pursuit or study meaning or creating love of the beautiful and noble in either, must come the knowledge which alone has power to make life itself beautiful and noble—the knowledge of every law that must govern body and soul.

"Cleanliness is next to godliness." The old saying may be amended—cleanliness is godliness; for it is certain that whoever has learned it, not only for body, but for everything in which that body must have its being, has mastered many problems, and is already cultured beyond any attainment that godliness without cleanliness can hold.

"WILL you please state through your paper in what way a lady should address a gentleman in writing? Should it be 'My Dear Mr. Brown,' or 'My Dear Dr. Jones?' Would the above be preferable to 'Mr. Brown, Dear Sir,' or 'Dr. Jones, Dear Sir?' You will oblige a "NEW SUBSCRIBER, Auburn, N. Y."

Ans.—If not well known, the latter form is preferable. If a slight acquaintance, "Dear Mr. Jones;" if well known, "My Dear," etc., is in order.

"A gentleman wishes to know whether etiquette requires him to send in more than one card if there is more than one lady receiving—as, for instance, in the case of New Year calls. If five or six are receiving should he send a card to each? Also, is it good taste to have an appropriate greeting engraved on the card, or only have his name? Also, if more than one gentleman calls should they have separate cards, or their names engraved on the one card? By answering the above you will oblige, yours respectfully,

HELEN CAMPBELL.

To observers of human combinations, be they social, civil or ecclesiastical, there is no more fascinating and instructive study than that wonderful society known to certain Anglican brethren as "Our Sister Church of Rome." Protestants differ widely in their estimate of the Catholic future in America. Hatred, fear and distrust are specifications in the count against it; but when the question of education is considered, a new element at once presents itself. There is now before the church authorities a proposition looking to the establishment of a great Roman Catholic University, intended to equal or surpass Yale and Harvard in point of size, endowment and general scope. If, as seems to be accepted, this scheme should be carried out, it may as well be taken as a foregone conclusion that the work will be well done. The Mother Church has, during the long centuries of her existence, gained consummate skill in the management of such enterprises. She will take her time about it. She will gather contributions in the shape of dimes and half dimes from a million sources, and she will not scorn to accept Protestant aid, should such be offered. All the complicated machinery of her vast organism will work smoothly and with certainty to the desired end, and it is not at all improbable that, should she bend her energies to the task, the close of the century may see on the banks of the Hudson an establishment that shall do her honor in the eyes of the world. She has ecclesiastical schools already. The ancient Jesuit College at Georgetown is fully described in the present number of THE CONTINENT, and others exist in various parts of the country, which supply her needs in this direction. But though she has numerous preparatory schools, she lacks as yet a lay college where young men may obtain a finished higher education under ecclesiastical supervision. To many Protestants this scheme will seem pregnant with danger; but if it has come to this, that Protestantism has anything to fear from the spread of intelligence, it is high time that Protestants study the signs of the times. If it be objected that the education acquired in such a college will be sectarian in the worst sense, the reply may be to the effect that, if the instruction be not as good as is imparted elsewhere, the inferiority will soon be apparent in the equipment of graduates for their life-work; while, on the other hand, if it be better, the Protestant colleges must look to their laurels.

UNLESS some unlooked-for change takes place in our social conditions, we shall, before many years, be burdened with a very useless type of young man, in numbers sufficiently formidable to give him far more influence than he deserves. When wealth accumulates and concentrates as it is now doing in this country, the class which is not obliged to work for its living naturally increases in numbers. The father who has earned his own way to fortune, sends his boys to college, usually gives them too much spending money, and expects them, after graduation and two or three years of European travel, to take their places in the counting-house and become steady workers. That he is often disappointed we all know. The boys, now grown to young manhood, have enjoyed themselves too well in idleness to take kindly to regular hours at desk or counter. When the old folks are gathered to their fathers, there is usually in the case of large fortunes an assured income large enough for all reasonable and often for many unreasonable needs, which can be had simply for the trouble of drawing checks or getting coupons cut off and cashed at the banker's. That the class of utterly good-for-nothing idlers is not already larger, speaks well for our republican influences, but at best it is too large, and must, in the nature of things, increase, unless something can be done to check its development. One mistake that is made on the part of parents is that they expect their children to adopt the same line of work in which their own successes have been achieved, forgetting that this may not be calculated to attract them or afford them congenial occupation. It is a mistake, too, for every man who has an independent fortune to assume that he must needs engage in a fixed commercial or professional career. Why should one who has ample means secured to him through safe dividend-paying investments do work which some poor man can do as well and earn his living thereby? Wealthy men have no business still further to crowd markets that are already over-crowded. If one has a special gift, and can do a certain thing better than any one else can, let him do it. He may find abundant employment in supervision and organization. Why should he do mere routine work when there are so many needy young fellows who can do it quite as well?

But supposing this rich young fellow has no talent for supervision, or has nothing to supervise—nothing, in short, but his income to spend. What shall he do with his time? To one who hates idleness and has abundant natural resources for the employment of all the spare time he can command, such a question seems absurd. But it is by no means absurd in the eyes of a matured cub who has dawdled his way through school and college, and has never given his supposed mind to anything more profound than making up a betting book. There lies the trouble—those long years nominally devoted to education! If the lad falls under influences which stimulate his intellect and develop his natural bent, his after life will not stretch out in an endless perspective of years which he knows not what to do with. Has he but a love for horses, let him have his stock farm and improve the breed. Very likely he will spend a good deal of his time on or near the race track, but at least the stock farm is a redeeming feature in his career. Has he mechanical or scientific tastes, there are unexplored lines of investigation which only await the encouragement of capital to develop untold wonders of discovery. Is he literary, there are a thousand ways in which he can employ his time in research and publication, ways which will give remunerative employment to others of like tastes. Is he a philanthropist, he can hardly take up a newspaper that does not offer suggestions. Let him, for example, interest himself in founding a society whose object shall be to help ex-convicts in earning an honest livelihood. Does he love the sea, let him keep his yacht, and instead of making aimless voyages for pleasure, let him correct soundings, report errors in charts and try experiments in navigation or marine architecture. Then there is politics—but this, in its present condition, does not offer a very alluring field. Still, to one who has a turn for statecraft, it presents noble opportunities for honorable effort. In all these ways and a hundred others, a young man who is good for anything at all may find employment for himself and others, and may keep his money moving in ways that will, upon the whole, make the world better.

Of course there will always be some who are capable of nothing beyond faultless attire, the exertion of sitting in club windows and hanging about the play-houses and pool-rooms. For these, perhaps, there is no hope, save that they will go to ruin as swiftly as possible. They cannot be made boys again and re-educated, and except there befalls a most unusual awakening of spirit and physique, they are emphatically "no good." The whole matter depends upon early training. If that cultivates manly virtues, no income can be too large. If the reverse be the case, no amount of preaching can ordinarily avail.

THERE is hardly an American author of the past generation whose personality is so completely hidden as that of Cooper. His novels are in greater demand to-day than even in their first popularity, but the readers of to-day have no memory of the bitter libel suits and the intolerant criticism of American manners and customs that made him in his time one of the best-hated men of letters since Swift. For this state of things Cooper is himself responsible, one of his last injunctions to his family having been that they should "authorize no biography." For twenty years and more this injunction has stood in the way of all right comprehension of the man, and it is still sufficiently binding to render unavailable the sources of information to which a historian would most naturally resort.

In the present biography¹ Professor Lounsbury has had to depend on old newspaper files and the recollections of contemporaries for the facts of Cooper's life, and thus the reader is prepared to expect little. He or she will be curiously disappointed. Nothing more perfect in the form of biography has been given for long. It is accurate in every fact, no matter how prejudicial, yet absolutely impartial. The style is delightful. A subtle humor runs through the whole, and the natural and inseparable accompaniment of all real humor—sympathy, understanding and a quiet friendliness. Many writers of fiction may envy Professor Lounsbury's methods of dealing with his subject, which he has made as fascinating as any of the romances that retain their hold on the popular heart in England and France, as well as at home.

The fighting qualities of the old Norsemen struggled through life with the peaceful Quaker tendencies which were also his inheritance, the father being of this faith and the mother of Swedish descent. Twelve children came to the pair, Cooper being the eleventh, his birth taking place in Burlington, New Jersey, September 15th, 1789. At thirteen he had entered Yale, but a boyish frolic caused his suspension, and, instead of graduating in the class of 1806, he went on a voyage to the Mediterranean as a sailor before the mast. He became, two years later, a midshipman in the navy, and served two years, gaining thus all the minute knowledge of sea-life utilized in many of his novels. His naval career ended suddenly in 1810 in another service. He met and loved Miss De Lancy, a daughter of the well-known John Peter De Lancy, and was married January 1, 1811, his bride being nineteen and he just twenty-one. This marriage was singularly happy and fortunate. "It seldom falls to the lot of the biographer to record a home-life more serene and happy than that which fell to the share of the man whose literary life is the gloomiest to be found in the history of American Men of Letters. Cooper, like many persons of fiery temperament and strong will, was very easily managed through his affections."

His first novel was the result of pure accident, if anything can be said to be accidental. One day while reading to his wife a novel on English life which he did not like, he laid down the book suddenly, saying, "I believe I could write a better story myself." His wife challenged him to attempt it, encouraged him steadily through the composition, and the result was "Precaution." "The Spy" followed in 1821, its success being immediate, and from that time on there was no break in his literary activity, nearly a hundred volumes having been published.

The reader must go to the clear and vivid pages of the biography for the story of the busy years that followed, each one unfortunately more and more full of the aggressive spirit which led him into unending broils. No man was ever more misunderstood, and no man ever better deserved such fate. He had a positive genius for saying the wrong thing. As one of his friends said of him, "he rubbed down all hurt shins with brickbats." Proud, sensitive, intensely truthful and intensely patriotic, he succeeded in impressing himself upon his own time as a man of petty vanity, selfish and unfeeling, with actual contempt and loathing for his country and its institutions. The analysis and summary of his motives and actions and their results is one of the most striking portions of the brilliant narrative, and keenly as the work is done the sense of the underlying pathos is given in full. Every page has some characteristic and quotable passage, the closing paragraphs being all for which room can be found:

"The fearlessness and the truthfulness of his nature are conspicuous in almost every incident of his career. He fought for a principle as desperately as other men fight for life. The storm of detraction through which he went never once shook the almost haughty independence of his conduct, or swerved him in the slightest from the course he had chosen. The only thing to which he unquestioningly submitted was the truth. His loyalty to that was of a kind almost Quixotic. He was in later years dissatisfied with himself, because, in his novel of 'The Pilot,' he had put the character of Paul Jones too high. He thought that the hero had been credited in that work with loftier motives than those by which he was actually animated. Feelings such as these formed the groundwork of his character, and made him intolerant of the devious ways of many who were satisfied with conforming to a lower code of morality. There was a royalty in his nature that disdained even the semblance of deceit. With other authors one feels that the man is inferior to his work. With him it is the very reverse. High qualities, such as these, so different from the easy-going virtues of common men, are more than an offset to infirmities of temper, to unfairness of judgment, or to unwisdom of conduct. His life was the best answer to many of the charges brought against his country and his countrymen; for whatever he may have fancied, the hostility he encountered was due far less to the matter of his criticisms than to their manner. Against the common cant, that in republican governments the tyranny of public sentiment will always bring conduct to the same monotonous level, and opinion to the same subservient uniformity, democracy can point to this dauntless son who never flinched from any course because it brought odium, who never flattered popular prejudices, and who never truckled to a popular cry. America has had among her representatives of the irritable race of writers many who have shown far more ability to get on pleasantly with their fellows than Cooper. She has had several gifted with higher spiritual insight than he, with broader and juster views of life, with finer ideals of literary art, and, above all, with far greater delicacy of taste; but she counts on the scanty roll of her men of letters the name of no one who acted from purer patriotism or loftier principle. She finds among them all no manlier nature and no more heroic soul."

MUSICIANS will thank Mr. Stephens for preserving in his paper on the Seminoles a local song, as performed in the Everglades. A metrical translation is now in order.

(1) JAMES FENIMORE COOPER. By Professor Thomas R. Lounsbury. With Portrait. 12mo, pp. 306, $1.25. (American Men of Letters Series). Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

So great is the enthusiasm over Mr. Howells' new novel that a supplementary edition of The Century for February was called for and promptly issued.

AN interesting issue of the Franklin Square Library is a collection of "Character Readings from George Eliot," arranged by Nathan Shepard, which lose less by their separation from the context than would be expected.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & Co. are to be the publishers of Thurlow Weed's autobiography, the preparation of which occupied all the later years of his life, and which is being arranged for the press by his daughter and grandson.

THE CENTURY COMPANY are to issue an American edition of the "Imperial Dictionary," long a standard in England, and the revision necessary is to be done by Professor Whitney, of Yale. Much new matter will be added. An edition for those who prefer it in its present form will be issued in March.

"LATINE," the little magazine edited by Professor Shumway, and designed to increase not only interest in the language but facility in acquiring it, has found many friends. The February number contains "Pliny's Ghost Story," with colloquial exercises, and various other selections and arrangements.

"THE SANITARY NEWS," of Chicago, though not much beyond its infancy, gives promise of very vigorous and profitable life. It speaks well for the culture of Chicago that a special journal so well printed and bright should find support there, and its literary tone is high enough to make it very agreeable as well as profitable reading.

THE "World's Cyclopedia of Biography," published by John B. Alden, of New York, differs from ordinary compilations of this nature, in that it is made up of lives written by eminent authors, and having real literary value. The fourth volume contains E. Paxton Hood's "Life of Cromwell," and as this in its usual form sells at $3.00, the price of seventy cents for the volume is at least not exorbitant. Mr. Alden announces that the work is not "pirated," but that every author receives a fair consideration for his labor.

ONE of the gentlest and most pleasing stories for girls recently printed is found in "Ruth Eliot's Dream," by Mary Lakeman. Ruth is one of a gay party of girls who in the opening chapter give their hopes and dreams of the life they are just entering upon. It is the inner life that is given, rather than varied outward experience; and while the little story follows the fortunes of them all, the interest centres in Ruth's own aspirations and struggles. Her dream passes, but memory and hope remain, and one is sure that happy life must and will be her portion. (16mo, pp. 270, $1.00; Lee & Shepard, Boston).

THERE are certain books as indispensable almost to the literary worker as the dictionary, and that are of use to any reader who seeks to understand thoroughly unfamiliar allusions or quotations. Among these must rank "The Reader's Hand-Book of Allusions, References, Plots and Stories," by the Rev. E. Cobham Brewer, LL.D. The present edition has two appendices, and the summaries and definitions have not only brevity but something which is seldom associated with brevity—a real charm of style, a felicitous way of putting things that is very unexpected and often very charming. (8vo, pp. 1170, $3.50; J. B. Lippincott & Co.).

HENRY HOLT & Co. have done an excellent thing for the busy readers who can only taste and have no time for prolonged study, in issuing an edition of Robert Browning's "Lyrical and Dramatic Poems." The selections are prefaced by E. C. Stedman's brilliant essay, included in his "Victorian Poets," and the whole has been carefully edited by Edward T. Mason. That one should miss a few favorites that would naturally seem to find place here, is always the experience with any collection; but Mr. Mason's gives on the whole a just idea of Browning's power in this direction. The make-up of the book is unexceptionable. (16mo, pp. 275, $2.00).

MRS. ESTHER J. TRIMBLE LIPPINCOTT'S "Chart of General Literature" has already been widely adopted in schools, and her latest work, "A Handbook of English and American Literature," is equally worthy of success. She outlines a course divided into seventeen chapters, each chapter representing an era, and the methods of study suggested are likely to stimulate interest in even the most sluggish pupil. The final part is, however, crowded and very incomplete, leaving the impression on the reader's mind that the author lost patience, or was too hurried to amend slips and imperfections. Aside from this, the book is carefully printed and a most attractive text-book. (12mo, pp. 518, $1.50; Eldredge & Brother, Philadelphia).

THE little volume of "Poems" by Henry Peterson includes "The Modern Job," a drama, which attracted wide attention on its appearance in 1869. It is as thinker rather than poet that the author must rank, though he writes smoothly and easily, and here and there gives lines of real poetic beauty and value. Judas, in "The Modern Job," is a powerfully-drawn and tragic figure, and the interview or vision in which Michael the Archangel and Satan appear is a strong and singularly interesting one. It is as the formulation of deep and earnest thought on many problems of the day that the book most deserves attention, and no one can fail to profit by many of the conclusions reached. (16mo, pp. 227, $1.00; J. B. Lippincott & Co.).

"RACHEL'S SHARE OF THE ROAD," the latest volume in the Round-Robin series, is, in many points, the most important one of the list. It is a sober story, dealing with a great problem of the day, for Rachel is the daughter of a railroad magnate, and her "share of the road," at first only the luxury of all great wealth, comes to mean an intimate knowledge of the condition of its employés, and the many sad phases of the labor question. In her researches into this and her direct personal dealing with the men, she finds an escape from a marriage that would have held only disappointment. The rich lover finds his suit hopeless, and the poor one, after a rather melodramatic rescue from floating ice, gains courage to plead his cause, and is successful. The slight vein of humor is supplied by Mrs. Shackles, who "won't beg," but attains her purposes by gentle hints, and the little book leaves the impression of very noble and genuine characters, well if not elaborately drawn. (16mo, pp. 331, $1.00; J. R. Osgood & Co.).

THE Art Interchange not only offers to its steadily increasing circle of readers the best thought on every question in its field of work, but adds more minute suggestion and direction than can be given in the limits of the paper in the shape of elaborate Art Manuals, the publication of which was begun in 1881, and the various numbers of which form a system of instruction which has as yet no rival that can fill its place. The series is edited by Mr. Charles Godfrey Leland, whose work has done as much toward the development of industrial art education in this country as the combined forces of South Kensington are doing for England, and each number contains carefully prepared supplements, with designs for the work under discussion. The twelve numbers include Ceramic Painting, Tapestry or Dye Painting, Wood Carving, Outline Embroidery, Leather Work, Decorative Oil Painting, Filled-in Embroidery, Repoussé Work, Stenciling, Drawing and Decorative Design, Papier-Maché, Modeling in Clay and Underglaze Faience Decoration. (Set, $3.00; single numbers, 30 cents.)

CRYSTALS of quartz containing cavities filled with fluids and gases are not uncommon, though the crystals having such cavities plainly visible to the naked eye are rarely found. The quartz crystals from Western North Carolina have attained wide celebrity from the fact that the cavities are of remarkable size. In some cases they were wholly unprecedented. Over four hundred pounds of choice quartz crystals were obtained from one "pocket," besides a number of emeralds. When the smoky crystals were first found, they were noticed to contain many cavities, seemingly filled with a very clear and lustrous fluid. The cavities enclosed in these crystals were of remarkable size and quantity. The longest cavity noticed was nearly two and one-half inches long and one quarter of an inch wide. Cavities of one inch were not uncommon, while those of one quarter inch and less were, in truth, without number. Many of the crystals seemed to be made up almost wholly of cavities, whose walls were barely thick enough to keep them separated. Many hundred, plainly visible to the unaided eye, could have been counted in a single crystal. For some time after these crystals were removed from the pocket no bubbles were noticed in any of the cavities. Some peculiar condition of the crystal or of the atmosphere, then existing, probably prevented their formation. Later the bubbles appeared in great numbers. A few of the crystals were, as water-bearing crystals, very remarkable in size. One weighed nearly twenty-five pounds, had both ends terminated, was of a dark brown color, and as beautiful as any found in any locality. All the water-bearing crystals were large—none less than two inches in diameter—and many of over three pounds in weight. The interesting phenomena observed in these crystals did not occur until some time after their discovery. The best crystals of the "find" were carefully selected and placed where they were considered to be safe—safe, at least, from molestation. It did not occur to the owner that the weather could in any way affect them. During the night following the mercury unexpectedly descended below the freezing-point. About midnight he heard over a dozen sharp reports, like the explosion of gun-caps. Upon making examination in the morning, he found there remained only a few sharp fragments of quartz upon the table where the magnificent crystals had been resting. Pieces of the crystals, large and small, were found even fifteen feet away. The cold had caused the water in the cavities to freeze, consequently to expand, and then burst the crystals. Those with few cavities had burst, scattering large fragments, widely separated, while those containing minute cavities lay as a heap of small fragments, frozen together in a coherent mass. This last feature is of value to science, since it shows conclusively the abundance of the fluid included, and also, what is of more importance, that this cementing ice was formed either directly from the fluids in the crystals, or by the influences which they exerted. As the room in which they were was a dark one, the owner had all these masses and larger fragments carried out and placed in the sunlight, in order to examine them more carefully. His astonishment was great to notice that as soon as the rays of the sun touched them an ebullition commenced, which could be heard a few feet away. This ebullition continued for over an hour, subsiding as thawing progressed. In some of these masses a very distinct odor of sulphuretted hydrogen was observed, quite fugitive in some of the pieces, while persistent in others.

THE New York Silk Exchange, at No. 27 Bond Street, has received from a Japanese firm a large number of silk-worm eggs. They are pasted upon cards, about fourteen by twelve inches in size, each card containing about 20,000. The eggs are very small, and of a greenish-gray color. Each card is completely covered with them, so that to cut the card would destroy some of the eggs. One of the clerks in the Exchange said that the worms always laid their eggs in circles, and that the eggs adhered to whatever substance they were laid upon. The clerk was puzzled to know how the Japanese had got so many on one card, and also how they were to be removed. There were about 20,000,000 in the consignment, and they will be distributed gratis among American silk culturists. The managers of the Exchange say that the growing of silk-worms in this country is increasing rapidly, about one hundred letters being received by them every day asking for information and ordering books on silk culture.

THE observations made by A. E. Verrill, of the United States Fish Commission, fully demonstrate that the western edge of the Gulf Stream is nearer the coast than it has hitherto been located on the charts. In summer, as is well known, it is nearer the coast than in winter, but this doubtless applies strictly to the surface water. His researches show that the warm belt in sixty-five to one hundred and twenty-five fathoms is inhabited by a peculiar southern fauna, that could not exist there if the Gulf Stream did not flow along this area at the bottom, both in winter and summer. But it is evident that what many of these species require is not a very high, but a nearly uniform temperature. Such an equable temperature cannot exist in this region, except under the direct and constant influence of the Gulf Stream.

REGARDING the mode of life of the Scotch lake-dwellers, a fair idea of the food used by them can be gathered from the reports of learned professors on a selection of osseous remains taken from the lake-dwellings at Dowalton, Lochlee and Buston. The Celtic short-horn, the so-called goat-horned sheep and a domestic breed of pigs were largely consumed. The horse was only scantily used. The number of bones and horns of the red deer and roe-buck showed that venison was by no means a rare addition to the list of their dietary. Among birds, only the goose has been identified, but this is no criterion of the extent of their encroachment on the feathered tribe, as only the larger bones were collected and reported upon. To this bill of fare the occupiers of these lake-dwellings, being comparatively near the sea, added several kinds of shell-fish. In all the lake-dwellings broken shells of hazel-nuts were found.

In a recent paper to the Belgian Academy, the writer seeks to explain the calming influence of oil on rough water, in accordance with principles laid down, that whenever a liquid mass in motion acquires rapidly a free surface, more or less, there is developed a growing quantity of potential energy at the expense of the kinetic energy of the mass, and reciprocally to a rapid diminution of free surface corresponds always an increase of kinetic energy. Oil hinders the successive superposition of liquid layers, and so the increase of the kinetic energy of the liquid mass. Floating bodies of various kinds (branches, seaweed, ice-crystals, etc.) have a similar action. Immediately after the gliding of a very small number of liquid layers over them, they obey the thrust that brings them to the surface, and so render impossible the increase of kinetic energy corresponding to loss of potential energy of a large number of superposed layers.

The common tamarisk is a heath-leaved shrub found on the southern coast of England and the coasts of the Atlantic and Mediterranean. It or an allied species is common in the Peninsula of Sinai. Its stems are punctured by a small insect of the cynips family, from which a juice exudes, which hardens, and is collected by the Bedouin Arabs and made into cakes, and called manna. It is sweet, and consists of a mucilaginous sugar, and forms a small article of commerce at the present day. It is by some supposed to be the manna of the Israelites, but it does not in all points agree with the descriptions of that substance.

THE inoculation of dogs with the virus of hydrophobia as a protection for society against that horrible malady, is urged by M. Pasteur, who for the past ten years has been experimenting with mad dogs. Animals inoculated successfully did not have a return of the disease, and therefore he thinks that a general and compulsory inoculation of dogs would save the world ultimately from exposure to hydrophobia.

THE DRAMA.

"YOUNG MRS. WINTHROP," at the close of its third month at the Madison Square Theatre, New York, received additional impetus by the addition of Miss Ada Dyas' name to the cast. She played "Mrs. Dick Chetwynd"—in which part Mrs. Agnes Booth received great praise—very successfully, and Mrs. Booth essayed the title-role most effectively.

THE Board of Managers of the Forrest Home in Philadelphia announced for sale by auction, lately, the stage wardrobe, silverware and table-service, diamonds, etc., of the late Edwin Forrest. Should not all these interesting mementos of one of the leading names in American theatrical annals have been preserved intact?

MR. LOUIS H. HAYWARD, a son of one of the ablest lawyers of North Carolina, gives evidence of reaching as high a plane in the dramatic profession as his father has in the legal. For some three or four seasons past he has been filling important positions in traveling companies, and is about to begin a tour throughout his native state at the head of a company of ability. Mr. John Ellsler, the well-known Western manager and actor, says that Mr. Hayward's "Hamlet" is destined in time to rank among the great efforts of great names; which is high praise from such a source.

THE plot of the play which Mr. Oscar Wilde is said to have written for Miss Marie Prescott, shows more virility and intellectual power than anything with which the famous devotee of the lily has thus far seen fit to favor us. Vera, the heroine, is a Nihilist, and the story culminates in the last act by her being ordered by her circle to stab the Czar while he sleeps. As the Czarowitz, he had been a member of her circle and had loved her. He stays the hand as the dagger descends, renews his promises of reform of the government, as well as his protestations of love, and offers to share the throne with her. She hesitates—the crowd clamor outside for the proof of the murder, which is the dagger blood-stained. For her lover's sake she stabs herself, throws the dagger out to the crowd and falls dead.

MR. DION BOUCICAULT's latest Irish play, "The Amadan," was produced lately in Boston, with the author in the title-role, and proved successful. The drama, which is reminiscent of "The Colleen Bawn," describes the devotion of an imbecile boy to his mistress. The "sensational" scene is where the boy leads her to a cavern which is flooded at high tide, under the pretext that in this spot there exists proof that he is guilty of the murder which her lover stands accused. The author-actor was enthusiastically applauded, and received able support from the members of the Boston Museum stock company. "The Amadan" will be produced in New York, at the Manhattan (Wallack's old theatre), in a short time, where an extended run is anticipated for it.

Of the law,
With buttons down before,
Twenty-four,
And half as many more
On your skirts, which touch the floor,
And of bands of braiding d'or,
Most a score.

II

Over books you do not pore,
So your lore
Causes not (which some deplore)
A furor.
But your club is polished, nor
Do you show a fault or flaw,
When you grasp it in your paw,
And make war.

III

Unlike (thank God ! c'est mort)
Pinafore,
Your exertions never score
An encore.
If anathemas I pour,
'Tis because, like many more,
I object to being awfully sore.

IV

Say with truth you immortally soar,
And all falsehood you abhor
To your core.

If you seek the "family door"
Of yonder corner store,
Say ! oh, say, you thirst for gore—
Nothing more.

V

The serving ladies a'
Gaze with awe,
On your manly form galore
And adore,
Until begins to gnaw
The alleged green monster, for Love of you, affliction sore
Long each bore.

VI

You're as brave as Cæsar or Old Hector,
When the young malefactor
In you draw.
They beseech and they implore
You their freedom to restore ;
Still you do not, though they roar,
Care a straw.

VII

Though you cannot paddle o'er,
Like friend Noah,
With a stick of wood, an oar,
To Fame's shore ;
Yet, as I remarked before,
With your club, you brassy bore,
You stand surely at the fore
Of your corps.

Mittens.

PURE frost-winds on the winter's eve,
You play among my lady's tresses,
And pink as apple-blooms you leave
The cheeks that take your light caresses ;
But from her little hands begone !
By you they'll not be kissed nor bitten,
For over each is snugly drawn—
A tiny pale-blue mitten.

The slender perfume-haunted glove
Erstwhile that hid her lily fingers
Is not the shield that most they love,
Whereon a pressure longest lingers.
More shy, confiding, tender, true,
And softer than two curled-up kittens,
Are those dear dainty twins of blue,
My lady's little mittens.

Once at the play, when lights were low,
And down had dropped the great green curtain,
I took her hand ; we turned to go ;
Her fingers clasped o'er mine, I'm certain.
That sudden thrill I feel again,
That never could be told or written,
Whene'er I see or touch, as then,
Her downy little mitten.

Some memories those mittens hold,
And secrets, might one coax confession.
Ah, dearer than a gage of gold
I'd count of one to gain possession.
Yet ask her I shall never dare,
Nor tell her how my heart is smitten,
For fear, in answer to my prayer,
She might give me the mitten.

THE BLUE JAY.

THE little scamp, I hear his shriek of warning
That tells his blue police the foe is nigh—
A goggle-eyed old owl caught out by morning,
So dazed by light he cannot fight nor fly.
From field and forest, haystack, fence and thicket,
Shrieking like fiends they swiftly gather in ;
There's no pursuit of gain, or grain, but quick it
Drops a bit for duty in the din.

The night assassin sees in grotesque wonder
Blue streaks about his horned noddle dart ;
From side to side they flash—now o'er, now under—
And every prick but makes him snap and start.
Ah, have a care ! most noble, daring Captain—
A clutch, a snap, a shriek of wild despair !
There's one brave jay beyond the need of chaplain—
A cloud of feathers flash upon the air.

Then comes the blessed silence of a minute ;
For Death's grim presence even chills a jay.

Brief space for grief, the shrieks again begin it ;
Anon the woods are ringing with the fray.
The downy, pinioned thief, night's dark marauder,
Feels all the anguish of a hopeless fight
With foes despised ; and so in grave disorder
He spreads his wings and fairly takes to flight.

How like a dream he floats o'er field and meadow, .
Fast followed by his foe's victorious cries,
To where the burr-oak glen, with trees bent head low,
Dims the fierce light for better use of eyes.
The little scamps accept the situation,
And leave their foe his fortress to command ;
They quick disperse, with shrill congratulation
To thief like Satan over all the land.

The feathered Frenchman of the fields and wild-wood,
The dashing, daring, handsome cavalier,
Dearest companion of my dreamy childhood,
Of all the birds the boldest buccaneer,
Nest-robber, orchard-thief, round stack and garden,
Busy as sin, with such a business air,
On scare-crow's very hat, with corn grain hard in
His little claw, he cracks without a care.

When storm clouds gather in the Fall's dark session,
And rain makes music on my maple trees,
While other birds are hushed in damp depression
The clear "e-lil-ick" floats upon the breeze.
Snow cannot cow, nor bitter winter boss 'em ;
No want nor hunger may their spirits tame ;
In Spring with blue they shade the apple blossom,
And Summer finds them shrieking all the same.

And, how I sing in lofty condescension,
Of this fair vagrant's wayward little life,
It seems so small, yet I forget the tension
That makes a misery of our larger strife.

Our larger strife? Ah! most vociferous neighbor,
I wish my grandeur something more, or less,
That I, like thee, might live content to labor
And so escape my sense of nothingness.

DON PIATT.

"OLD PERRY."

BY FREDERIC PHILLIPS.

AT seventy Perry Glasgow was called "old," rather as a tribute to his many sturdy qualities than because age sat heavily upon him. He was still a supple and wiry old negro. His withered cheek, fringed with a little frizzle of gray whisker, was of light coffee-color—not the creamy look of the ordinary mulatto. His hair, coarse and still dark, was straightened out by a far-away infusion of Indian blood, whose influence was also seen in his alert and springy step, and "take nuthin' frum no man" bearing. He held his head straight up, six feet and over, and looked you in the face with a sharp and snappish eye, that was to the turbid gaze of the average negro as a steel-trap to a figure-four. His shoulders, however, were beginning to stoop a little, and his voice, naturally harsh, sometimes soared beyond his reach.

For thirty years he had been the stand-by of the quarry—autocrat of a small minority of negro laborers. He held his own among an unclassifiable admixture of recent immigrants with the zeal of a true democrat. At "churning," "sledging," "loading lime," he was the object of the unbounded admiration of the youth of his own color, and the grudging emulation of the "greenho'ns." And the annual hog-killing—an occurrence dear alike to Irishman and negro, and of sufficiently vital importance to raze the distinctions of race—it was universally conceded would have lost its place among the fine arts and descended to mere butchery without Perry to stick the pig.

But it was in his family that the true force of his character shone forth to most advantage. There he was king. There he brooked no opposition. He ruled with a rod, not of iron, but of hickory. His black brood, eight in all, had been brought up on it. To them his glance, if they ever looked for a sign of parental tenderness, spoke of unknown cords of hickory wattles, ready cut and trimmed. His lightest word thrilled with the swish of unforgotten hickoryings or promises for the future. It is not upon record that he ever put old Sally, his jet-black model of a meek wife, under the influence of this magic wand; but it was only because she eluded his excessive severity by a superhuman meekness, and contented herself with treasuring for him a store of future trouble.

At the time that we take our more particular view of Perry, the children had, one by one, taken their striped backs out into the world. The old man's arm was getting stiff for want of use. One only daughter was still held by an uncertain attachment to the parent nest—Dorcas Hannah, the child of their old age, whose wages at a near-by farmer's supplied the old man with those higher necessities of life, "whisky an' 'bacca," and whose beaux drew forth the accumulations of his wrath. She, too, appeared to be pruning her wings for a flight that would leave the old man's hearth entirely desolate. The fear of this catastrophe was the one thing that disturbed the serenity of Perry's household.

It was early one morning in August. Old Perry had finished his breakfast and stood in the doorway of his one-storied mansion, shaving a plug of tobacco into his pipe. Sally was "clarin' up" the remains of their frugal meal with a subdued energy which indicated that this was one of those rare occasions when she wanted to call his severity to the aid of her laxity, and then wring her hands in dread.

Perry had one thumb pressing the tobacco down into the bowl; the fingers of his other hand sought in his waistcoat pocket for a match, while his eyes tried to pierce through the drifted smoke from the lime-kilns for the morning sun, when Sally spoke.

"Pappy," said she, dubiously and diplomatically, "w'at am yore 'pinium 'cernin' dat ar Joe Nelson?"

"Now, w'at's de good ob yore axin' a fool question like dat?" said the old man irascibly. "Hain't I done stopped him frum shinin' 'round arter our gal? Yo' know well enuff he's as ornery a good-fur-nuthin' yaller nigger as ebba lived. Nebba hed no mo' bringin' up dan a mule. W'at kinder truck is dat fur ter be co'tin' Dorcas Hanner?"

The old wife only said, "Lor', Pappy!" in patient acquiescence, and tried to stir up sufficient courage to approach the subject again by an extra bustle with the dishes. But when Perry lit his pipe and started off, it "upsot" her completely, and she dropped one of her dishes with a tremendous clatter.

"Yo' hain't off ter wuck yet, is yo'?" she asked, tremulously.

"Whar de debble else 'ud I be goin'?" said Perry, giving her a sharp look.

"W'y, I dunno," said the old woman, helplessly. "I didn't 'low ez yo' wuz off jist yit a bit."

"Now, yo' look yere, Sally!" said old Perry, taking his pipe from his mouth and eyeing her with a look of stern disdain: "ef yo' got ennything fur ter say ter me, spit it out, can't yo'! Dar hain't no sense in yore breakin' all de dishes in de house a-beatin' 'round de bush."

"Well, de fack am," said the patient spouse, relieved at being obliged to surrender her news unconditionally, "dat Dorcas Hanner an' dat ar Joe clared off ter camp-meetin' tergedder yisterd'y. De missis, she sont down yere ter know de rights ob hit; said de gal 'lowed she 'd git back de same night; but she hain't put in no 'peer-uncence sence. An' I thought—kinder 'peered like ef I 'd orter tell yo' 'bout hit." She ended with the nervous feeling of one who applies a match to a loaded cannon.

But the depths of old Perry's philosophy were not so easily disturbed, especially when his senses were lulled with tobacco.

"Now dat's jest w'at I allers said 'bout dis yere camp meetin' foolishness," he replied, with unction, puffing a huge cloud of smoke about his face as if to hide all feeling of personal interest in the matter. "Whar de brackest clouds is, dar's whar dis yere reg'lar streak lightenin' cums frum; an' wharebber yo' fine dis gran' upliffin' ob de sperrit, you 'se mighty ap' fer ter fine de sins ob de flesh close ter han'. Dese yere niggas is gone out inter de wildernesses fur ter frolic. Signs 'peers ter be pintin' ez ef dey wanted ter git out frum unda de ole man's eye. Sposum dey does? Bimeby, when dey hain't a-lookin' fur hit, 'ull come de lightenin' stroke ob 'pentance, an' de floods 'ull pour down, an' dem two fools 'ull make fur de ole folks' shanty like dey wuz skeert ob gittin' dere Sunday-go-ter-meetin's spiled. 'Tain't nuthin' nohow," he added, disparagingly. "Dorcas Hanner, she 'll git tired ob dat coon fas' enuff."

Old Sally had her face hid in the cupboard, and the sight of those piles of cracked and broken dishes—reminders of her own wedded woes and blisses—put "streak" in her to utter a remonstrance.

"Now, Perry," she said, "dat don't peer to me ter be quite right, somehow—not 'zackly right. Dorcas Hanner am yore own flesh an' blood, an' I sh'd think yo'd want ter tek some pains ter sabe de gal's kereceter—not let her go off dat way as ef she hedn't no kin ter back her. She hain't a bad gal, Dorcas Hanner hain't—not to say bad."

Perry scented opposition. His voice and his temper immediately began to rise.

"How? How 's dat?" he cried. "Am yo' goin' ter tell me de hows and de wharfo's ob dis matter? Don't yo' go fur ter gib me none ob dat kine ob talk, ole 'ooman! My bones is gittin' too ole fur ter go rackin' roun' arter de whimsies ob dat gal. I 'se got dat gal a place, an' she 's offen my mine. Now, ef she 's boun' fur ter go a-frolickin' wid dat lazy nigga, w'y de best 'vice I ken gib her is to keep away from ole Perry ef she knows what 's good fur her wholesome."

Old Sally felt a hot spot in the back of her head, where his glance pierced through the wool; but the meekest of wives and hens will ruffle up their feathers in defense of their broods, especially when reduced to one chicken. She felt as if she was "possessed."

"I don't keer!" she said. "Yo' might tek some pains ter go arter de gal an' fotch her home. A little breshin' wid a hick'ry ud take all de badness clean outen her. De missis, she 'll git clean outer pashunts ef Dorcas Hanner hain't back afore long." And then her inspiration suddenly left her. She flung her apron over her head and began to sob.

The old man was astounded. A thunder-cloud began to gather on his brow; but he suppressed it for fear of shaking down more rain.

"Yo' jist hush up dat ar', will yo', Sal!" he commanded. "Hain't yo' a purty lookin' objick, tryin' ter wring watta outen yore head, as ef yo' wuz w'ite folks! Yo' betta fine out how de land lays afore yo' put up yore flood-gates! D'yo' 's'pose," he added, rising above the clouds, and inflating his chest in supreme consciousness of moral grandeur, "d'yo' 's'pose I 'm goin' ter hab folks talkin' 'bout me, an' tellin' how I wuz skeer'd ob losin' dat leetle matta ob ten levies a week dat Dorcas Hanner fatches inter de family? No, sah! I hain't a-goin' ter hab de name ob Glasgow dragged through de puddles in no sich collusions!"

Old Sally wiped her eyes and nose with an exasperated air of defeat, and gave her stern lord a parting peck.

"Well, ennyhow," she said, "Dorcas Hanner she 's a mighty stubborn kinder gal. Like enuff she 'll tek her own co'se, whedder or no."

Perry was silent a moment. Then he broke off the conversation with an unwonted attempt at jocularity.

"Sun 's a pintin' my way," he said. "Ef I don't git inter de qua'ay afore long, de boss 'll be on de hunt ob ole Per. Wuck can't git along widout him, dat 's shore!" And he strode off, whistling a scrap of tune.

But he found that his family troubles had got to the quarry before him. He had to run a gauntlet of satire from a "passel ob low-lived greenho'ns." When he would light his pipe, it would draw forth the remark, "Ye 'll hev to cut down on the 'baccy afore long, old man." Taunts which old Perry only answered by a look of unutterable scorn. But when one said, "This here is what cooms of hick'ryin' so free. Toughen their backs while they 're young, and ye 'll toughen their harts agin ye in yer ould age," Perry rose up in wrath, as one whose household gods were desecrated, saying, "Dar 's chillun not fur frum dis yere bank w'at am sech a pack ob white-libbered, no 'count brats, dat it hain't wuth w'ile wearin' out a good hick'ry on um; but w'en it cums ter chillun as is chillun, de hick'ry am a need-cessity to dere salbashun."

And, for a time, his tormentors were quenched; but old Sally's hint at his possible loss of supremacy over his own offspring still rankled in his soul.

By noon of the second day he reached a conclusion, and came home with his black eyes sparkling, his wrinkled lips knit together with a firm resolve.

"Come, rouse aroun' an' git me up some dinnah, ole 'ooman!" he commanded. "I 'se 'bleeged fur ter go ter camp dis artemnoon—no time ter was'e."

He deigned to give no explanation for his change of purpose; nor did his spouse expect or require one. She got dinner with a fluttering heart and beaming face. She waited till he had gulped down his dinner with a few hasty mouthfuls, donned a clean shirt, a pair of white trousers with "galluses" on, a linen vest, and crowned himself with a decrepit stove-pipe hat, and then she burst forth with all her hopes.

"Oh, Pappy," she cried, "is yo' goin' fur ter fotch um home, ralely? Fotch um bofe, Pappy, do! Dere hain't no call fur to be ha'sh-wid Joe. He 's a nice, peaceable-disposed kinder boy as ebba was. 'Tain't like as ef you 'd gun him de liberties ob de house. He won't mek no bones 'bout merryin' Dorcas Hanner. Mebbe dey 's merried a'ready, an' dey kin lib heah wid us snugger 'n nuthin' 'tall. Hit do git mighty lone-some heah sometimes, fur to be shore, now dat all de chillun is gone."

Old Perry's thin nostrils expanded in wrath.

"Merry her!" he cried. "Who de debble wants him ter merry her? D'yo' 'low as I'm goin' ter bend my ole back to s'port one ob dat ign'ant Jim Nelson's brats? I'll foteh de gal home. I'll larn her de rights ob gittin' along through dis yere vale ob tears. Thought she'd git away frum de ole man, did she? She'll fine out dat de ole man kin see funder ahead nor a tuckkey-buzze'd; an' de deeper inter de mire ob sin w'at she's got, de mo' purchas' de ole man ull hab. Yo' mine me!"

And, with a vicious whirl of his staff that filled the old lady's heart with awe, he set forth for the camp, muttering to himself, and stopping occasionally to anathematize his undutiful daughter in the form of a stump or tree.

By the time the old man reached the camp his wrath had worn itself to a brittle edge. He was not much troubled with religion, and the tumult of stamping feet and shouting voices filling the air with the incense of barbaric worship, and consecrating itself by main force of lungs, was a little too "pussonal."

"Oh, Mistah Glasgow!" cried a buxom sister, her eyes aglow with spiritual fire, her face shining with the drops wrung out by the grand conflict between spirit and matter; "is yo' gwine ter jine de j'yful ban'? We'se gwine ter call down de glory frum de skies, fur shore."

"Huh!" growled the old man; "dem niggas' huffs 'ull rout de 'Old Boy' up outen de yarth a blame sight sooner. An' he'll mek yo' sweat ter sum pu'ppos'. H-h-w'at's cum ob my gal, dat's w'at I wanten know?" he cried, raising his voice. "Yo' put mo' debblement inter her wid yore foolin' dan I kin beat outen her in a yeah."

And, without waiting for an answer, he strode away, foilowed by a universal grin and snicker. Searching the outlying byways, where glimpses of white dresses, red and yellow ribbons and gayly-colored shawls showed the presence of amorous couples or social groups, he at length found the recreant pair.

They were alone, seated upon a log, within the very spray of the torrent of worship. The head of that "brat of Nelson's" clove to Dorcas Hannah's shoulder. But when the angry parent lifted his harsh voice, and rasped through the bonds of bliss that united them, he had the satisfaction of seeing the head rebound several feet, and a look of mortal terror take the place of the simper of affection.

"Yo' Dorcas Hanner," said the old man, simply, "I'se bin on de hunt ob yo'!"

Dorcas Hannah gave her head a little toss and stuck out her chin. She looked hard to drive.

"Come, rouse up out ob dat, an' git along home, now!" There was a strong upward tendency in the old man's voice, and he punctuated his order with a pure growl.

Dorcas Hannah rose up. The habit of obedience had been both born and beaten into her. Then she stopped, perplexed, and dropped a look upon her perturbed companion.

"W'at d'yo' say 'bout hit, Joe?" she asked.

"Oh, I'm agreeable," said Joe, rising with voluble alacrity. "Ef de ole gen'leman am 'sposed ter do de genteel thing, I hain't de man fur ter disap'int him."

Perry never looked at him.

"W'at de matta now?" he cried, no longer caring to restrain his ire. "I tole yo' ter git along home, didn't I? Well, den! Didn't I nebba larn yo' no better'n ter go stiddyin' 'bout w'at I tole yo' fur ter do?"

Dorcas Hannah faced him with a look of dismay, backed by a curious glimmer of defiance in her wide, brown eyes.

"W'y, I dunno," she said. "I thought yo' 'd yeer'd —Joe an' me"—she cast down her eyes and stood twisting one of the buttons of her dress. "We'se bin gittin' merried." She raised her eyes again, and gave her head a little shake. "De Good Man's done jined us in de blissful bon's fur good an' all," she added more boldly, an' it's agin de law fur ter try ter shove us apart. We wuz goin' ter look out a house fur ourselves afore long." Here her voice faltered again. Her hesitancy set free the old man's stores of arrogance.

"Now, w'at kinder truck am dat ter give yore daddy?" he shouted. "Kin dis yere camp-meetin' foolin' lay ober de needcessities ob de flesh? Am de Good Man fit ter keep yo' in po'k an' 'taters? Who lay down de laws in dis yere family, ennyhow? W'y Perry, dat's who! He am 'squire an' constable, too! He am Good Man 'nuff fur yo'! An' I'll hab yo' fur ter know, me gal, dat yo' hain't merried right tell ole Perry's done 'pinted de ban's. Yo' mine me! Git along home, now, or I'll lay dis yere stick ober yore back!"

He grasped her arm and raised his cane. This was too much for the bridegroom. He raised his diminutive voice and cried:

"Betta han'le dem paws a leetle keerless, ole man! I don't 'low no man ter lay han's onter my gal. I'll knock yer inter de middle of nex' week, ef yo' don' mine out! Dod blame me ef I don't!" And he thrust back his sleeves, and began capering around like a terrier proclaiming war on a bulldog.

The old man turned upon his youthful opponent with a glare that said: "Yo' mis'ble jumpin' jimmy-jack, jest wait tell I wipe yo' offen de face ob de yarth!"

Joe stopped his dancing. His hand stole up to his waistcoat pocket, indicating an ugly means of making up for his lack of inches, while the prize of the combat held her breath and doubted which to aid.

An ominous silence formed a ring around them; but through the laughing leaves fell the distant tones of the preacher:

"Oh, my bredderin! cussed am sin! I don't talk 'bout de sins ob de flesh or de sins ob de sperrit; I cuss de sin ob de sinner. Oh, my fren's, hearken at de Genesis ob sin! Dar am folks what can't hold out agin de smell ob de wattamel'n in de da'k ob de moon. Dar am folks what de squawk ob de chicken in de midnight hours 'ull rouse clean outen de bed ob righteousness. But dese yere one-hoss kinder sinners can't hole a candle ter de 'Ole Boy!' He am de boss thief ob all; for he hab de skelington-keys and de jimmys, and he cum outen town an' bust open de bery cellar-doors ob yore hearts, where am stored de po'k-bar'ls ob love and de milk-pans ob human kineness, an' he'll tuk away all de good in life, an' lef' only de maggits an' bonny-clabba. Oh, sistahs, jine han's in de holy fight agin de enemy. Don' 'low no man ter hab de key ter yore h'arts but de Good Man! Keep dat debble out! Fur he am gripin' wid greedy han's fur de wages ob yore sufferin', which am salbas-hun!"

Dorcas Hannah's perturbed mind made a rapid application of the words. She read them in the light of having her life taxed to pay for its own engendering. She sprang upon the old man and wheeled him half round.

"Dar," she cried, "jest yo' lissen at dat! Dat's de kine ob talk fur yo', yo' blame 'Ole Boy!' Yo' don' git no mo' ob my wages, blame your stingy ole soul! We'se squar' now. I'se done paid yo' off. I can't aff'd to pay fur no go-between twix' me an' de Good Man no longer. An' when yo' reaches out fur ter broke dis yere match you'se a-bitin' off more 'n yo' kin chaw, an' don' yo' forget hit! Hit me, now! Hit me! Jest yo' darst ter hit me! I've tuck my last beatin' from yo' I've got a man ter back me now!"

Old Perry raised his arm, and then—lowered it again. His own flesh and blood, beaten into a mould that was too hard for him, had stripped the mask from his callous old soul. His son-in-law, standing there with a razor—the blade folded back against the haft—gleaming in his clenched fist, was prepared to do as much for the physical organs. An unprecedented, unwonted quiver of emotion swept through the woody fibre of the old man's being to the very tip of his tall hat.

"Yo'—yo'—yo'—Dorcas Hanner!" he cried with a breaking voice. "Mus' I swaller dis yere kinder sass from yo'? Hain't yo' got no sorter feelin' for de ole man? Mus' ole Perry cut down on de needcessities ob life fer ter 'low yo' ter go off an' merry sech a mis'-able—" He looked at the razor and paused, drew his hand across his brow, made a vain attempt to swallow his Adam's-apple, and stiffened up. "All right, den! Ef cussin' am de word, Perry kin cuss f'um de word 'go.' He cuss yo' wid de cuss dat 'longs ter de h'art—onthanful h'art. He cuss yo' wid de cuss ob de disapp'inted daddy. Yo'll find out afore long dat clabba' am mo' fillin' dan spring-watta, an' measly po'k am pref'able ter de brine. Yo'll fine out—yo'll fine out. Go 'long an' clutter up de yarth wid little debbles. De old man hab too much on his mine to stan' jawin' yere!"

And he choked down his ire, shouldered his dignity and strode away, leaving the pair in giddy and uncertain triumph.

That night, when Sally ventured a cautious inquiry as to the offenders, Perry "brought her right up standing" with the remark:

"Dey is no mo' ter me dan de clods ob de yarth I tromple unda foot! I's done pestered my ole brains 'nuff tryin' ter haul dem two fools outen de mire. Dey's stuck up onter a tussick, an' dey takes it fur de fum groun'. Dorcas Hanner she mek's out she's married somehow—I dunno. But dey'll fine de ole man's cuss am a hefty load ter kerry! An' w'en dey gits ready fur ter hunt de ole man's shanty, he'll larn um de blessin's ob 'pentance! He will fur shore!"

Old Sally only said, "Lor', Pappy!"

But the obstinate couple again failed to fulfill the old man's expectations. In their place old age came to his cabin. His meek-spirited wife, too, spoiled the record of a patient life by disobeying her lord—she died. With her all-enduring spirit died something of Perry's arrogance; but his hardened frame lived on—lived beyond its use—until he was fain to seek shelter from the clods he had scorned. Seated on a bench, on the sunny side of Dorcas Hannah's cottage, old Perry, with bleared eyes and palsied arm, at length gave his benison to the thrifty young couple in this wise:

"I tell yo' hit's all 'count ob de way she wuz riz. Ef I hedn't wucked a little hick'ry inter dat gal's nater, she'd nebba a brung dat ar Joe up ter de scratch like she's done. Nebba in de wurd!"

THE BOTTOM DRAWER.

I

In the best chamber of the house,
Shut up in dim, uncertain light,
There stood an antique chest of drawers,
Of foreign wood, with brasses bright.
One morn a woman frail and gray
Stepp'd totteringly across the floor—
"Let in," said she, the light of day—
"Then, Jean, unlock the bottom drawer!"

II

The girl, in all youth's loveliness,
Knelt down with eager, curious face;
Perchance she dreamt of Indian silks,
Of jewels, and of rare old lace.
But when the summer sunshine fell
Upon the treasures hoarded there,
The tears rushed to her tender eyes,
Her heart was solemn as a prayer.

III

"Dear Grandmamma!" she softly sigh'd,
Lifting a withered rose and palm;
But on the elder face was naught
But sweet content and peaceful calm.
Leaning upon her staff, she gazed
Upon a baby's half-worn shoe;
A little frock of finest lawn;
A hat with tiny bows of blue,—

IV

A ball, made fifty years ago;
A little glove; a tassel'd cap;
A half-done long division sum;
Some school books fasten'd with a strap.
She touch'd them all with trembling lips—
"How much," she said, the heart can bear!
"Ah, Jean! I thought that I should die
The day that first I laid them there.

V

"But now it seems so good to know
That all throughout these weary years
Their hearts have been untouch'd by grief,
Their eyes have been unstained by tears.
Dear Jean, we see with clearer sight,
When earthly love is almost o'er;
Those children wait me in the skies,
For whom I lock'd that sacred drawer."

NEW BOSTON.

TWENTY-FIVE years ago Boston was a compact little city of about 170,000 inhabitants, extending from what is known as the North End, in one direction, to Chester Square at the South End, and including South and East Boston. The city was built on a peninsula, connected with the main land by a narrow strip of marsh called Boston Neck; the streets in the city proper were narrow and crooked; the buildings low and plainly constructed, while a really imposing structure was quite a rarity. To-day, Boston takes high rank among the cities of the United States. Her commerce, industries and territory have increased nearly two hundredfold, and she can boast of a population of 400,000 souls, and a valuation of over $672,000,000. Modern Boston, as compared with the older town, presents many striking improvements and changes. Many of the broad avenues, imposacres of salt marsh and flats, and at high water was covered to a depth of seven to ten feet. It was separated from the river by a partition dam, constructed in the early part of the present century for the purpose of obtaining a vast hydraulic power from the ebb and flow of the tide. This mill-dam was completed in 1821, at a cost of $700,000, and for many years was used for the purposes originally intended, though for some time past it has only been utilized as a causeway. Its location and construction, however, aided materially in the filling in operations which were begun a number of years ago, and whereby this vast tract of useless territory was converted into valuable property. At the foot of the Common, where Charles Street is now located, was formerly a low beach, forming the eastward bank of the Back Bay, and which served the purpose of the city dump. Here ashes, the accumulated street filth and other refuse matter, were promiscuously thrown, forming a seething, offensive mass in wet weather, and a dusty, dirty heap in dry time, from which every puff of air scattered seeds of disease and death. The place became such a nuisance that from sheer necessity the authorities were compelled to take some action in the matter, which resulted in the construction of one of the most beautiful public parks that can be found in any city in the country.

The Public Garden, as the present enclosure is called, comprises an area of a little over twenty-one acres, bounded by Charles, Boylston, Arlington and Beacon streets. It is in charge of the City Forester, who has under him a large force of men to keep the garden in good condition. The grounds are laid out with as much taste and care as a private estate, there being curiously-shaped flower beds, grass plots, shrubbery, rare plants, shade trees and the like, the whole effect being heightened by long stretches of smoothly-shaven lawns. By an ingenious selection of the plants with which the garden is stocked, some varieties are constantly in bloom from early spring until the advent of cold weather. In the fall months the garden presents a beautiful appearance, with its large collection of autumnal plants, together with the variegated colors of the surrounding foliage. In the centre of the garden is a small sheet of water with winding banks, bordered by a handsome granite curbing. In summer the surface of this little lake is dotted with gayly-decked pleasure boats, presenting a very ing public buildings and elegant private residences are not excelled by those found in any city in the country, while the new and attractive features that have been added are found on almost every hand. Bostonians point with pardonable pride to their present city, for it has been the aim of the municipal authorities, whenever a change or improvement was to be made, to blend as much as possible the artistic with the useful, and produce results that would be of lasting beauty and benefit.

In speaking of new Boston one instinctively turns toward the Back Bay, as it is termed, for here the growth of the city is most apparent. In the early history of Boston this section was a broad bay or arm of Charles River, which, at low tide, consisted of some six hundred pretty sight. The pond is spanned by an iron bridge, resting on granite piers, the whole structure presenting an imposing appearance.

There are several handsome statues in the Public Garden, erected partly for ornament and partly as memorials of certain events. The "Ether monument," which was presented to the city in 1868 by Mr. Thomas Lee to commemorate the discovery of ether as an anæsthetic, occupies a prominent position in the park. It is a remarkably fine piece of work, composed of red marble and granite, and an appropriate inscription informs the visitor the object for which it was erected. On the Beacon Street side of the garden is a statue of Edward Everett, modeled by W. W. Story, and erected in November, 1867, and near the Boylston Street mall is a bronze statue of Charles Sumner, which was placed in position in 1879. But the most prominent statue that greets the eye is the bronze equestrian statue of George Washington, located near the Commonwealth Avenue entrance to the garden. It is from the chisel of Thomas Ball, and is said to be the largest piece of its kind in America. The height of the statue is twenty-two feet, and with the pedestal, which in itself is a fine piece of work, is thirty-eight feet high. The foundation of the whole is solid masonry, resting on piles eleven feet deep. The regulations of the garden are very strict, and, though always open to the public, yet visitors are subjected to considerable restraint; and, even under this condition of affairs, the flower-beds suffer from frequent depredations. The Public Garden is regarded as the beginning of the Back Bay, for after it had been reclaimed from the sea, both public and private enterprise combined to beat back the encroaching tide. Finally, the commonwealth contracted to have this vast tract filled in, and after a number of years the task was finally completed. The entire cost to the state was less than two million dollars, while more than double that sum has already been received by the public treasury from sales of land, at comparatively high figures. Beside the state a number of private operators entered the market, each of whom filled more or less territory with made land, until all but a very limited area of this once noisome swamp has been converted into solid, habitable earth.

Commonwealth Avenue is considered the finest street in Boston, and, indeed, it is doubtful if any city in the country can display a more elegant thoroughfare. It extends from the Public Garden on the east to Chester Park extension on the west, a distance of one and a half miles, and has a width of two hundred feet. A broad park lined with shade trees lies in the centre of the avenue throughout its entire length, and the neatly-kept gravel walk, with here and there a rustic seat, affords one of the most beautiful promenades imaginable. In this park is the granite statue of Alexander Hamilton, by Dr. Rimmer, which was presented to the city in 1865, by Thomas Lee. Also the bronze figure of John Glover, by Martin Millmore, presented to the city in 1875 by Benjamin Tyler Reed. Commonwealth Avenue is lined with elegant residences, some being almost palatial in their magnificence; and, though the designs of the structures differ widely, this very variety only enhances the general effect. Land in this section is very valuable, the prices ranging from two hundred dollars to one thousand dollars per foot; but notwithstanding this exorbitant figure, many of the dwellings are surrounded by extensive grounds, which are elaborately laid out and filled with rare plants, statuary, fountains and similar lawn ornaments. Building operations in this vicinity have progressed very rapidly within the past few years, and at present comparatively few vacant lots remain, except at the extreme western section of the avenue. The new Brattle Square Church edifice, purchased by two of the leading Baptist societies, is a noticeable structure on the avenue. It is constructed of Roxbury stone, in the form of a Greek cross, and has a tall square tower, with a number of carved figures at the top. Hotel Vendome, an imposing marble building, is another prominent object, while on every hand are evidences of skilled and tasteful architecture in the handsome private residences.

The streets lying parallel with and at right angles to Commonwealth Avenue, though perhaps not so beautiful, are scarcely less noticeable on account of the number of handsome dwellings. On Marlboro, Beacon, Newbury and Boylston Streets, all of which extend in the same direction as the avenue, reside the most wealthy and aristocratic families in the city. All the buildings, both public and private, were constructed with an eye to beauty as well as comfort. With almost unlimited means at their disposal, the architects were left to consult their own tastes, regardless of expense, and in consequence there is not in this section of the city a single inferior-looking or poorly-constructed building. The cross streets are so named that the initial letters of their titles are in alphabetical order, as, for instance, Arlington, Berkeley, Clarendon, Dartmouth, Exeter, Fairfield, etc., and each has its quota of beautiful residences and public structures. On the corner of Berkeley and Boylston Streets are the buildings of the Natural History Society and the Institute of Technology, both fine edifices, standing in extensive grounds. On the opposite corner is the building of the Young Men's Christian Association. At the corner of Berkeley and Marlboro is the First Church, a beautiful structure, erected at a cost of $325,000, and capable of seating about one thousand persons; while the handsome edifice of the Central Church Society is on the corner of Newberry and Boylston Streets. The "New Old South Church" is located on Dartmouth Street, and is one of the most prominent objects on the Back Bay. Its cost was $500,000, and the building includes, besides the church, a fine chapel and parsonage. Its stained-glass windows were brought from England, and the interior presents a very beautiful appearance, with the rich carvings, the large chandeliers and handsome decorations. The new quarters of the Boston Art Club, on Dartmouth Street, also attract the attention of the visitor, being handsomely constructed of brownstone in a novel and artistic design.

At the junction of Dartmouth Street, Boylston Street and Huntington Avenue is a triangular piece of unoccupied land, about which just now there is considerable discussion. It is located in the heart of the Back Bay, and in consequence is quite valuable for building purposes, notwithstanding its somewhat peculiar shape. For a long time the residents in the vicinity were in great anxiety as to what was to be the destiny of this triangle, when the question was finally settled by the purchase of the land by the city, partly from the public funds and partly by private subscription. The sum paid was about $150,000, and it is now intended to devote the ground to a park, for which purpose it will be most appropriate. The question then arose as to what should be its name, and several were proposed, among them "Garfield Square," it being also suggested that a statue of the lamented President should be erected there. Another idea advanced was that it would be an excellent site for the proposed statue of Paul Revere, by which a number of liberal-minded citizens of the city wish to perpetuate the memory of the hero of Concord and Lexington, and the name would then be "Revere Square." Still another title, and the one by which the place is known at present, though there is no official authority for the name, is "Trinity Square," on account of the famous Trinity Church, which is located near by. Either of the above names would be highly appropriate, provided the statues were forthcoming; but, judging from the skill of the "street namers" of this city in past years, the park will be destined to bear down to future generations some title that will cause the coming residents of the city to marvel at the decision of the authorities.

In this square is located the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, one of the finest institutions in the city. The original plans call for a much larger structure than the present edifice, and, when completed, the building will be four times its present size. The principal material used in construction is red brick, and the mouldings, copings and all ornamental work are of red and buff terra cotta, and were imported from England. On the façade are two artistically executed bas-reliefs, representing "Genius of Art" and "Art and Industry," while in the roundels are the heads of the most distinguished artists and patrons of art. The institution is under the control of a corporation, which is administered by a board of trustees, to which are added annually persons chosen to represent Harvard University, the Institute of Technology, the Lowell Institute, the and the vestibules in ash and oak, while special attention has been paid to interior decorations. These are unsurpassed by anything in the country, and are the work of John La Farge, of New York City. The stained-glass windows were brought from Europe, and the entire cost of the structure was $750,000. It will be seen at once that, with such surroundings, a better site for a park could scarcely be chosen, for, in addition to the imposing church and the handsome Art Museum, there face the square two large hotels, the brown-stone edifice of the Second Church, the Chauncy Hall School building, the site of the new Public Library and a number of elegant private residences. There is no doubt but that in a few years hence this spot will be pointed out to the visitor as one of the finest squares in the city.

The western section of the Back Bay presents just now a busy but at the same time rather a forlorn appearance. It is here that the new public park is to be located, and for several years operations have been going on, filling in the marsh lands, changing the course of the tide-water, and grading and leveling the ground. The territory lies to the south and west of the city, and when completed according to original plans the park will be nearly one hundred and sixty acres in extent, reaching to Brookline and Jamaica Plain, a distance of about five miles. This section of the Back Bay was the common estuary of Muddy River and Stony Brook, which, when the tide was in, was a broad pool, and at low water a narrow creek, between deep and fetid mudbanks, which emitted offensive and deleterious odors. Private and public operations have moved this noisome pestilence, transforming it into solid earth, and materially improving the healthfulness and the appearance of the city in this section. When the park is completed it is proposed to have in it a lake of some thirty acres in extent, with rocky banks, beaches and coves, while its surface will be dotted with low islands. On these latter the common vegetation of salt marshes, as well as perennial shrubs, are to be planted along the edges, with trees of loftier growth in the centre. To make the lake more attractive, numbers of water-fowl are to be introduced, such as swans, pelicans, cormorants, cranes and other waders and fishers.

Public Library and the Boston Athenæum; also the Mayor, the Superintendent of Public Schools and the Secretary of the State Board of Education ex officio. In the same building are schools of embroidery, wood-carving, modeling and decorative art.

Trinity Church, close at hand, is deserving of more than a passing mention, as being the finest church edifice in New England. The structure, which was completed in 1877, is in the French-Romanesque style, in the shape of a Latin cross, with a semi-circular apse added to the eastern part. The interior is finished in black walnut,

In the park is to be a promenade twenty-four to forty feet wide, a drive-way forty feet wide, and a "bridle-path" twenty-five feet wide, which are to be carried side by side for a distance of three-quarters of a mile. There are to be but few inclosures or buildings in the park, save for administrative purposes, and the landing and gate-houses, which are to be used for shelter in case of sudden showers. There will be ten or more entrances, while Boylston Street and Commonwealth Avenue are to be extended through the grounds, thus affording ample facilities for horse-car or omnibus lines to reach the spot. The plans are alike simple and beautiful, and when completed the park, with its pleasing surroundings, will supply a want that has long been felt by the residents of the city, while the proximity of such an enclosure will induce still greater building activity in the vicinity.

The improvements at the South End, as the southern section of the city is termed, should not be passed unnoticed. This part of the city was formerly known as Boston Neck, and consisted of a narrow salt marsh, through which ran Washington Street, the principal thoroughfare to Roxbury, and Tremont Street, then a clam-shell road. Little by little the swamp-lands were filled in, until to-day there is not a vestige of the marsh remaining. The South End is devoted almost exclusively to residences, and although the dwellings are less pretentious than their aristocratic neighbors on the Back Bay, many of them are models of neatness and comfort. The new High and Latin School building, one of the finest public school edifices in the country, is located at the South End. It was dedicated in 1881, and cost over $700,000. Not far away is the Girls' High School building, also a number of fine churches; and farther south, adjoining the Back Bay, are the exhibition buildings of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association and the New England Manufacturers' and Mechanics' Institute. These last are two immense brick structures, in which exhibitions of the different arts and sciences are yearly given. The new Children's Hospital is situated between the above-named buildings, and is a handsome and commodious structure. The tide of population has been steadily moving westward for some years, and real estate at the South End, east of Washington Street, has been steadily depreciating, while property west of the same thoroughfare has correspondingly increased in value.

Boston has been justly famed for her suburbs, and probably few cities in the country are surrounded with more attractive country places. During the past twenty years many of the neighboring towns have been annexed to Boston, so that what are generally termed suburbs are in reality a part of the city itself. Roxbury was added to Boston in 1867, and is now known as Boston Highlands. West Roxbury, including Jamaica Plain, was added in 1874; Dorchester and Neponset in 1870; Charlestown and Brighton in 1874. South Boston and East Boston have long been a part of the city, though separated by water from its natural limits. After leaving the more populous sections of the city, one may find for miles in almost every direction, large estates standing in the midst of extensive and finely-laid out grounds, while handsome residences, long stretches of smoothly-shaven lawns, neatly-arranged gardens and thriving orchards are seen on every hand. In Mount Pleasant, Dorchester, and along Blue Hill Avenue, the number of these fine places is particularly noticeable, the beauty of the surroundings being enhanced by occasional glimpses of the distant harbor and bay or the high hills some miles inland. Near the Dedham line is Forest Hills Cemetery, a beautiful city of the dead, that rivals almost any similar place in the country. Within comparatively few years it has been greatly improved by the addition of plants, flowers and handsome monumental work. Longwood, adjoining the city, though not a part of Boston, is inhabited by so many people from the city as to deserve mention. For some time past property has been steadily increasing in value in this section, and numbers of small but exceedingly pretty cottages have been erected. It seems to be the chosen abode of newly-married couples, and within two or more years very many young people have settled down in this quiet but charming town. Far-seeing people predict that it is but a question of time before the place will become a part of Boston, in which case fortunate property owners will realize handsomely on their original purchases. All through the outskirts of the city building operations are extensively carried on, and the present rapid growth of the city seems to warrant such enterprises. The finely-equipped and admirably-managed horse-car lines of which Boston may be justly proud, have done much to build up the suburbs, but according to the present rate of increase in the population, additional facilities of transportation in the way of elevated railroads and other means of rapid transit will soon be needed. Such features, though strenuously opposed at first, would ultimately become very popular, and would add wonderfully in building up the outlying districts of the city.

The great fire of 1872, though temporarily checking the business interests of Boston, resulted ultimately in greatly increasing the value of property throughout the burnt district. The low, cramped buildings that were swept away by the conflagration have been supplanted by towering and spacious warehouses, while much of the territory before unoccupied has been built upon. Then, too, the city took occasion to widen many of the thoroughfares and make other needed improvements, so that this section of Boston has been almost entirely made over. The business centres have also changed, the dry goods houses now congregating on Franklin and Summer Streets; the boot and shoe trade on Pearl, High and Summer Streets; the leather trade on South Street, which latter place has recently been improved and widened at great expense, while the other business centres are nearly as they were before the fire. One of the most important and extensive street improvements was the extension of Washington Street from Cornhill to Haymarket Square, in 1873 and 1874, entailing an expenditure of $1,500,000; so that the thoroughfare now extends from the last-named place to the Dedham line. Another improvement was the laying out of Atlantic Avenue, at an expense of over $2,400,000. This street is now one hundred feet wide, and extends from Eastern Avenue to Federal Street. The line of the avenue was originally below tidewater, but was filled in, and the reclaimed land, which is now of great value, is almost entirely covered with large warehouses or devoted to extensive dock property. The leveling of Fort Hill, which was once the fashionable part of Boston, was accomplished at an expense of nearly $200,000, and what was formerly the centre of the hill is now Fort Hill Square. The streets in other sections of the city have been widened and extended until Boston has now over four hundred miles of public highways.

But the many recent improvements in Boston are by no means confined to the city itself. The harbor has had its share of attention, and extensive operations have been going on to accommodate the growing commerce of the port. The South Boston flats have been filled in by the state, so that this territory, which was formerly worse than useless, is now utilized for immense grain elevators, storehouses, docks and the like. The work is by no means yet completed, but when wholly finished there will be no finer railroad facilities or dock privileges in the country. New wharves to accommodate the ponderous ocean steamers which ply regularly between the port and Europe have been constructed in different parts of the harbor, and the evidences of progress and improvement are apparent all along the water front.

It is needless to speak of Boston's many educational and benevolent institutions. In this respect she is unexcelled by any city in the country, and the fame of some of these establishments is almost world-wide. Each year the various places of learning and the philanthropic societies increase their facilities for disseminating knowledge and doing good; while in other respects the city still deserves the title it has earned of being the "Modern Athens." Boston's sister cities are wont to speak in good-natured jest concerning her learning and "culture," and perhaps her sons and daughters of to-day are too prone to live upon the reputation of their fathers. But, after all, the same actuating spirit of kindness, the same patriotism and love of country, the same freedom of thought and speech, and the same eager searching after enlightenment and education fill the hearts and minds of dwellers in modern Boston just as in the elder day when the ancient city earned her honored title.

EDWARD S. CROSBY.

BELINDA.

BY RHODA BROUGHTON,

Author of "Good-by, Sweetheart!" "Red as a Rose is She," etc., etc.

PERIOD II—CHAPTER III.

THE year declines toward its mirk close. Every day a little more is taken from the light and added to the dark. London is full and cheerful; with a pleasanter, friendlier, more leisurely social stir than the overpowering June one. Two or three good pieces are running at the theatres, and the shop-windows are warm with furs. Round the Churchills a crop of small dinners and dances has sprung up.

The time nears mid-December. Mrs. Churchill's wish as to the non-repetition of Professor Forth's visit has met with the usual fate of wishes. He has come again repeatedly; so repeatedly that the dogs have ceased barking at him, though they are not so hypocritical as to wag their tails on his approach; nor, indeed, does he ever, by kind pats or well-chosen civilities, give them any cause to do so. Even the obtuse Tommy has learned that he is to be shown, not into the drawing-room, but into the little back litter-room, which has been arbitrarily cleared of Sarah's paint pots, and the promiscuous rubbish in which her soul delights; has been furnished with pens, ink, and dictionaries, and raised and dignified by the name of study. For Belinda's fervor for learning rages with a feverish heat that might make a thoughtful looker-on inclined to question its solidity or its continuance.

She is learning Latin Syntax; she is being taught Greek; she has undertaken a course of Universal History; she devotes her spare moments to the Elements of Algebra. Very seldom now does she join her family in the evening. Mostly she remains down stairs, writing Latin Exercises, learning Irregular Greek Verbs; working, working on until late into the night. She would like never to stop, to leave no single chink or cranny by which memory may enter.

And is the charm working? Is the remedy beginning to make its healing virtue felt? This is the question that she never dares ask herself. Sometimes, indeed, it thrusts itself upon her in the sadness of the night. Sometimes the pen drops from her stiffened fingers, or her tired brain relaxes its hold upon the hard-conned page, and she groans out to herself—she alone awake, with her melancholy gas-jet burning above her in the silence of the sleeping house—"Of what use? what use?" Has it given back to life its sweet and wholesome taste? Has it helped her to dominate that terrible irritability which makes no person and no moment safe from some senseless outbreak of her temper? Has it conquered that gloom which renders her the kill-joy of her little circle? There is not one of these questions that she can honestly answer in the affirmative.

But perhaps there has not yet been time enough to test the efficacy of this cure. Its action will doubtless be slow, but all the more lasting and solid for that. She must persevere; it would be madness not to persevere. She passes her hand across her weary, throbbing temples, and catches up the pen again.

The clock strikes two, and she still writes. It is not night now; it is afternoon. Mrs. Churchill and Sarah, furred and feathered, with their bonnets nicely tied on, and their faces alight with placid good-humor, have set off in the brougham on their daily career of calls and shops.

Belinda remains behind in the little dingy back room, with her copy-books. Not once to-day has she tasted the wholesome outside air—wholesome, black and fog-charged as it is. She has been alone here the whole day, except for a couple of ten minutes grudgingly snatched for breakfast and luncheon.

She has been alone, but she is so no longer. Professor Forth has just been ushered in to partake her solitude. She meets him with a complaint.

"I expected you yesterday."

"I was detained by a College meeting, and by other engagements," he answers. "I hope," ceremoniously, "that you were not inconvenienced by the deferring of my visits?"

"I was," she answers brusquely. "As it happened, I wanted you badly. I was completely puzzled by a passage here," laying her hand upon a school edition of "Cæsar's Commentaries." "I worried over it till I felt quite dazed and woolly."

As she speaks she draws the volume toward her, and they both stoop their heads over the page; his with its old, sparse, colorless hair, thriftily drawn across the baldening crown; hers with its unregarded riches of nut-brown. The difficulty dissipated, she leans back in her chair.

"It is hopeless to make any real progress," she says morosely, "as long as our lessons are so interrupted. How much better it would be if we lived in Oxbridge! How I wish we lived in Oxbridge!"

She is sitting alongside of him, and does not look at him as she expresses this wish. It seems to be addressed with a general vagueness to the air.

He glances at her, sidelong and suspiciously; at the beautiful blooming profile, the discontented mouth, the fine, petulant, small nose, the veiled, unglad eyes. He has almost given up suspecting her of late, but her last aspiration has rearoused his distrust. Was not Sarah once fervent and constant in her longings to inhabit a University town?

"It would make things so much easier," she continues plaintively, quite unconscious of his disquieting doubts. "If I were in difficulties I could go straight to you. I had much rather live in Oxbridge than here."

He is still observing her covertly, and makes no answer.

"It must be a good life!" she says, with the same restless longing as a sick person's for strange food; "so full of intelligent interests, so absorbing, and must take one so out of one's self!"

As she speaks she clasps both hands at the back of her neck, and stares dreamily up at the ceiling. He has moved his eyes away from her. Perhaps they are satisfied with the result of their investigation. They now look straight before him on Cæsar's open page. Upon his fingers he balances a paper-knife, and an unusual expression has crept about his narrow lips.

"If you are sincere in your desire for a—" he begins rather slowly; but she breaks in upon him hotly.

"Sincere!" she repeats, with an angry intonation;

"I cannot imagine why you preface all your remarks with a doubt of my sincerity! What could I possibly gain by being insincere?"

She looks at him full and irately as she speaks, and their eyes meet; the dull old cautious eyes, and the unhappy flashing young ones.

"If my phrase offends you, I will change it!" he answers formally. "Since you are sincere in your desire for a—"

But again he breaks off. There is a ring at the door-bell.

"You have visitors," he says, in an annoyed voice. "We shall be interrupted."

"No, we shall not," she replies, shaking her head. "Tommy knows that when you are here I am not at home to any one."

It is a sentence susceptible of a flattering interpretation—that, indeed, would seem to bear no other—but it is uttered as such indifferent matter-of-fact that he would be indeed a coxcomb who was elated by it.

"Please go on," smiling faintly. "Since I am sincere in my desire for—what?"

But apparently he has lost the thread of his twice-begun speech.

"Your servant must have mistaken your directions," he says, with a vexed look; "he is evidently admitting some one."

Both listen, and, as she listens, Belinda's color changes.

"If we were at Dresden," she says in a suppressed and troubled voice, "and if I did not hope that it were impossible, I should say that the voice was—"

The door flies open.

"Here I am!" cries Miss Watson, bursting into the room, in apparently the identical large black and white plaid gown and grizzled fringe, and in certainly the same burly red face—perhaps a shade worsened by the battle and breeze—as of yore.

She is not ushered in, but helplessly followed by the baffled Tommy, who is raising his puny infant voice in futile protestations, as his predecessor had so often done before him.

"I knew by Tommy's manner that you were at home!" cries she joyfully. "By-the-by, he is a new Tommy! What have you done with the old one? I would not give him my card. I said, 'No, I will surprise them!'"

She has succeeded. Both Mr. Forth and his disciple have risen to their feet, and now stand regarding their visitor with—for the first moments—an entirely silent dismay.

"Mr. Forth, too!" cries Miss Watson, snatching his reluctant hand. "Why, this is Dresden over again! If we had but Sarah and Rivers here, we might think ourselves back there."

Neither of Belinda's companions perceives it, but she shudders. Ever since Miss Watson's voice first fell on her shocked ears, she has known that she would have to endure the sound of Rivers' name. In reality not two minutes have elapsed since then, but it seems to her as if for hours she had been dreading it.

"How snug you are!" says the visitor, patronizingly looking round; "but why do you sit here? Why do not you sit in the drawing-room? Is not the fire lit there? Oh, I suppose Sarah sits there, and grand-mamma? I must go and pay them a little visit just now."

"They are out."

"Out!" repeats the other, laughing; "Sarah is always out. I wish they would come back! How soon do you expect them? We should be just our Dresden party, then—all but Rivers!"

Again that shudder, but she sets her teeth. She must endure it—must steel herself to hear his name—to pronounce it if need be.

"Shocking thing about his father, was it not?" continues Miss Watson, cheerfully pursuing the course of thought suggested by the mention of Rivers. "Failed for over a million, and cut his throat. They say that he has left his large family—twelve? ten? nine?—how many used young Rivers to tell us there were of them?—upon the parish. But I do not believe it; one hears of people bankrupt one day, and rolling in their carriages the next."

Belinda's heart is beating sickeningly, and her hands are trembling so violently that she has to clench them fast together to hide their aguish shaking; but she is nerving herself up. Here is an opportunity for obtaining information about him such as may probably not recur for weeks, months, possibly years. Here, too, is an occasion for practicing that indifferent naming of him to which she is resolved to attain.

"Does Mr. Rivers roll in his carriage?" she asks, with a strained smile.

The effort to speak is so great that it seems to her as if, when it is overcome, she speaks unnaturally loud; but, as her companions show no surprise, she concludes that it cannot be so really.

"I do not know about rolling in his carriage," answers Miss Watson, with her loud, ever-ready laugh; "I know that he can treat himself to stalls at the theatre, which is more than I can; I always go to the dress circle; one's legs are a little cramped in the front row, but one can see as well as in the best place in the house."

Belinda has stooped over the table, and is nervously arranging, rearranging, disarranging the exercise books, grammars, pen-wipers upon it.

"Did you see him at the play?" she asks hurriedly.

"I saw him the other night at the St. James'," returns Miss Watson, inquisitively following with her eyes Belinda's unaccountable fidgetings. "What are you looking for? have you lost anything? No?—at the St. James'. 'The Squire'—have you seen it? it is so well put on the stage—Mrs. Kendal quite at her best!"

"I—I think not," answers Belinda incoherently. "I mean no; I—I have not seen it. You were saying—"

"What was I saying?" (her eyes still fastened curiously on the girl's purposeless movements)—"you must have lost something!—oh! that I had seen young Rivers at the play. He was in the stalls with a lady—his sister, we will presume—though she was not at all like him," with a knowing look; "if she was on the parish, it managed to dress her uncommonly well!"

Even Belinda's lips have turned white. She is conscious of it, and rubs them hard with her fingers. He is in London! He can go to the play, can take his pleasure with other women! She has long known in theory that he must have been frequently in London during the past eighteen months; but never before has it come home to her with such cruel, practical certitude. Lightning-quick the contrast between their evenings—his and hers—has sprung before her eyes: her melancholy vigils, devoted to distasteful studies in the vain hope of wrenching her thoughts away from him; and his, reclining in mirthful ease in a comfortable fauteuil in the lit theatre, beside a beautiful, strange, fond woman. The beauty and fondness her sick imagination has at once supplied. That she may possibly have been his sister, her bitter soul refuses for one instant to admit.

"I tried to get to him as we were going out," pursues Miss Watson narratively. "I saw him on ahead with his lady; he is a most attentive brother!" with a laughing accent on the word; "he was wrapping her up like a mummy! but though I made a great push for it I could not come up with him; there was such a crowd. I never saw a fuller house; I called out to him, and once I thought he had heard, for he looked round and caught my eye; but it could not have been so, for he posted on faster than before!"

At this, in happier moments, Belinda would have smiled. She cannot smile now.

"Have you not seen anything of him?" asks the other, exploring the girl's wan face with the unflinching inquisitiveness of her eyes; "has he not been to call—not once? I must tell him that there is a hole in his manners; I shall be sure to fall in with him again before long, and I will send him here."

"You will not," says Belinda hoarsely, stretching out her hand and turning livid. "I mean," helped back to self-possession by the expression of astonished and eager curiosity painted all over her guest's broad face—"I mean that I think I had rather you did not. If he wishes to call, he—he—knows our address."

CHAPTER IV.

It is next day. Outside, snow is falling; but it is flabby, irresolute, large-flaked snow, that melts as it reaches the slushy street, and makes it slushier still. Mrs. Churchill is standing by the window, eyeing the weather with disgust, and Sarah and the dogs are seated higgledy-piggledy on the hearth-rug.

"This is what we are to expect for the next five months!" cries Mrs. Churchill, addressing this exasperated remark partly to the outside mud and mire and partly to her granddaughter.

Neither heeds it. Sarah's whole attention, indeed, is occupied in bribing Punch, by a sweet biscuit brought up from luncheon, to the performance of the most striking in his repertoire of tricks, an affecting representation of death; which, when contrasted with his usual superabundant life, is much admired by strangers, and, indeed, by his own family.

It is, however, the one of his accomplishments for which he himself has the least partiality. The command to die has to be reiterated many times before he at length rolls reluctantly over on his side; and even then, as he looks up every half second and jumps up every second, a good deal of the repose of death has to be supplied by the spectator's imagination.

"What a climate!" pursues Mrs. Churchill in angry ejaculation. "Good heavens, Sarah, why do you let Jane make such a dreadful noise?"

She may well ask. Jane, seated on her haunches, is volunteering, in a loud series of forward barks, to die, to beg, to trust, to dance—to do anything of which she is utterly incapable, in order to divert to herself the attention monopolized by Punch.

Pug, as the third member of the dog family is now called in consequence of Mrs. Churchill's indignant decree, has, with her usual poor-spiritedness, crawled away under a chair in sulky annoyance at her brother's social success.

"How any one that can help it spends the winter in England, is more than I can imagine!" pursues the old lady, shivering back to the fire. "If we were rid of Belinda, we would go abroad."

"Why should not Belinda go, too—No," holding up a finger in severe prohibition of Punch's premature resurrection; "dead! dead! head down! dead!"

"I could not possibly afford it; and, besides," with a shrug, "she would spoil the whole thing; she is such a wet blanket."

"Everybody cannot be always on the grin like you and me," answers Sarah, with surly disrespect.

"We would go to the South," says Mrs. Churchill, perfectly unmoved by her granddaughter's want of reverence, to which, indeed, she is thoroughly accustomed, her bright old eye lightening at the notion of a holiday; "we would have a week in Paris, and go to the play every night. I must see Judic in this new piece. We would run over to Monaco and try our luck. If only," her exhilarated tone changing to one of impatient vexation, "if only Belinda were out of the way!"

Mrs. Churchill is far too much of an old gentlewoman to speak loud, but her utterance is distinct and pure; she does not swallow all the tails of her words, as we English are accused of doing. It would be impossible for any one entering the room not to hear her; more particularly as Jane has at length been persuaded to cease favoring the company with her remarks.

Sarah lifts her head. She has an impression as of the door softly closing. In a moment a sudden thought has made her hustle aside the dogs, spring up, and fly out on the landing. She was right. Sure enough, Belinda is slowly descending the stairs, with her back to her sister. Even before she turns her face, which, in obedience to her junior's call, she does, Sarah knows somehow by the look of her back that she has heard. She is in walking dress, and is evidently making for the hall-door.

"Are you going out?" asks Sarah, with a face and voice as guilty as if she herself, and not her grandmother, had been the author of the ill-natured remarks so unfortunately overheard.

"Yes."

"To-day?" shivering.

"Yes."

"Alone?"

"Yes."

"Walking?"

"No."

"In a hansom?"

"Yes."

"Where are you going?" cries Sarah, with uncomfortable curiosity following her sister, who has already resumed her downward progress.

"I am going to the National Gallery to meet Mr. Forth."

"To the National Gallery? why cannot he come here?"

"Because, unfortunately, there is hardly so fine a collection of pictures here as there," replies Belinda disagreeably; "he wishes to show me a particular picture of the early Italian school."

A cold apprehension steals over Sarah.

"Do not go!" she cries impulsively, catching her sister's hands; "I am sure his picture is as little worth seeing as himself. Let him wait. Come back to the fire."

But Belinda resolutely draws her hands away and opens the street-door.

"I am glad to be—for at all events a couple of hours—'out of the way,'" she says icily.

As Sarah, discomfited, climbs the stairs again, she winks away something very like a small tear from her jovial blue eye.

The light is dull. The short afternoon already shows signs of waning. In the National Gallery, strolling about its handsome, all but empty rooms, is the usual sprinkling of odds and ends that represents the daily quota of art-lovers supplied by London from its four millions: two or three mal-peigné artisans; three or four ill-dressed women; a child or two. No better meeting-place could be found for any two people who wish to converse undisturbed, but have no reason to avoid their fellow-creatures' eyes. Under this head come the two persons who have so long been standing before a well-known Hobbema (the Giotto, which was the ostensible cause of their meeting, has been already inspected). A passer-by might presume that they were exhaustively criticising each individual beauty, but in point of fact one does not see the picture at all, and the other thinks that she does not. In after days, however, she finds that she must have done, so plainly comes out, printed on her mind, the impress of that long, long, long straight road, going away, away; of those great, tall, wayside poplars, with their perspective of lengthy stems, their high, scant heads raised loftily into the pale sky—such slight, gray-green heads, each one with a different character about it; of the man walking along the road to the distant red-roofed Dutch village. It has seemed to Belinda as if that man must reach the village before the Professor has finished his slow speech; but he is not yet there, and the Professor has ended. For he has spoken, and not Greek. And now Belinda is speaking. Her eyes are fixed still with a sort of glassiness on the cool and tranquil canvas of the long-dead master; and the poplars seem almost to sway to her breath. Her voice is steady and quiet, though hard.

"I am very glad of what you say as to personal affection having no part in your motives for asking me to marry you; you do not want—love," she makes a hardly perceptible pause before pronouncing the word, "and I have none to give; so at all events we start fair."

He makes a sort of gesture of assent.

"I distrust, and have cause for distrusting professions of affection," he answers dryly.

A certain flavor of rancor in his tone tells his hearer that he is thinking of her sister, and a trivial passing wonder crosses her mind as to how far Sarah had carried her nefarious simulation of an unlikely passion. Never has it seemed so unlikely as at this moment.

"All that I ask, all that I wish to obtain is an intelligent sympathetic companion."

"Sympathetic!" she repeats reflectively; "I am not sympathetic; I should be deceiving you if I were to let you suppose that I am: no! let us be sure that we understand each other; I have as little sympathy to give as I have—love!"

Again that slight hesitation.

"Possibly!" he answers, with a stiff impatience, looking rather annoyed at her opposition; "on my side I think it right to tell you of what you may perhaps be already aware, that the press of my occupations and the condition of my health forbid my indulging in many amusements enjoyed by other persons, but from which I shall be compelled to require you, as well as myself, to abstain."

"I do not want amusements!" replies Belinda gloomily; "amusements do not amuse me. I want occupation; can you give me plenty of that?"

His face unbends with a slight smile.

"I think I can promise you that in the life you will share with me, you will find no lack of that. My mother—"

"Your mother!" repeats Belinda, brusquely; "she is still alive then?"

"She is still spared to me," replies he piously; but a tone in his voice, striking upon her fine ear, tells her that he would not have quarreled with the Will of Heaven, had he not been so successful in keeping awhile "one parent from the skies."

"She must be very old," says Belinda thoughtfully, not reflecting on the unflattering inference to be drawn from this remark.

He assents: "She is somewhat advanced in years."

Belinda is silent for a moment or two. Her eyes are still vacantly fastened on the Hobbema; and a vague, absent wish to be walking with that man along that quiet road to that red village is playing about the surface of her preoccupied mind.

"Is she—" she begins, and then breaks off.

Across her memory have darted various facts communicated by Sarah about her future mother-in-law; facts of a not altogether satisfactory complexion; something about her being out of her mind, and never ceasing asking questions.

"Is she—" It is so difficult to word it civilly; "doting," "imbecile," "off her head"—she tries them all, but none sounds polite enough. "Is she" (she has it at last) "in full possession of her faculties?"

He hesitates a moment.

"She is somewhat deaf."

"Is her sight good?"

"I regret to say that it is almost gone."

"But she keeps her faculties? her mind?" pursues Belinda persistently.

"Her intellect is not what it was!" he answers, so shortly that Belinda feels that it is impossible to pursue her catechism further.

And, indeed, why should she? Has not the tone of his answers sufficiently proved to her that, for once in her life, Sarah had spoken unvarnished truth?

"My mother's bodily health is excellent," he continues presently; "I only wish that my own constitution were half as vigorous as hers; but her infirmities are such as to need a great deal of loving care: more," with a sigh, "than I am able to spare from my own avocations!"

Belinda is silent, drawing the obvious but not particularly welcome inference that the loving care is henceforth to be given by her.

"I am not naturally fond of old people," she says slowly. "I have been very little thrown with them; the only old person whom I know intimately, granny, is a great deal younger in herself than I am. I will be as kind as I can to your mother, but that is not the sort of occupation I meant; I meant," turning her restless large look away from the restful picture to his face, at which she has hitherto hardly glanced—"I meant something that would fill the mind—some hard study!"

"There is nothing that I am aware of, to prevent your pursuing any line of study you may choose to select," he answers, rather pettishly.

"And you think that the taste—the zest for it will certainly come—certainly?" pursues she eagerly. "Did you ever know a case of its failing? I must not deceive you; it has not come to me yet; I take no pleasure in learning; I think that I have as little real aptitude for study as" (Sarah, she is going to say, but stops in time)—"as the veriest dunce. But you think that I shall succeed if I persevere, do you not?" (plying him both with her feverish questions, and with the plaintive importunity of her eyes); "that perseverance must bring success to any one, however moderately bright. I know, of course"—humbly—"that I am not more than very moderately bright."

"You have a good average intelligence," he answers dryly; "it would be flattery to imply that you have more!"

"Of course, of course!" she rejoins, meekly acquiescing in this lover-like expression of partiality; and then there is silence again.

It is broken by Professor Forth. It would not have been broken by Belinda. She is dreamily walking again along Hobbema's straight Dutch road. Would the village be at all like Wesenstein when she reached it?

"I suppose," he says ceremoniously, "that there will be no objection to my calling to-morrow morning to announce to your grandmother the step that we propose taking; I am, of course, not aware whether or no she will be likely to oppose it."

"Not she!" answers Belinda, leaping back from dreamland, and breaking into a hard laugh; "she will be delighted to be rid of me."

"And—and your sister?" says he, with that same slight resentful difficulty which he always finds in mentioning Sarah; "will she, too, be delighted to be rid of you?"

"N—o, I think not!" answers Belinda slowly. "She would be perfectly justified if she were, for I have done my best of late to embitter her life; but no, I think not; by-the-by," looking up and speaking with a quick animation that contrasts with her late sarcastic indifference, "I must stipulate that you will allow her to visit me. You do not bear malice to her," she adds naively, "for—for what happened formerly?"

"I am not likely to bear malice," he answers with an arid smile, "for a course of action for which I at least, as it turns out, have so much reason to be thankful."

"That is right," she answers carelessly, passing by his stiff politesse; "then I think that is all. I think there is nothing more to say, is there?"

She speaks with the same unemotional business air as if she were concluding the purchase of a piece of land, or of some yards of cloth. The room is, at the moment, empty of any one but themselves. It is near closing-time, and the sparse visitors are trailing off. There is nothing to hinder a lover-like parting embrace between the two persons who have just engaged to pass their lives together. But the possibility of this never once crosses Belinda's mind, not even when her newly-betrothed steps a pace nearer to her, and says, in a voice through which rather more of human emotion than she has ever before heard in it pierces:

"You must allow me to repeat the expression of my gratification—of my thanks!"

"What for?" she asks, piercing him with the direct look of her icy eyes. "It is a mere matter of business that we have been transacting. You want a secretary, housekeeper, nurse for your mother; I want a home of my own, and a 'guide, philosopher and friend,' " laughing harshly. "I see no room for thanks on either side!"

To such a speech what rejoinder is there to make? He makes none.

"I may as well go home now," she says, in the same cool, matter-of-fact tone as before; "any further arrangements that there are to make may be made when you come to-morrow. You ask at what hour? At whatever hour best suits your convenience—early or late, it is indifferent to me which. I must ask you to call a hansom for me."

As they emerge from the building they find that rain is falling, a sleety rain to which the undecided snow has turned. It beats in her face as she walks down the steps; she does not take the trouble to run in order to escape it; she would as soon be wet as dry. It drives in upon her even in the hansom, when she has refused to allow the glass to be lowered. One can get very fairly well soaked in a hansom if one goes the right way to work. And all along sleety Pall Mall, all the sleety way home, she is pestered with the sight, the smell, almost the feel, of the wood at Wesenstein!

"Granny," says Belinda, entering the drawing-room, walking straight up to Mrs. Churchill and standing before her, not allowing her attention to be distracted even by the wagging of three kind tails, distinctly addressed to her, "you and Sarah may begin to pack your boxes at once; you may be off to Monaco as soon as you please; I shall be 'out of the way!'"

Mrs. Churchill lifts her eyes, in which is none of their usual frisky light, and fixes them coldly on her tall young granddaughter, standing pale and severe before her. She has always thought Belinda too tall; it strikes her more forcibly than ever now, as she sees her towering majestically above her. Belinda is too everything, except amusing.

"Are you hinting of Waterloo Bridge, by way of improving our spirits?" she asks sarcastically.

Mrs. Churchill is not in her playfullest mood, by which, almost as much as by her large lawn caps, she is known to an admiring public. The weather; the fact that several tiresome persons and not a single pleasant one have been to call; the consciousness of guilt toward Belinda—a consciousness not quite stifled indeed, but diverted into the channel of anger by the smart and in fact unmeasured rebukes she has had to submit to from Sarah—all, all combine to rob her of her usual suavity. Sarah's rebukes, indeed, would have led to a quarrel could she afford to quarrel with Sarah, but she cannot. Upon her hangs too much of the ease and diversion of her life. But there is no such motive to prevent her quarreling with Belinda, and she feels that to do so would be a pleasant relief.

"Waterloo Bridge!" repeats Belinda, with a momentary want of comprehension; then, "Oh, I see! No; there are other modes of being out of the way beside death."

"Perhaps you mean to announce to us your approaching marriage," suggests the old lady ironically.

"You have saved me the trouble," answers the girl curtly, sitting down as she speaks and beginning to unfasten her cloak, whose warmth the hot and scented room begins to make oppressive.

"You are going to be married?" cries the old lady, jumping actively up, and running toward her; ennui, ill-humor and sarcasm together racing away out of her voice, and making place both in it and in her sparkling eyes for a delightful excitement. "You do not say so! My dear child, you have taken us by surprise! I do not know when I have been so pleased!"

"Do not be in too great a hurry!" interrupts Belinda coldly. "Before you express any more pleasure, you had better hear who it is whom I have promised to marry."

"I was just going to ask, of course. Who is it? My dear child, I cannot tell you how intriguée I am to know," running swiftly over in her mind the list of Belinda's somewhat shadowy admirers, all of them kept so rigorously at bay that it would have seemed impossible that any one of them could have approached within sight of love-making.

"It is Professor Forth!"

Mrs. Churchill's jaws drop; the dimpling smiles—she still has the remnants of an old dimple or two—vanish from her cheek. For several moments she is totally incapable of speech; and even at the end of them is only able to gasp out the incoherent words:

"Professor Forth! What are you talking about? Nonsense! Impossible!"

"If you disbelieve me," says Belinda quietly, "you had better ask him. He is coming to-morrow to inquire whether you can spare me. I told him that I thought you could."

"Professor Forth!" repeats Mrs. Churchill, gradually but slowly regaining the possession of her senses. "I cannot think what has happened to the girls; first Sarah and then you. You must be bewitched!"

"I do not think that he has used any magic," rejoins Belinda, still with that pallid composure of hers. "The matter lies in a nut-shell: he wants a wife, and I want a—" "husband" she is going to say, but something in the employ of the word in such a connection strikes her as shocking and impossible. She leaves her sentence forever unfinished.

"Well, 'tous les goûts sont respectables,' I suppose," rejoins Mrs. Churchill with a cynical shrug.

"To what are you applying that lying pet maxim of yours, my old friend?" asks Sarah playfully, coming suddenly into the room, rubbing her little cold hands and approaching her grandmother with a conciliatory air.

She feels a vague relief in seeing that Belinda is at home again. Neither answers; Belinda, because she has no wish to rob her grandmother of the pleasure of communicating her piece of intelligence; Mrs. Churchill, because a remnant of hurt dignity ties the tongue which she is longing to unloose.

"To what or whom are you applying it?" repeats Sarah more sharply, glancing suspiciously from one to the other as she speaks.

"To Belinda," replies the older woman, unable any longer to refrain herself. "I do not know how you will like being supplanted, but she has just been informing me, as you once before did, that Professor Forth is to be my grandson."

"He is not!" cries Sarah loudly and angrily, turning scarlet. "Belinda," taking her sister by the shoulder and rudely shaking her, "why do you not speak? why do you not contradict her? why do you allow her to say such things about you? It is not true! Say that it is not true; it is only a canard. You have been saying it only to tease her; say that it is not true!"

"Why should it not be true?" asks Belinda, turning her lovely cold face and her gloomy eyes up toward Sarah.

The latter's hand drops nerveless from her sister's shoulder, and she steps back a pace or two.

"Then it is true!" she says, horrified.

"One would hardly imagine from your manner that you yourself had once been engaged to him," returns Belinda dryly; "and yet I believe that it was so."

"More shame for me," cries the other violently; "but I will do myself the justice to say that I never had the most distant intention of marrying him."

"There we differ then," says Belinda, slowly rising, and walking with her cloak over her arm to the door, "for I have every intention of marrying him; and so, granny," turning as she reaches it and calmly facing them both, "as I began by saying, you may pack your trunks for Monaco as soon as you please."

"How tiresomely she harps upon that string!" cries Mrs. Churchill peevishly; the more peevishly for the pricks that her conscience, albeit a tough one, is giving her.

"It is all your doing," says Sarah morosely, viciously rattling the fire-irons and boxing the dogs' ears; "you have driven her to it; sooner or later I knew that you would!"

"Pooh!" replies the other crossly: "she is not so easily driven or led either. If it were for her happiness," with a little pious parental air, "I cannot say that I should much regret her marriage; and if it does really come off—it is a shocking thing, of course, such an amant pour rire, but she seems bent upon it; and if it does really come off," the natural frisky light reilluminating her eyes, "why then, my dear child, there is in point of fact nothing to keep us from the South!"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

OVER THE WAY.

THE skies are gray, and o'er my head
I hear the patt'ring raindrops fall,
And in the chimney ghostly tones
Of nuns remorseful seem to call.
And I am scribbling for my bread,
But often eyes unruly stray
To windows high above the street
Where lives my neighbor o'er the way.

A pretty winsome lass she is—
A tender heart hath she, I ween,
For every morning on her sill
The sparrow's breakfast have I seen.
And by that sill she's sitting now;
Satins and silks and tinsels gay
Surround her while the needle flies—
What fascination o'er the way!

But when the evening comes, I know,
No lamp will light my lady's room,
And I, neglectful of my book,
Will sadly watch the gath'ring gloom,
And long to see her where she is—
A player-queen in fine array.
Art restless 'neath her gilded crown,
My little neighbor o'er the way?

When clad in gingham, can she guess,
Playing her morning's homely part,
She has an audience whose applause
Splits not his gloves but rends his heart?
For who she is I cannot tell.
And what I am she cannot say—
My little saint, wilt thou e'er know
Thy John-a-dreams across the way?

SOME PRANDIAL OBSERVATIONS ON "CULTURE."

THE younger members of the company, including Mr. Green, the botanist, and Professor Hardshell, of the theological academy—both devoted specialists in their respective lines—were clearly of the opinion that special culture was all-important. But the Judge maintained a dignified silence until the substantial courses were disposed of, and the tenor of the observations began to indicate a dearth of further contributions to the subject. This was usually the point where the Judge liked to take up the thread of a flagging discourse and deliver judgment, as it were, ore rotundo.

"According to a certain school of philosophers," he began, "I suppose we might call them 'gastronomers,' 'man is what he eats;' and therein lies one phase of culture, and a principle of vital importance to whoever superintends the family dinners. Observation justifies the remark also that 'man is how he eats.' There is no truer gauge of a man's calibre than the capacity of his mouth and his manner of filling it.

"He who is hasty and indiscriminate is, ten to one, a one-sided man, pursuing his hobby of business or pleasure in a blind, unsatisfactory way, incapable of appreciation or sympathy with other efforts or relations than his own. He shovels in his fuel as an engine-stoker feeds his furnace, intent only on maintaining a certain amount and pressure of vitality for driving work. Pancks, the bustling collector of Bleeding Heart Yard, is a type of the class:

"No flowers bloom for him. The delicate fragrance of music, or poetry, or human sympathy, is utterly wasted on his barren soul. If another's misfortune makes any impression on him, it is only to feed his selfish vanity by the comparison. Such a soul, we may be sure, is devoid of all the delicate coloring that refinement imparts. Who would think of discussing the higher aspirations of the inner life with a man who habitually spills soup upon his shirt-front and eats with his knife? Or expect to find in him those subtle perceptions of moral obligation, which, in all right living, supplement the legal code? He looks at life through a smoked glass, which brings sun and flower and diamond-sparkle to the same dull hue.

"But such a nature is not without its compensations. If he cannot fully enjoy the sun's majestic splendor, he is, at least, not dazzled by its brilliancy. If he is not so keenly alive to the higher enjoyments of life, he is likewise spared much of its suffering and disappointment. Only those who are capable of being lifted to the heights of exaltation can reach the lowest depths of despair. The shafts of envy, hatred, malice and all uncharitableness glance harmlessly off his armor of indifference. Indeed, I have sometimes thought that, next to genius, a thick skin is the best patrimony a man can have.

"A gentleman calling one day on the Confederate General, Joe Johnston, at Atlanta, Georgia, said to him, concluding some rather slighting remark concerning our beloved Thomas, 'the rock of Chickamauga,' 'Well, I must admit that he possessed one good quality—he never knew when he was whipped.' 'I think you hardly do him justice,' was the noble reply. 'The truth is, Thomas always knew when he wasn't whipped.' Now, the mistake which this gentleman made is one we are all apt to make at times. Imbecility and power often wear the same aspect to the casual observer, and we not infrequently mistake indifference for self-poise, and vice versa. 'Tom' Corwin—I mean our own great statesman—used to say that 'wisdom is nothing; solemnity everything;' and Emerson somewhere says that the world will generally receive a man at his own estimate of himself, which is much the same thing, for a man who really looks wise generally believes himself to be so. And this is true of these times at least; for wisdom now-a-days, as Sancho Panza says of a woman's virtue, 'lies in the reputation of it,' and mere dullness often give a man the reputation of wisdom, by making him insensible to the shafts of criticism. And so, not to wander too far, mediocrity has its advantages in some points of view. It is like the interlacing grasses covering a meadow-pool, concealing the shallow depths beneath; or, like the feathery covering of an amphibious bird, shedding the world's wrath as a duck's back sheds water."

The Judge pausing at this point, Mr. Hardshell propounded the query, "Whether, since our enjoyment of life, according to the views propounded, depends upon our capacity for enjoyment, we might not, by limiting rather than expanding our faculties, ultimately reach a point where, on the whole, we should have more net enjoyment than could be attained by the opposite course?"

"You will find a logical difficulty," responded the Judge, "in pointing out the stopping-place, especially in view of the advanced theory that man's intellectual development is the result of gradual evolution from the lowest forms of animal instinct. It is clear that if we could cultivate backward, we might finally reach a point where we wouldn't know enough to go in when it rained; which would add materially to our discomfort unless we could also retrograde physically to an amphibious state, where we might prefer 'ours with a little water.'"

"But, returning to the original point, take another phase of culture, and behold its representative, who tucks his napkin under his chin and feasts as though it were the chief business of his life. See how carefully he selects his fare! With what dignity and importance he chooses the choicest viands, and bestows the utmost powers of his mind upon the salad dressing! Could society exist without such persons? Certainly not: who would look after the cooks and keep up the standard of the cuisine?"

"I remember once being suddenly transplanted from a rude campaigning life in Georgia to the dining parlors of the Fifth Avenue Hotel, in New York. I was sunburned and swarthy, and had exchanged my dusty uniform for an ill-fitting civilian's dress of a style then out of vogue. It is perhaps needless to say that I was younger then than now, and more impressible.

"I was embarrassed. I felt that I was misunderstood, as I walked through the bewildering wilderness of silks and laces, rare exotics and flashing jewels, and intuitively perceived, without beholding, the curious looks cast at me by their owners. Even the stately waiters, in immaculate broadcloth and white kids, looked upon me, I felt, with pitying contempt. I was crushed. I felt like a man arraigned for another's crime, with no opportunity to explain. My honorable uniform I had put off, that I might not be confounded with those carpet knights who affected city warfare in those troublous times, and had stepped into the guise of a country bumpkin. I was a nobody—one of hoi polloi amid the seats of the patricians. In vain I strove to hide my confusion behind the bill of fare. The first dash at it betrayed me into greater difficulty. It was impossible, under the cold eyes of the implacable attendants, to make a judicious selection. They seemed to say to me, 'We know perfectly well that you want corned beef and cabbage, and greens and carrots and hash; but no doubt you will pretend to be above such things here.' I was in a state of indignant despair.

"Fortunately, at the moment, a friend caught sight of me and came to my table. Of all persons in the world he was the one to guide me safely through my present embarrassment. With what relief did I accept his aid, and how skillfully did he pilot me through the intricacies of that bill of fare, pointing out the Scylla of unseasonable viands on the one hand, and the Charybdis of hotel economies on the other! How adroitly did he elevate me into the position of a distinguished warrior by his questions about our intimate mutual friends, Grant, Sherman, and the rest—questions so loudly put that all in the vicinity could hear!

"Then, too, with what easy grace did he discuss the wine, the cooking, the seasoning, the pastry, until I had warmed into ease and self-confidence under his superior knowledge and tact; so that, at last, when he had gone through the elaborate preparation for the salad in a most impressive manner, I felt it due to my prospects in life to partake of it, notwithstanding my abhorrence of sweet oil. I did so, and felt like throwing up—my commission."

A warning glance from the Judge's wife at this point checked the rising humor which showed itself in a quiet twinkle in the corners of his eyes, and he "made a motion," as Uncle Remus says, to stop, but the rest of the company insisted upon a continuance.

"But seriously, now," continued the Judge, "would you expect to find breadth of intellect or true nobleness of character in a man who gives himself up to elegant feasting? There is no tyrant so exacting as one's body, if one weakly yields to its demands. It is astonishing how its necessities multiply, if encouraged by indulgence; and one who is occupied in thoughts of mere creature comfort has really no time to cultivate a nobler growth. Such things entail a mere vegetable existence, and it is safe to grade low a man who always remembers what he had for dinner or takes pleasure in gloating over the anticipation of what he is to have.

"Plato somewhere says, 'The greatest burden and calamity to the soul is the body, from which she cannot disengage herself but by such a wise use of reason as shall wean and separate her from all corporeal passions.'

"So Cato, the Censor, in refusing the proffered friendship of an epicure, said: 'I could not live with a man whose palate has quicker sensations than his heart.' And, while upon this classic ground, there comes to mind what Cicero says of Cæsar: 'I perceive an inclination for tyranny in all he projects and executes; but, on the other hand, when I see him adjusting his hair with so much exactness, and scratching his head with one finger, I can hardly think that such a man can conceive so vast and fatal a design as the destruction of the Roman Commonwealth.'

"True, this is in the nature of an exception to the general rule; and there are undoubtedly many others in the ranks, especially of military heroes, where pride of appearance and the art of personal adornment are cultivated as an important element of character, for obvious reasons. Thus Alcibiades, as we all know, was celebrated not only for his great military achievements, but also for his effeminacy in dress, and the insolent luxury and profusion of his living. He it was who had the deck of his galley cut away in order that his couch, swung upon girths, might be the softer; and carried in battle a shield of gold, with a device representing Cupid bearing thunderbolts.

"We speak of one who possesses a perfectly balanced culture, as a 'well-rounded character;' and for purposes of illustration we may consider human individualities as spheres—large or small, with reference to their natural capacity, and more or less complete in their circumstances, as their general culture is more or less perfect and 'well rounded.' So we roll onward through life, evenly or not, as our peripheries are continuous or broken—and some of us 'wobble' badly.

"Now, in this view, the great art of living is to keep our rounded and perfect sides toward the world, and our defective sides in the shadow like the moon at the full. If one has the art to do that, he may be only half a circle and rank with the wisest and best among us—provided only that he must not turn around and bring his shadowy side into the light of the world's gaze. Many of us, unfortunately, do that when we assume virtues which we have not in us—and I doubt not the ill-natured critic of this assembly—all critics are ill-natured—will point to this random discourse as a flagrant example."

And here again the Judge began to fold up his napkin, as if to retire from the field, but his auditors protested, and yielding with a good-natured shrug and a smile of complacent acquiescence, he continued:

"Then to return again to the original point—we are gradually approaching it—the two classes we have tested by our table observations comprise by far the larger proportion of society. The advocates of special culture—our distinguished brother, Mr. Green, will bear me out in this—will point to the law of the 'survival of the fittest,' and show the necessity of devoting all our powers to the cultivation of those faculties pertaining to the objects we select as our ultimate goal. They tell us that one-sided culture is a necessary condition of success in the struggle for intellectual existence; and triumphantly quote Agassiz as regretting, at the close of his glorious life, that he hadn't devoted himself exclusively to turtle-eggs, or something of the sort.

"Now this is very well in some aspects; a man at the bottom of a well can perhaps see farther into the sky than those who haven't any well to get into; but what's the use of shutting one's self out of sight of the beauty and knowledge which the rest of the universe contains, in order to peer a trifle farther into the unknown than our neighbors?

"The great pyramid at Ghizeh, which Piazzi Smith—the astronomer-royal of Scotland—considers the type and grand original of all the others, monumentalizing the scientific attainments of antiquity, has two straight channels leading from opposite sides diagonally through its massive courses of stone to a mysterious inner chamber. With such wonderful accuracy are these apertures channeled, that the observer, standing in this 'king's chamber,' so called, looks out through them at the sky as through a telescope. By astronomical calculation he ascertains that the axes of these channels, produced, intersect a meridian at points occupied some thousands of years ago by a certain member of the Pleiades constellation, famed in the traditional astronomy of Egypt, and the then polar star Draconis; whence the inference is drawn that the builders thus recorded in the eternal book of the universal firmament the exact date of construction, in a language only to be interpreted by the eye of Science.

"So, it seems to me, special culture tends oftentimes to wall one up within a mental structure where observations of life can be had only through fixed channels directed to one class of objects; and all the other grace and beauty, and knowledge and power, of intellectual research are invisible because outside that particular line of observation.

"I have in mind, as an example, a friend of high scholastic attainments in the dead languages. Sanscrit delights him; Greek roots are his constant joy. The more thoroughly defunct the language, the greater his living interest in it. The aim of his life is to produce a dictionary in some extremely dead tongue; and he will finish it probably when Mr. Dick completes his memorial with no allusion to Charles the First in it. The section of country where my friend lives (he teaches the young idea how to shoot in Greek and Hebrew in a college of a neighboring state) is a particularly interesting field for the naturalist, and, being something of a naturalist in an amateur way (my friend thinks me a 'natural,' no doubt), I sometimes visit him, and avail myself of the opportunity to gather specimens from the surrounding fields in my rambles. To him the gathering in of vile bugs and ugly rocks, flint implements of rude and savage races, and the mouldering bones of pristine herb-doctors, who never dreamed of such dry roots as delight my friend's mental palate, is a waste of time absolutely incomprehensible.

"Of course I don't tell my friend that he is one-sided in his culture. On the contrary, we often sit down over our pipes—my friend has that one redeeming vice—and discuss the force of Greek particles (albeit, I can't see a particle of force in them), and allow myself to be convinced, with a show of interest, that the study of Latin ought to precede that of the mother tongue in the infancy of the coming man; and that this ridiculous notion of Herbert Spencer's about substituting the facts of science for the intricacies of the classic languages as early disciplinary exercises for the juvenile mind, is nothing but history repeating itself in the advice of the fox who, having his own tail cut off, insisted that his brethren should also come to an untimely end, in order to be in the fashion.

"Then my friend, the learned professor, whose fondness for defunct things leads him to write several D's after his name—M. D., Ph. D., D. D.—(as the boy who 'missed' at the spelling-bee and blurted out his chagrin, 'If s-o-x don't spell "socks," what do it spell?' so I inquire, 'If D don't stand for "dead," what do it stand for?'), reads me the titles of his lectures. Here are specimen bricks: 'The end of all things the attainment of the classics;' 'Ancient languages the basis of all true culture;' 'No universal culture but what is based on the early Greek and Roman;' 'The true end of education is the discipline of the mind, not filling it with knowledge.'

"But why need I pursue the matter further? Of course it is well to be in earnest, to strive diligently, and to concentrate by at least an 'eight to seven' majority upon a fixed purpose in life; but to exclude all other culture is to bring us to the condition of monomaniacs. It is a pity we are not like those curious people visited by Gulliver, whose skulls had removable covers by which means the matter of brains could be regulated and equalized by scooping from one who has an excess into the head of another where a deficiency exists.

"Indeed, I am not sure after all but we would be really happier if some of these specialist monomaniacs (no offense, Brother Green,) had not advanced the standard of excellence quite 'so far. Time was when we used to enjoy a moderate performance on the piano, and when the 'Battle of Prague' was really something of a feat, if not a defeat; but nowadays, so cultivated has our own taste become through the advanced results of specialists gifted with dextrous digital muscles, that nothing short of Liszt's Rhapsodies or the late Richard Wagner's most abstruse compositions excites our interest, and we remember only with contempt the sweet melodies of the olden time.

"Why, only the other day I tried to get my wife to play for me a sweet old ballad, that in my early days was regarded as fine music, and she actually—" (here the Judge, evidently feeling the effect of the good wine and the comfortable dinner, began to grow confidential, and lowered his voice to escape the sharp ear of Mrs. Judge, who had retired with the ladies to an adjoining apartment)—"she actually turned up her nose to such a degree I am afraid it will never come—"

A sudden accident occurring at this moment, or as the Judge afterward put it, "being very much struck by a pretty woman who came into the room and carried him off vi et armis," he was unable to continue; and so what he would have said in conclusion must be left to the reader's imagination.

EYES VERSUS LIPS.

My lady's lips, so curved, so soft,
Have dealt to me a cruel "No";
Now shall I, thus denied and scoffed,
From out her beauteous presence go?
Not so—Proud lips, your lovely scorn
Within my breast shall plant no thorn,
Till deep I've gazed 'neath lashes black
Which hide her wondrous eyes from me,
And in response there flashes back
A glance, which shall my answer be.
Curved bows are lips whence arrows fly

To wound, to rend, mayhap to slay;
Deep wells are eyes where truth doth lie—
They will to me her heart betray.
Dark, tender eyes, your light denies
The proud lips' curve. Ah, rapture lies Within those pure, clear depths for me.
Nor snowy lid, nor jetty lash
Can longer hide the flow and flash
Of Love's tide welling full and free.
Red lips, to haughty mocking lent,
Kisses shall be your punishment.

FLOWER TALK—NEXT SUMMER'S GARDEN.

"I MUST have some flowers next summer," you say, looking out on snow-covered fields, or, it may be, roofs, and thinking of the long, warm days to come, full of sunshine and sweet smells; and thinking of the fragrance of the flowers the summer is to bring, you see a gay procession halting by your garden paths, and already, in your imagination, the flowers have come.

You hunt up some florist's advertisement and write for a catalogue. In a few days it comes, and you open it with a thrill of delight. What charming things our floral catalogues are getting to be, with their hundreds of fine engravings, and their splendor of color and artistic work! They are worthy a place on the centre-table with the finest holiday book.

By-and-by, when you have an hour all to yourself, you take your catalogue, a piece of paper and a pencil, and sit down by the fire and think you will make out a list of the few flowers you want. The few? Was there ever anything so pleasant, yet so perplexing, as the consultation of a florist's catalogue, and making out therefrom a list of flowers? You read of this one, and say mentally, "I must have that!" and write its name down on your paper. Then a little farther down the page you find another that you "must have," and down goes the name of it. So, on every page you find something described in a way that makes you certain it is just a trifle more desirable than anything before it, and you write it down on your list. So you proceed until the end of the tantalizing, bewitching catalogue is reached, and, with a little sigh of regret and pleasure, you close it and give attention to your list. Alas! you know at once, when you come to look at it, that you cannot have half the beautiful things whose names you have written down. No, nor a quarter of them. If you were to attempt to grow them, and grow them well, the list you have made out includes enough to occupy your entire time during the summer. If you are a true lover of flowers you will not care to plant any that must be neglected. So, with another little sigh, you think you will go over the list and strike out the least desirable kinds. But you don't know which those kinds are—you want them all! At last you put your list away for future revision, or thrust it into the fire. To-morrow you will go over the catalogue again, and confine your selection to few of the best kinds. And very likely you do this on the morrow, and for many days to come. You cannot make up your mind as to which are best and which you want most, for this flower or that is described so charmingly that you are certain it must be of remarkable beauty, and you can't help feeling that if you don't have it you will lose the very gem of the whole collection. If there were only a dozen or two kinds to choose from! But there are so many! To every lover of flowers, a florist's catalogue is a case of embarrassment of riches.

Perhaps I can help you out of your perplexity. The case stands like this: You have only a little space for flowers. You have not much time to devote to them. You have not had much experience in taking care of them.

Then you want such flowers as will give you, from the small space allotted to them, as large an amount of bloom as possible. These flowers must be such as do not require constant attention, and they must not be of the kinds which need coaxing.

I am taking it for granted that you love flowers for their own sakes, and not because they have a certain kind of popularity attached to them. Fashion's freaks extend to flowers, as well as other things, and this year the sunflower may be the favorite, while next year it may be entirely neglected and the poppy have the place of honor. With you and me these honors, born of caprice and whim, count for nothing. We will choose our flowers for the good qualities we know them to possess. Merit shall take precedence of everything else.

To begin with, let me give you this advice, the result of personal experience: Do not try to grow very many kinds, especially at first. It is always better to have a few, and those good ones, than many poorly-grown plants. A thrifty plant always gives satisfaction, while a bed full of neglected ones rouses a feeling of pity. A few, therefore, given all the attention they need, will be a source of pleasure and benefit. So be wise, and plant no more than you can take good care of. Concentrate your attention, and if you find from one season's experience that you can properly attend to more, next year you can extend the list. It is usually the case that the amateur florist attempts too much.

You do not want such flowers as are quite likely to give you disappointment or too much trouble. There are many very beautiful ones, which must be started in hotbeds, and reared very tenderly through the early stages of their existence, and even when they have reached the period when blossoms are to be expected, they are likely to fail. Too much rain or too little, too much sun or not enough of it, and the poor things languish out the summer and die, and you have had perhaps a dozen and perhaps not any blossoms from them. Therefore it is wisdom to select the hardier, more self-reliant kinds, which can be depended on to do their best under the circumstances. Of course the more favorable the circumstances are the better satisfaction they will give you, so you will see that much of the favorable result of your attempt at floriculture depends upon yourself.

There is really no reason why you should not succeed if you are in earnest. The first step in spring will be to have your garden-beds spaded up. The soil should be made mellow to the depth of at least a foot. If the spade goes to the depth of eighteen inches all the better, for in mellow earth the roots can go deep in the time of drouth. If the soil is not rich, make it so. Your flowers must have plenty of nourishing food. They must eat and drink the same as we do, and we must have good food and plenty of it to do our best. It is so with them. Your beds should be spaded up and left to mellow in the sunshine. Before seed is sown, you must be careful to pulverize the soil. The best thing I have ever used to do this with is an iron-toothed rake. Many seeds are so fine that a little clod covering them prevents their germinating successfully. It is better when sowing seeds to sift earth over them, for thus all danger of burying the delicate things under too much soil is avoided.

No seed should be put into the ground before warm weather is an assured fact. Cold nights and chilly days will prevent the germination of many of them. We do not gain anything by being in too great a hurry in making our gardens. It is well to remember the old adage, and make haste—and the garden—slowly.

You must begin weeding as soon as you can distinguish between weeds and flowers. The great secret of success in growing flowers well—and, after all, it is no secret—is in keeping the beds clean and the soil open and mellow. We see persons starting out in a floricultural way every spring with great enthusiasm. They make their beds and sow their seeds. By the time the beds need weeding their enthusiasm is at a low ebb, and the weeds get the start of the flowers. Though here and there one may make such a brave stand for itself that the weeds yield it a corner out of compulsion, as we sometimes see delicate natures obliging stronger ones to give them room by sheer force of character, the attempt at floriculture will be a failure.

If a person loves flowers, he will take good care of them, for his friendship will not allow him to neglect them.

But we were to select some flowers for next summer's garden, and, instead, I have been giving you a lesson in making that garden. Well, the advice will not come amiss, and in our next talk about flowers we will make up our list of such kinds as I am confident you will do well with.

EBEN E. REXFORD.

THE HOUSEHOLD—DOMESTIC SERVICE AGAIN.

It is evident, from growing difficulties in this branch of the household, that, sooner or later, in self-defense, if not in wisdom, domestic service must be organized anew. It is a strange and sorrowful fact that those principles of fraternity which eighteen Christian centuries have seen stamped upon the creeds of the proudest nations have generally failed to become living truths. No practical solution of the problems under consideration, consequently, has yet been reached by those who are considered to stand upon the highest plane of religious civilization.

A few women, full of gentleness and tact, and having a delightful faculty for letting things glide along without close observation, manage to oil their domestic machinery so that others seldom suspect the improvidence or shiftlessness which must obtain therein. A few more keep the bearings taut with iron hands, but their awed domestics take ample revenge when these dominant minds are away from the work. On the whole, we must sadly acquiesce in the truth that there are grievous mistakes and wrongs in social life, which require religious consecration to the good of our fellows, as well as justice and common sense, to meet and overcome.

We will face the situation dispassionately, without yielding to prejudice or custom, if possible. It is needless to rant at the wrongs perpetrated on the employer on the one hand or the employed on the other. No governments are yet organized on strictly Christian principles, nor can they be till woman's nature finds authoritative expression for its finest spiritual inspiration toward the weak and lowly, the ignorant and debased. Hers is the insight, the tenderness, the power of penetrating to the very marrow of life, without which man's most brilliant schemes are hollow and superficial. And no great governmental improvements can be made unless based upon household improvements, and these again upon the unit of society, the individual.

We are often reminded of the natural law that crude races bend before more highly developed intelligences. But it is pure selfishness which is willing to make use of that stalwart, untrained strength and not win it to a higher conception of righteousness; to make the contact a means of helpfulness and good; to become a wise providence to those whom the exigencies of life have placed in the neighborhood or under the same roof. In our changeable social order of the new state of things we have no precedent to look back upon, but we are sure that in conscientiously applying to conduct those universal truths which are the common property of all ages and peoples, we cannot go far wrong. Whether it runs parallel with, or counter to, our cherished views, it is useless to battle with a current which the flood of years only accelerates. And we must reverently feel that its impetus is owing to an inherent Divine energy implanted in the soul of man, which, in the procedure of generations, must bring to constantly finer and nobler issues the social order in which each bears his allotted part. We must move with the stream of those ever-flowing currents which tend steadily, though slowly, toward order, harmony and goodness. To swim against them is to exhaust force in efforts worse than vain. Our main concern is to find that point on the moral horizon toward which they flow, and then bend our wills and energies thitherward.

Meantime, it certainly takes all our patience and gentleness in order to deal with the servants of the present day. If she be native born her mother or grandmother landed at Castle Garden, which, even to this hour, is full of just such bewildered beldames, fresh exiled from squalid homes. Picturesque enough at a little distance to furnish fine effects for the artist, the glamour vanishes outside of canvas. The trials they bring are great, and are felt by themselves as well as their employers. From the mud-walled huts of Erin, where the lass grew barefoot and unkempt, dirty and happy, on potatoes and buttermilk; from the low, thatched cottages of Scotland, where life is nourished on oatmeal porridge; from the fiord-bounded shores of Scandinavia, where peasants stolidly munch their black bread all the year round; from Germany and France, with their diet of cabbage and soup maigre; from the distant shores of China, where hordes of almond-eyed natives subsist each on a handful of rice per day; from the languor and indolence of the cotton-fields, we are flooded with a mixed variety of servitors, having every variety of habit and adaptability.

It speaks well, indeed, for its vitality that America has been able to absorb, healthily, such a compound into her veins, and yet welcome more. It is a matter of wonder that no greater ferment follows. When she shall have settled down in maturity, when her elements have become homogeneous, what courage and generosity, what fervor and sweetness may be mingled in her brimming cup of life!

With the antecedents of our domestic servants, we can only wonder that so many of them become intelligent, faithful and generally useful. For we cannot forget that the poor girl, through her progenitors and in her own life, has wrestled with the principalities and powers of darkness, in the shape of poverty, oppression, poor food, ignorance and superstition. She is unused to those refinements which, necessary to her employers, are meaningless to herself. As her senses are untrained to distinguish fitness and harmony, so is her moral nature unused to nice perceptions of justice and obligation. The natural consequence of Old World life tends toward servility and treachery, the reaction of which is impertinence and brutality. And yet how many times has she risen far above those depressing causes of which she is the innocent subject, and exhibited qualities so sublime and precious that they would adorn the diadem of a queen!

We introduce this crude, unawakened nature into our kitchen. The cooking-range is as little understood as a steam engine by a child. Taken from the lawless freedom of her native bogs, she is penned between kitchen floor and ceiling, with a quantity of what seems unnecessary implements and materials, out of which to compound dishes whose very names are mysteries. She has left behind the indolent days, with their simple unthrift, to learn the alphabet of a new existence. Even her mathematical faculties are sorely taxed in trying to set a table straight. Who ever saw a daughter of Erin place mats and dishes in exact order? They generally take the angles of wind-strewn wrecks or drifts after a high tide.

It is a curious fact, too, that while labor-saving machinery increases, work in no wise decreases. A branch lopped off in one direction sprouts vigorously in another.

In fact, a certain amount of drudgery must be done in every department of labor. It is a necessary concomitant of housekeeping, especially. It is a daily grind, and often the creaking is a hideous din. Every day the fire must be tended, the food prepared and cooked, the table must be set, and afterward the dishes washed and restored to their shelves, and the pots, pans and kettles cleansed. Every day dust and litter accumulates, and that household sceptre, the broom, is flourished from attic to cellar. Often there is paint to scrub, silver to polish, windows to rub, blinds to clean and piazzas and flagging to sweep. There are numerous closets and store-rooms to explore and cleanse, carpets and rugs to beat, clothing to brush, moths to exterminate, and also a variety of other unclassified labors. Every seven days there is washing to be done—not of Bridget's few coarse duds, but fine napery and bedding, unlimited towels, and frequently underclothing dainty enough to have figured in the trousseau of a princess—for our American-born sister dearly loves to see her raiment of the finest of linen.

All this drudgery is repugnant to a volatile and versatile people like the Americans. Especially is this the case where there is mental acumen and ambition and the spirit remains unbroken.

This repugnance is to drudgery, we observe, and not to labor itself. Activity and energy are triumphant when they can find vent in creative skill. The child toils happily in building his block-house or mud fortifications, and the man equally enjoys his constructive skill upon more enduring materials. But the drudgery of the kitchen is neither creative, permanent or inspiring. It takes something of a philosopher to discern the subtle ties binding these petty labors to their end, the well-being of all the inmates of the household.

In consideration, then, of all the circumstances of the housekeeper in relation to domestic service, two questions force themselves upon our attention, both on the score of self-protection and ethics:

How shall we reduce household drudgery to its minimum?

How lessen the friction of that which remains?

"WILL you please tell me what is proper for a lady to do when she is serenaded?" L. D."

Ans.—In romances it is usually written, "The curtains were seen to flutter and a white hand emerged and tossed down a rose." In real life the heroine generally sleeps through it, and, if she wakes, had usually better do nothing.

"Is the odor of cedar permanent?"—T. L. S."

Ans.—The pleasant odor of cedar, according to Mr. E. Lewis, appears to be as persistent as the wood itself. Slivers taken from white cedar stumps, found twelve feet under water at low tide near the Narrows in New York harbor, had the odor of the newly-grown wood, and a piece not more than twice the size of one's finger perceptibly scented a drawer for more than a year. "It is certain," says Mr. Lewis, "that the coast where the trees of which these are the stumps grew has since undergone a depression of eighteen to twenty feet, an event which may have occupied as many centuries."

"WHICH of the large cities of the world is the most healthful?"—C. M. R."

Ans.—It is not easy to say in general terms which of them is the most or the least healthful, but here are the latest figures: The largest mortality by any report received at the time of going to press is for Madrid, Spain: for the week ending January 7, an annual ratio of 47.9 per 1000. The smallest mortality by any report of a city of over 100,000 inhabitants is for Rochester, N. Y.: for the week ending February 3, an annual ratio of 10.3 per 1000.

TOMATO CREAM SOUP.—One large can of tomatoes, or one quart of fresh stewed ones; one pint of stock or of water, boiled with it one minute and rubbed through a sieve; one quart of milk, or half milk, half cream, heated separately; one tablespoonful of salt, one of sugar, half a tablespoonful of cayenne; thicken with half a cupful, otherwise three tablespoonfuls, of corn starch or flour with one of butter, rubbed to a cream together, with enough boiling soup added slowly to make it pour easily. Add the hot milk and serve at once.

BOILED HAM.—Soak over night in plenty of cold water; in the morning scrape and trim off all the hard black parts, scrubbing it well with a brush; put on to boil in cold water; let it heat gradually and allow half an hour to the pound; then take from the water, skin and sprinkle brown sugar over it; brown in the oven, basting it several times with a teaspoonful of sherry, and use cold or hot.

ROAST CHICKEN.—As in No. 37 of THE CONTINENT.

POTATOES FRIED WHOLE.—Boil potatoes as in No. 1 of THE CONTINENT, and when nearly done pour off the water and let them dry thoroughly; then drop them into boiling lard or olive butter and brown. Serve at once.

CAULIFLOWER.—As in No. 9 of THE CONTINENT.

SUCCOTASH.—Score the rows in half a dozen ears of sweet corn; scrape off the corn, add a pint of lima or any nice green bean, and boil one hour in one quart of boiling water, with one teaspoonful each of salt and sugar, and half a teaspoonful of pepper; let the water boil away to about a cupful; add a large spoonful of butter, and serve in a hot dish. Cream may be used instead of butter. Canned corn and dried lima beans soaked over night are nearly as good.

STEWED SWEETBREADS.—As in No. 28 of THE CONTINENT.

BROILED MUSHROOMS.—Peel off the upper skin of large fresh ones; sprinkle on salt and pepper and little dots of butter, and broil over a clear fire. Serve very hot.

RASPBERRY MERINGUE.—Make as in rule for Strawberry Meringue in No. 26 of THE CONTINENT.

BATTER PUDDING.—As in No. 24 of THE CONTINENT.

BANANA ICE.—Boil three pints of water and one quart of loaf sugar till reduced to little over a quart. Beat the whites of three eggs very stiff, and add the boiling syrup very slowly, beating smooth. Any fruit syrup may be added as flavor. Chop four bananas quickly, as they darken on exposure to air, and add to the mixture just before freezing, with a wineglass of rum if desired.

HELEN CAMPBELL.

THE Union League Club of New York lately commemorated the twentieth anniversary of its founding. The period covered by its existence is a most memorable one—1863 to 1883. Even the history of our land of miracles has no two decades to compare with those it spans. The continent doubly girdled with steel, the greatest rebellion known to history quelled, the conquered territory restored to automatic control, a subject-race relieved from bondage and admitted to an equal share in directing the common destiny, the principle of international arbitration practically established, a national debt of immense magnitude largely reduced and put in train for speedy payment, are some of the marvels of our history during this time. In all these movements, and in many more scarcely less important, the club has been an active and efficient worker. It has trained the best forces of the metropolitan life upon the thought of the nation, and been an active element in achieving magnificent results. All these things were dwelt upon at length by poet and orator, and the part of the club in these great events portrayed by each with deserved warmth and the eloquence for which their fame is ample guaranty. Perhaps the most noticeable and gratifying feature of the occasion was a representative New York merchant (the worthy son of one of her merchant princes who was even then, though all unknown to himself and others, at the gates of death) standing before the members of this honorable body, and in the midst of their exultation over the past record of the club, warning them that they would work irreparable shame to its history, and to the motives and memories of its founders, if they permitted its standard to be lowered to the level of mere social amenities and ordinary club frivolities. This warning in the mouth of any man on such an occasion would have been significant and noteworthy, but coming from the lips of William E. Dodge—now, alas! no longer to be written “junior”—it has a thousandfold more significance, showing, as it does, that neither wealth nor position nor business cares nor the temptation to indulgence can blot from the mind of the true American that care for the republic which was the animating impulse to the institution of the club, and has been the chief glory of its history. Well, indeed, will it be both for the club and the country if the younger members of the Union League shall heed this timely warning, and keep its future worthy of the past they were then met to celebrate. The work before the lover of his country to-day is as much greater than that which waited for the men of yesterday to perform as to-day is fuller and richer and greater than all the yesterdays.

IN the existing state of affairs in the South—that is, in the lately slave-holding states of the Union—there are no more hopeful indications than the establishment and seemingly assured prosperity of trade journals, which represent growing commercial interests, and the announcement of great industrial exhibitions. The Cotton Fair, near Atlanta, Georgia, in 1881, gave an impetus to the exposition idea which now bears fruit in congressional action favoring a World's Industrial Exhibition next year, which shall have cotton as its central motive. There is announced, moreover, a Southern Exposition, to be held at Louisville, Ky., beginning August 1st, proximo, and lasting one hundred days. Such exhibitions as these were never thought of in the old days, and if they had been thought of could not have been successfully carried out. Neither was there in those days any constituency for the support of such journals as Southern Industries, published at Nashville, Tennessee.

A Chat with our Readers.

THE CONTINENT started, under its present management, with the determination to present to its readers in a weekly form the peculiar features and attractions of the best monthly magazines. Its conductor set before him as exemplars the great monthlies of our neighboring city, because there were none elsewhere to compare with them in excellence. He has spared neither labor nor expense to achieve this result. Of course he could not expect, after one year of experience only, to rival in all things these great wonders of the world of periodical literature. In its line, THE CONTINENT was a pioneer. The attempt to embody the literary and artistic attractions of the modern monthly in weekly form had never before been made. It has labored hitherto under the difficulty of having its weekly parts compared with monthly issues. So, in a sort of self-defense, we have been compelled to put its weekly issues together in the form of a monthly part, that our brethren of the press might see what sort of a monthly THE CONTINENT would make, and the comparison at least be fairly made. The universal surprise with which the first of these (composed of the numbers for January) was received by the press of the country confirmed our belief that we had hardly received credit for what we had done. This monthly part contains one hundred and sixty pages—a number fully equal to any first-class monthly—while our larger page makes it equivalent in matter to something better than two hundred ordinary magazine pages. Its illustrations number just a hundred—considerably more than either of the great monthlies. We do not claim in one year to have outstripped, under the most disadvantageous circumstances possible to be conceived, those great New York monthlies, which have the advantage of many years of experiment, established organization, inherited patronage and unlimited capital; but we do claim that we have made a creditable showing for a “Philadelphia yearling,” as a New York friend jocosely denominates our effort, and have demonstrated beyond a peradventure that the weekly magazine is not only a possibility, but, as a Boston contemporary says, “nearer the trend and pulse of the age than any other.”

WE have had vexatious delays with our Year-Book and a great surprise with our little Memorandum-Book. Of the latter, our stock of nearly fifty thousand copies was exhausted almost before we had time to breathe, and we have thousands of orders waiting the new edition, which will probably be in hand about the time this reaches our readers. We shall distribute them, and if any call afterwards shall have to tell them they are too late. The Year-Book will be sent to all our subscribers, and we hope to receive from each one a ready response to the request it contains. It is one of those things which are troublesome to manufacture, as delay in seeming trifles blocks the whole work. They will be sent to subscribers only, and to them without application or request. If any bachelor should get one, we hope he will take it as another hint of the "one thing thou lackest."

THE time has come to THE CONTINENT that must come to all periodical publications—sooner or later—the time to apologize for matter contained in its pages. The editor does not hold himself responsible for all that contributors may state over their own signatures as facts. In like manner our Art editor cannot pretend to vouch for the verisimilitude of every sketch that comes into our hands. Its artistic merits alone are passed upon. We intend to use the work only of accurate and painstaking observers as well as competent artists. Fortunately for him, the editor has long ago established an indefeasible right to own up to a mistake. He was never in Schoharie but once, and that was when he was younger and even farther removed from the infallibility that should adorn the tripod than at the present. He remembers that it was a very romantic region. A sunrise over the hills with the tinge of laurel among the dewy leaves has lived in his memory ever since. There was a sort of quaintness about it too, that made it seem ever so far away from the busy work-day world beyond the barriers. That is all he remembers. He was on no fool's errand when he went there, for he found what he was after—something new and restful. Boy-like he took in only the outside, and was as anxious to see something else as he had been to go there. What a furious rage for newness fills those roseate days that make up the sweetest pages of memory! With this somewhat dim recollection he said, without a moment's hesitation, when asked by one who had been commended to him as reliable and capable, if he wanted an illustrated sketch of that region: "Yes." The "Reader"—that blessed right-hand of the overworked editor—understood this as an approval of the manuscript offered. The managing editor, who saw it first in proof and in the absence of the editor, very naturally did not feel at liberty to clip as closely as he might otherwise have done, what he understood that his chief had endorsed. He has been a soldier, and won his rank by obeying orders. Now, it is claimed, with no little show of heat, that the historical and scientific statements of the article are not altogether accurate. It also contains some needlessly unpleasant references to the people who inhabit this pretty little nook among the hills. As to the facts, the writer of the article alone is responsible for them. We had reason to place confidence in her, and should never have dreamed of attempting to verify every explicit declaration made by her. The editor does not know everything, and is glad that he does not. The writers of THE CONTINENT use their own names, and must stand the brunt of their own errors. As to the offensive matter in the article, however, the editor pleads guilty. He would like to shift it off upon the "Reader;" but he dare not. He would be glad to lay it at the door of the managing editor, but he knows it would eventually come home to roost, either directly or by force of the legal maxim, Quod per alium facit, facit per se. So he makes a virtue of necessity and confesses himself at fault. He does this all the more readily because he cannot, at this moment, recall a corner of the universe that he has ever beheld which can better afford to suffer a little detraction from its charms than the "Old Dutch (or German if it be) Settlement," Schoharie. Like a fair woman, its people should ever rejoice in having its charms malign'd, that all men may be tempted to inspect them the more narrowly. The illustrations of the article were re-drawn, by competent artists, from sketches made by the author. As to the facts of settlement, the trend of the mountains, the direction of the stage road, its geology and geography, and all similar questions, we leave them all to be settled between the writer and the irate denizens of the valley, commending to both the injunction, "Lay on, Macduff!" and remaining utterly indifferent as to which shall first cry, "Hold! enough!" If "Jacko," the ancient African, is really a myth, we cannot help it; but if he should turn out to be existent in the flesh, and be, as he well might, wrathful at being cheated of the glory of having lived a decade or two more than was allowed him, we will gladly give him credit for all he claims. And so, having confessed our fault without extenuation, we "humbly bow us to the gracious will and pardon" of our friends in Schoharie, and if this be not enough, we promise to come in our own proper editorial corporiety when occasion serves and the dog-star rages, and receive such flagellation as they may see fit to decree in penalty for our neglect, hereby submissively professing ourself to be therewith content.

A CORRESPONDENT, who signs himself "One of the Craft," writes:

"Do, please, instruct the poets of THE CONTINENT in the use of 'thou' and 'thee.' It is quite as barbarous to mix up the singular and plural of the pronoun 'thou,' as to improperly use the objective case of the same, as some of our friends do. See Trowbridge's poem on page 224, No. 53."

We don't know what kind of a craftsman the writer may be, and perhaps it does not matter; but whatever he may be, he should not set us such a sum as that to do. We hired three poets and five grammarians, armed with microscopes and steel pens, to crawl over that poem a whole day apiece, and stab to the heart every error of rhyme and every accident of mood and tense, number and person that might lurk therein. We instructed this committee of investigation that, according to the very latest canons of criticism, sense was nothing, form everything. Since that we swear by that poem. We don't know much about "thee" and "thou," but we stand ready to back a guaranty that the author of that poem and our committee can give "One of the Craft" odds on the subject and win every time. By the way, why does "One of the Craft" want our poets instructed? Has he a grievance? Is it possible that he is "One of the Craft" who write poems, and that one of his immortal sparks has been quenched by rejection? It is sad to believe that such may be the case, but we would not be afraid to adventure somewhat on the guess that envy had sharpened his optics.

THE CONTINENT has discovered the champion mean man. He sent three cents for one specimen copy and received two. Then he sent us a four-page letter abusing us for not filling up all the space around the cuts with printed matter; declared we were not giving our readers the worth of their money, being entirely ignorant apparently that the whole press of the country has been wondering for a year how we could give so much; intimated that the publishers were sharpers and THE CONTINENT a fraud, and then wound up by asking us to send it to him gratis during the continuance of "Belinda." A pair of half-soles made of that man's cheek would be a better symbol of indestructibility than has yet been invented.

A GREAT many have written to ask how it is that THE CONTINENT can afford to give a subscription for one year and eight dollars' worth of books for seven dollars, or ten volumes, worth seventeen dollars, and a subscription for one year, for ten dollars. It is no secret. The conductor of THE CONTINENT holds the copyright of his own works and we manufacture the others. We give these to our readers at cost. We do not lose anything by the operation. If we did we would not make the offer. Our subscribers, however, have thereby an opportunity to obtain much for little that has never occurred before and probably never will again. The ten-dollar offer is equivalent to nearly fifteen thousand ordinary octavo pages of standard literature. These offers will be continued only while we are able to supply these works at the present cost. Each one ordering these premiums will be supplied in turn as their orders are received. In some cases we may not have part of the premium on hand at receipt of order. In such event it will be forwarded as soon as we can manufacture it. If you have received our card of acknowledgment do not be impatient. Some delay is unavoidable in supplying so many orders.

PARAGRAPHS and essays on manners, national and international, seem to increase in frequency as time goes on, and, upon the whole, they are coming down to a basis of common sense. The paper on American manners, by Anna B. McMahan, in the last number of THE CONTINENT, is a case in point. Customs vary in different countries and in different states, and varying customs necessitate, in greater or less degree, different codes of manners; but, so long as consideration for others is the fundamental motive, the resultant manners cannot be wholly bad, provided their owner be gifted with common sense. A kindred topic, which seems to receive a growing share of attention, is the tendency on the part of certain Americans to adopt English customs and dress, not because they are good of themselves, but because they are English. One of the New York comic papers (Life) has started a series entitled "Our Anglomaniac." This is a fair game. There are few creatures funnier or more contemptible than the American who deliberately tries to ape English manners, accent and dress on general principles. On the other hand if, as is often asserted, London tailors make better clothes than can be procured here, there is no earthly reason why they—the clothes, not the tailors—should not be imported and worn. If one prefers Skeat's and Stormunth's dictionaries to Webster's, there is no reason why he should not use them in so far as they are superior; but this does not justify him in saying "different to" instead of "different from," or "immediately" and "directly" instead of "as soon as." Americans who visit England become rather painfully conscious of a tendency to use the national "guess" when another word might be employed just as well, and the amused glance that passes between Englishmen when that "shibboleth" inadvertently slips out is a wholesome reminder. And do not we of the western world wink gleefully at one another when our visiting cousin from the mother country carelessly drops an H or "haspirates" an I? A residence of a few weeks in London is very apt, temporarily at least, to cure a Yankee of "guessing," and a Westerner of "reckoning," though when he comes home he almost inevitably resumes the vernacular of his boyhood. He learns also, it may be, to prefer "trousers" to the objectionable "pants" of his native land, and it may be that even his nasal accent is in a measure modified. Will it be doubted that Englishmen resident in America find themselves less likely to interchange aspirates than when they left home? Well—yes, upon the whole it may be doubted, and with good reason, for John abandons the customs of his life less readily than Jonathan does; indeed he is apt to think that his habits of speech are incapable of much improvement. It is certain, however, that the customs of these two great countries do modify one another, and their mutual influence must increase with advancing facility of intercourse. There is an English snobbishness which will never find American imitators outside of a contemptible and shallow-pated minority, and there is an American "bumpiousness" that is fast disappearing, and may well be a memory of the past before another generation comes upon the stage.

MR. IGNATIUS DONNELLY'S "Atlantis," published a year ago, was a sufficiently new departure in book-making to pique the palate of the most jaded critic, its speculation being so ingenious and its style so attractive that it found a wide audience. The present volume¹ is even more worthy of attention, as it is certainly more startling, for it seeks to explain a problem still unsettled by geologists, and a source of puzzle and vexation to all scientists—the origin of "drift." This is, it is hardly necessary to state, the deposit of clay, gravel and stones covering Europe, Africa and South America entirely, the eastern half of North America, a small portion of Western Asia and none of Australia, the layer varying in depth from eight hundred feet to an almost indistinguishable coating. Mr. Donnelly, after a statement of its nature, at once takes the ground that it was produced by collision with a comet, these erratic and unaccountable creatures roaming through space and pervading it as thickly as fish do the sea. "It is generally understood," he writes, "that comets are intangible bodies, and that if one struck the earth its inhabitants would not know of it; but the revelations of the spectroscope during the last few years show that a comet consists of a head, self-luminous from the combustion of gases—that is, of matter on fire—and a tail made up of ponderable matter which shines by the reflection of sunlight, and this ponderable matter is probably stones and clay-dust, such as the drift is composed of. Schiaparelli shows that certain showers of meteoric stones are fragments of comets' tails; and this would go to prove that the ponderable matter of the comet's tail which reflects the sunlight is more or less composed of stones." Of the 500,000,000 now careering at will through the universe, it is not surprising that one, at least, has come in direct contact with the earth, which, before such collision, knew neither ice nor snow, but rejoiced in the equable temperature for which we sigh, and the loss of which is the chief reason for the American nervousness bewailed by Mr. Herbert Spencer, and which may possibly be restored by another whisk from another tail less destructive in its action. "The drift," writes Mr. Donnelly, "fell upon a fair and lovely world, a world far better adapted to give happiness to its inhabitants than this storm-tossed planet on which we now live, with its endless battle between heat and cold, between sun and ice. The pre-glacial world was a garden, a paradise; not excessively warm at the equator, and yet with so mild and equable a climate that the plants we now call tropical flourished within the present Arctic circle. If some future daring navigator reaches the North Pole, and finds solid land there, he will probably discover in the rocks at his feet the fossil remains of the oranges and bananas of the pre-glacial age." Merely speculative as this all appears, the author has read carefully, and backs each startling proposition with a formidable list of authorities. His quotations are singularly apposite, and by the time the second part is reached the reader is prepared to suspend judgment, and simply yield to the power of the earnest and determined thinker. In this part is given a full analysis of the present knowledge concerning comets, followed in the third by a careful summary of the many legends, mythological and otherwise, to be found among all primitive people. The burning comet, he claims, falling into the earth at once evaporated the ocean in clouds of steam, and a flood followed, which congealed into sheets of ice and glaciers. The Scandinavian account he considers a literal one, never understood, and he attaches much importance also to the Central American legend, which "not only describes the fire falling from heaven, and the conflagrations and the fall of gravel from heaven, but even describes the cracks in the earth, the fiords, and the bursting up of the trap-rocks, which geologists assume us were associated with the Drift Age. Even the Bible is full of descriptions and references to the Drift Age and the comet, and the statements of the Bible are confirmed by my theory in the most marvelous manner, but in a way never dreamed of before. Man existed before the drift; his crushed bones have been found with the drift piled upon them where he fell and perished; and in caves in Europe they have been found associated with the remains of animals, which we know certainly ceased to exist with the coming of the drift." The final chapter, a summary of conclusions, and an appeal and warning to all who deify matter, will be regarded by some as the raving of a "crank," by others as the culmination of a huge and rather ghastly joke; but neither will be right. Whatever may be the author's private mind toward his book it is one of the most powerful and suggestive ones of the day, and deserves respectful attention, not only from the general reader, but from the scientist.

THAT the story will be told easily and gracefully, that there will no taint of the realistic school and, where description is concerned, every proof of a careful and delicate observation and appreciation of nature, hardly needs to be said where the novels of Christian Reid are in question. She is, like all Southern authors, a prolific writer, and for a good many years we have had one, and sometimes two, novels per annum. In "The Land of the Sky" she showed her highest descriptive power, and the book is well nigh as charming a guide to the North Carolina mountains as "A Princess of Thule" to the islands of the Hebrides. With each year the author has gained in fluency and facility, both shown in the bulky novel recently issued.¹ Had power gained in like proportion, the book would have been an event. As it is, it is more or less of a disappointment, though it contains strong situations and much picturesque description. The plot, or plan—for plot is too complicated a word—is very simple. A beautiful Virginian has married in her early youth a German count, whose strongest passion is ambition, and who divorces her to make a marriage of interest. The wife resumes her maiden name, refuses all aid from him, and utilizes a wonderful voice by going upon the operatic stage, from which she retires as soon as sufficient money has been made to insure independence. She educates the daughter of this marriage, a girl with the beauty of the mother and the intense pride of the father, in Italy, where her voice is also cultivated. In the opening of the story we are introduced to various Americans, all resident in Paris, and who have had long acquaintance with Madame Lescar, the mother, who is slowly dying of hopeless disease. The life is well described, yet the people seem less real than their surroundings, and all are painfully wealthy and high-bred, and more or less stilted and unnatural. There are many complications, the chief one being the falling in love with Irene by her own cousin, Count Waldegrave, who has been brought up as a son by Irene's father, and who has no knowledge of the relation between them. The father finally seeks a reconciliation and is rebuffed with the "proud anger" that is often specified as one of the heroine's strongest emotions. Eventually, after his death, there is a reconciliation of the cousins, and probably marriage, though on this point we are left slightly in doubt. The curtain falls on various marriages and general disentanglements, and if the book had been compressed into half the space now occupied we should have had one of the most finished pieces of work the author has yet given. Certainly she has many qualities necessary to the successful novel writer, and there is time and hope still for achievements beyond anything yet accomplished.

(1) HEART OF STEEL: A Novel. By Christian Reid. 16mo, pp. 543, $1.25. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

THE expected biography of George Eliot by Miss Mathilde Blind is nearly ready, and the author has spent some months at George Eliot's native place in Warwickshire collecting material for the volume.

"BOOKS, AND HOW TO USE THEM," is the title of a carefully-prepared little book by Mr. J. C. Van Dyke, soon to be brought out by Fords, Howard & Hulbert, which is to serve as a guide to all who draw from public libraries.

"CAPE COD FOLKS" has been revised by the author, and new names given to all the characters, this being made essential by the difficulties accompanying the first edition, the excitement over which has even now barely died away in the region where the scene is laid.

INDIA is hardly looked upon as a literary centre, yet it supplies Central Asia with all its books, and there is a steadily increasing demand. Those treating of religion and poetry are most in favor, and modern history comes next.

"THE CRITIC," which has lost no particle of its crispness and vigor by its change to a weekly form, is publishing a list of books for the use of students, the first one, which began in the issue for January 20th, covering the department of theology. Dr. Schaff and the Rev. Francis Brown are the compilers.

A LENDING-LIBRARY has been for some time one of the features of the New York "Society of Decorative Art," designed for contributors and those who, living outside the city, have no access to city libraries. The books are sent by mail, the terms of borrowing being, in most cases, one cent a day and postage on the returning book.

THE second volume of the remarkable "History of the Negro Race in America," by Colonel George W. Williams, the first colored member of the Ohio Legislature, is now out, the whole work having value beyond anything ever before accomplished, including as it does not only the anti-slavery conflict, but much that has hitherto been neglected. G. P. Putnam's Sons are the publishers, and the work as a whole will soon be reviewed in these columns.

A CAREFULLY prepared and most useful little volume is "The Religions of the Ancient World," by George Rawlinson, M. A., whose "Oriental Monarchies" has become an essential in every library. The present volume is made up of a series of papers written for popular reading, but based upon lectures on the same topics given at the University of Oxford. Nine kingdoms are included, and the whole so simply written that the book could be used with advantage in schools. (16mo, pp. 249, $1.00; Charles Scribner's Sons.

THAT Tennyson requires any special expounding or critical analysis would at first sight seem impossible, but whoever takes up Mr. S. E. Dawson's little book, "A Study, with Critical and Explanatory Notes of Alfred Tennyson's Poem, The Princess," will be surprised to discover what valuable aid these carefully-prepared notes afford. Mr. Dawson gives the full history of the various changes in the poem made by the poet, and an analysis of its plan and drift, which will be of value to every reader. (16mo, pp. 120, $1.00; Dawson Brothers, publishers, Montreal).

A PLEASANT half-hour's entertainment for "a little company" or a home evening may be found in "Sybilline Leaves; Extracts from the Drawing-Room, by A. E. M. K." The book contains "over a thousand quotations from the best authors, classified, and in some cases adapted to the various heads, such as character, tastes," etc.; and, with its red-lined pages and dainty make-up, will form an excellent birthday gift, being a comfortable change from the rather monotonous birthday-books of the past year or so. (16mo, pp. 280, $1.75; Henry Holt & Co., New York).

THE author of "Portia," a novel lately noticed in these columns, is known as the "Duchess," and she has written "Molly Bawn," "Airy Fairy Lillian," and several more with equally senseless titles. She is a very intelligent and bright Irishwoman, whose own history has been somewhat out of the common. She is a Mrs. Maggie Argel. Her husband, several years ago, committed a forgery and was sentenced to a long term of imprisonment at Cork. Left almost entirely destitute, she followed him, and to make a living, began the perilous profession of a novelist, and produced her first and best story, "Phyllis."

IN "Room at the Top," compiled by A. Craig, we have a book made up of the sayings of "self-made men," who have passed from poverty and obscurity to high positions. General Garfield, Dwight Moody, Hiram Powers and Cornelius Vanderbilt are some of the curiously ill-assorted names, the latter being hardly of a character for general imitation. Several very cheap portraits disfigure the book, which, though well intentioned and of the order which seems to give a good deal for a dollar, hardly comes under the head of literature. (12mo, pp. 304, $1.00; Henry A. Sumner & Co., Chicago).

THE valuable series of "Young Folks' History" is increased by Mr. Frederick A. Ober's "Young Folks' History of Mexico." The ground is a familiar one, but while the minute detail of Prescott is, of course, impossible in such small space, the facts are clearly arranged, and the style of their presentation is simple and attractive. The larger part of the book is given to the early history, but there is a sufficiently clear summary of the later, with all its bloody and distracted attempts at self-government, and the tragedy of the unhappy Maximilian and "poor Carlotta," the whole being brought down to 1882. (16mo, pp. 534, illustrated, $1.50; Estes & Lauriat, Boston).

EVERY author will join in the feeling expressed by the late Professor George W. Greene, of Rhode Island, on the completion of his life of his grandfather, Major-General Nathaniel Greene. In his twelve years' work on this he was constantly stimulated and aided by his venerable mother, now nearly one hundred years old. At the conclusion he wrote to a friend: "If you ask how I feel at the close of a work on which I have bestowed so much time, thought and labor, I shall answer, as most everybody else feels on parting with a daily and nightly companion of many years—sad, very sad. And not merely because a daily habit is broken, but because the control of my work has passed from me. What was solely mine has become another's—nay, everybody's. I have erred—it is too late to correct the error. If I have failed to make a correct use of my materials, and thereby failed to make my portrait true, the name of a great man will suffer by my fault. I have done my best. Whether I ever do anything more is uncertain."

MR. HENRY STEVENS' famous collection of the Franklin manuscripts is at last in the hands of the government. Mr. Smalley writes: "Mr. Stevens showed his bibliomania to the last. After he had sold his collection to the government at a fixed price, he spent several hundred pounds in binding volumes in the best style of the art, and in having many of the precious sheets and leaves carefully inlaid for better preservation. This is, of course, a clear loss to him; but the collection comes to the government in perfect order and handsome dress; and the bibliomaniac cares nothing about money. A book might easily be written about the eccentric guardian of this treasure, who, it is said, was very slow to part with it even after the money was waiting for him. 'Henry Stevens, G. M. B.' he often signs and prints himself, the last letters standing for 'Green Mountain Boy.' The 'boy' is very large, rather big around, has a long beard, and is over sixty years old. As a bibliographer he is famous, and has written, compiled and edited books innumerable. He is as learned as he is eccentric. On the title-page of one of his books he posts himself as follows: 'Henry Stevens, G. M. B., F. S. A., etc., blk. bld. Athum. Clb., LNDN.,' which means, 'black-balled by the Athenæum Club.' One of the pleasantest things about Henry Stevens is his intense Americanism, which leads him always to sign himself either as just described or as 'of Vermont.'"

THE formidable bulk of "Poole's Index" is only a suggestion of the labor involved, and no ordinary observer is likely to properly appreciate what is implied in this increase in size. The first edition of 1848 held 154 pages; that of 1853 amounted to 521; and thirty years of continuous labor, not only by Mr. Poole himself, but by associate workers in all the chief libraries, are represented in the beautifully-printed pages. Fifty libraries co-operated and brought the work of indexing the 6205 volumes referred to to a minimum; but skill, untiring patience and positive enthusiasm have all been needed to bring the undertaking to a successful close. As it stands, it is a monumental work of incalculable value to every student or literary man and every careful writer for the press. The index is alphabetical and of subjects, not writers, unless the writers are treated as subjects; "critical articles on poetry, the drama, and prose fiction, given under the name of the writer whose work or works are criticised; the name of the writer of the article, when known, added in parentheses; poems, plays, stories, given under their titles, etc. All the serials indexed are in the English language. Purely professional and scientific serials have been generally omitted, but several indexed so far as their articles of general interest are concerned. The preliminary matter consists of an interesting preface, giving a full account of the history and the plan of the work; a list of co-operating libraries, with the names of the librarians or cataloguers and the number of volumes indexed by each; a table of abbreviations, titles and imprints, and an ingenious 'chronological conspectus,' showing at a glance when a periodical began; if discontinued, when it ended; and the date when any volume was published." The work does not end with the present edition. Supplementary volumes are to be printed every year, which, once in five years, will be bound together and issued in that form. (Cloth, $15.00; sheep, $17.00; half morocco, $18.00. J. R. Osgood & Co., Boston).

THE RELIGIONS OF THE ANCIENT WORLD. By George Rawlinson. 16mo, pp. 249, $1.00. Charles Scribner's Sons.

PEPPERMINT is grown for its essence chiefly in Western New York. Two-thirds of the supply comes from Wayne County, which produces sixty thousand pounds of oil yearly from three thousand acres. The harvest begins in August, and the first year's crop is the best. The mint is cut with a sickle, scythe or mowing-machine, according to the fancy of the cultivator. After cutting, it is allowed to wither in the sun for five or six hours, and is then raked into "cocks," where it remains a short time before being distilled. It is not every cultivator that is provided with a still, but stills are found distributed about the peppermint region at convenient distances. The apparatus and method differ from those employed in Europe, where the fire is applied to the still. In America the still consists of a wooden tub or vat of heavy staves hooped with iron. The withered mint is packed into the vat by treading with the feet until the vat is full, when a cover, made steam-tight with rubber packing, is fastened down with screw clamps. A steam pipe connects the lower part of the vat with a steam boiler, and another pipe from the centre of the cover connects the vat with the condensing worm. The latter varies in size according to the capacity of the still, but becomes progressively smaller toward the outlet. The worm is so placed as to have a constant stream of cold water surrounding it. The steam from the boiler being admitted to the vat at a pressure of thirty to forty pounds, the oil of the mint is volatilized and mixed with the steam condensed in the worm. The mixed oil and water are collected in the receiver, where the difference in their specific gravity causes them to separate. No attempt is made to re-distill the water which separates, and a considerable loss of oil which is held in solution doubtless results from this lack of economy. The oil is packed in tin cans, or glass demijohns, holding about twenty pounds each. The glass demijohns are much the best when the oil is to be kept for any length of time, as its good qualities are more fully retained and it is less liable to discoloration. Oil of peppermint is sometimes adulterated with turpentine and also with oil of hemlock. Pure oil of peppermint, as exported from Wayne County, is colorless, and resembles the English oil, except that its odor and taste are somewhat less pungent and penetrating. The oil deteriorates with age, and the aroma becomes more faint. After a certain number of years it thickens, and the color becomes of a yellowish tinge; exposed for a long time to air, it becomes resinous.

THE town of Paisley, Scotland, has been for nearly two centuries a principal centre of one or another of the numerous leading forms of textile manufacture. Fashions have changed, fabrics of numberless kinds have come into use and died, but Paisley has always been found equal to the occasion; at one time, by the very excellence and beauty of her fabrics, compelling fashion to accept the products of her looms, and again, when fashion must have a change, the Paisley weavers adapted their looms to the varying requirements of different periods. Beginning with coarse linen checks, which were the first fabrics produced by the Paisley looms, they passed to the manufacture of others of a lighter kind, such as lawns, both figured and plain. Silk gauze then took the lead, about the year 1760, and such was the celebrity of Paisley gauze that warehouses were engaged for its sale in London, Dublin and Paris. In 1784 no less than twenty-six thousand persons were employed in Paris in the fabrication of this article, together with sewing thread, lawn and linen. But the demand for the popular gauze soon decreased. The weaving of imitation cashmere shawls was first attempted at Paisley in 1802. From that time onward shawl-making gradually superseded the manufacture of muslin. Muslin, cambric and cotton thread were the next production of Paisley skill and industry; to these succeeded silk and cotton shawls, scarfs and plaids, composed of silk and merino wool. In Paisley and its neighborhood are numerous thread and cotton-spinning mills, bleaching and printing works, dye-houses, power-loom factories, iron and brass foundries, engineers' and wheelwrights' shops, timber-yards, a brewery, distilleries, soap, starch and corn-flour manufactories, and a very extensive tannery.

THE terminations of the nerves of the liver have long been sought by histologists, but without clear and definite results. Nesterowsky came, perhaps, nearer to a correct view than any other person, but his conclusions stopped short of the whole truth. Dr. M. L. Holbrook, in a paper read before the American Society of Microscopists, says: "On the borders of the liver lobules the nerves run often in bundles of three to five; they enter the lobule between the rows of liver cells and connect with the latter by means of delicate threads of living matter, which pass from one liver cell to another, and are a part of the reticular structure of the cell itself. It is probable that every liver cell is connected with a nerve fibre in this way. No nerves penetrate the cell, as has been claimed by some. Delicate fibres also spread over the capillaries and larger bloodvessels of the liver. Nearly all of the nerves of these are non-medullary. They are found in greatest numbers near the porta. Fresh livers of various animals and of man were examined. They are first cut very thin by freezing them so as to make the tissue hard enough to resist the razor, then treated with chloride of gold for twenty to forty minutes, afterward with dilute fermic acid. This latter brings the nerves to view by turning them black better than any other agent."

THE enormous multiplication of rabbits in New Zealand has caused such destruction to the crops that the colonial government has asked the government of India to send out for acclimatization a number of mongooses, animals a little larger than cats, natives of India, and chiefly distinguished for their disposition and ability to destroy serpents, as well as the particular pests from which New Zealand is suffering. So urgent is the necessity for a war of extermination that it has not been thought worth while to consider whether an exchange of rabbits for mongooses will not be jumping from the flying-pan into the fire. The mongooses, meanwhile, are being selected from various parts of Bengal and carefully kept in the Zoological Gardens of Calcutta, whence, as soon as a hundred couples have been gathered, they will be sent to their new home, and it remains to be seen whether the mongoose will fail or succeed in its instinctive vocation.

THE telephone has proved a great convenience to the imperial family of Russia, Nihilist-besieged at Gatschina. It enables them to hear at will their favorite prima donna without exposing themselves to the deadly bomb, or forcing the singers to come to the bomb-proof palace. A wire has been run from Gatschina to the Mariinsky Theatre, St. Petersburg, forty miles away, and over it are conveyed to the listening ears of imprisoned royalty all the music, vocal and instrumental, and the dialogue, and the popular applause also, of every opera performed there.

THE DRAMA.

MARY, a granddaughter of Charles Dickens, has lately adopted the theatrical profession. She made her début at the Haymarket, London, playing a subordinate part in "The Overland Route," and is now a member of the stock company of the Princess Theatre, in that city. During January she played the principal part in Taylor's "Wolf in Sheep's Clothing," in Kilburn, a small town near London, her father, brother and sister being also in the cast.

THE sale by auction of the wardrobe and other effects of the late Edwin Forrest in Philadelphia was a dismal and disheartening occurrence. But very few theatrical people were present, and the prices had been beggarly; for instance, $1.75 for a Roman toga, $9.50 for "Macbeth's" armor, $14 for the "Lear" robe, etc. The principal purchaser was the agent of Mr. Thomas Keene, who will now bear the literal mantle, as he is striving to bear the metaphorical one, of his famous predecessor.

IN the death of Charles R. Thorne, Jr., the metropolitan stage loses a highly-valued member, one whose place it is next to impossible successfully to fill. It is the rarest exception in America to find an actor of the marked ability and popularity of the late Mr. Thorne content to remain in a stock company, when many of far less artistic worth were winning national reputation and large sums of money by "starring," so-called. The honor of being the leading member of a company that for several years surpassed, perhaps, in combined excellence, that of any other English-speaking theatrical organization, was, indeed, an enviable position to hold. Mr. Thorne was born in New York city, March 10, 1840. He was apprenticed to a silversmith, but disliking the occupation, determined to go upon the stage, and became attached to his father's company, who was then a manager of note. He made his début in San Francisco, in "The Avenger," at the age of twenty. Later he went to Calcutta, opened a theatre and made money; returning, he became the leading man at the Boston Theatre; then to Philadelphia, and played with the late Mr. E. L. Davenport. In 1873 he joined the Union Square Theatre, New York, and was connected therewith until within a short time of his death. "Rudolph Chaudoce," in "Led Astray;" "Armand," in "Camille;" "John Strebelow," in "The Banker's Daughter," and "Daniel Rochat," in the play of that name, may be mentioned among Mr. Thorne's best rôles. In the heroes of modern dramas, requiring rugged, manly strength and pathos, Mr. Thorne was seen at his best.

IN LIGHTER VEIN.

Mr. Jerry Buster in Court.

THE following report of a trial in a North Carolina court is condensed from a somewhat lengthy account published in local papers:

In the mountain region of the state a man named John Foster was recently tried for assault and battery upon the person of William Truitt. The first witness was a one-eyed, rough-bearded man. He was lame. He lost his missing eye in a fight. This was his first appearance in a court-house, although he looked to be some sixty years of age. There seems to have been an irreverent admixture of the sacred and profane in the make-up of his name, which was Jeremiah Buster. As he stood amid the crowd a close observer might soon have discovered that the whole scene was new to him. When the prosecuting attorney called him to the witness-stand he limped around the railing of the bar and took his seat on the stand. He gazed around him with a bewildered air, yet there was that in his demeanor which showed that he had not parted altogether with the self-assertion and independence characteristic of the dwellers in the mountains. He took in as much of the situation, perhaps, as a one-eyed man could be reasonably expected to do on his first appearance on the scene.

Prosecuting Attorney—"What is your name?"

Witness (ejecting a stream of tobacco-juice on the floor)—"Jeremiah Buster, 'squire. They generally call me Jerry, for short."

Prosecuting Attorney—"Well, Mr. Buster—"

Witness—"Now, 'squire, don't call me Mr. Buster, ef you please. I'm d—d sildom called that, and—"

The Court—"Mr. Witness—"

Witness—"Now jedge, jes' call me Jerry, ef you please. I ain't used to bein' called mister, and it sorter sounds strange like. Jes' call—"

The district attorney here arose and said that he felt satisfied the witness did not mean to commit a contempt of court, but spoke thoughtlessly and from force of habit. He hoped the court would not send witness to jail, at least at that time, as he was the only person by whom the state could prove the offense charged against the defendant in the indictment, and the trial would, therefore, be suspended. The court replied: "If the witness knew no better, it was time he was learning, and he could not be broken too soon of a bad habit, if it had obtained such control over him as to cause him to violate all propriety."

District Attorney—"That is all true, your Honor, but if the witness is sent to jail now I shall be compelled to enter a nolle prosequi in the case and the trial must be suspended, as this is my only witness."

After some further difficulty in bringing the witness to the point, the examination proceeded.

District Attorney—"Jerry, were you present in August last at Johnson's tan-yard when a difficulty occurred between the prisoner at the bar, John Foster, and William Truitt? If so, tell all about it in your own way."

Witness—"Well, 'squire, one night thar was a turrible storm passed thro' our nake of the woods and blowed down a big poplar in the corner of the horse lot and killed my speckled caf—"

District Attorney—"Never mind about the calf."

Witness—"Well, 'squire, I'll tell you. Ef that storm hadn't er blowed down the tree on the caf and killed it, I wouldn't er skinned the caf, and ef I hadn't er skinned the caf I wouldn't er tuck its hide to the tan-yard, and ef I hadn't er tuck the hide to the tan-yard I wouldn't er bin thar—now would I?"

District Attorney—"Well, I suppose not. Go on."

Witness—"And ef I hadn't er bin thar I couldn't er seed nothin' to tell—now could I? You see, 'squire, you didn't know what I was a-coming at—now did yer?"

District Attorney—"Well, go on."

Witness—"Well, arter I skinned the caf I kotch my old mare and carried the hide over to the tan-yard. When I got there I seed Jack Foster a-sittin' down by the rut of a tree and Bill Truitt were a-talkin' to him."

District Attorney—"Well, what did Truitt say to defendant Foster?"

Witness—"Well, 'squire, you see when I rid up on my old mare, I seed Bill a-talkin', but I couldn't hear a word he said, fur I war a hundred yards off when I fus' see 'em."

District Attorney—"Well, didn't you get near enough to hear anything that was said?"

Witness—"Oh, yes, 'squire."

District Attorney—"Well, after you got near enough to hear, what was said?"

Witness—"Well, Bill sed to Jack thar (pointing to the defendant) 'I want you to pay me the dollar you owe me.'"

District Attorney—"Well, was that all that was said?"

Witness—"Oh, no, 'squire, that warn't all."

District Attorney (impatiently)—"Well, please go on; tell all that was said."

Witness—"Well, 'squire, it 'peared like Jack didn't pay the money, and Bill sed that Jack was not a honest man, and Jack ris up from the rut uv the tree and breshed the dust offen the seat uv his britches."

District Attorney—"What did Jack, as you call him, say?"

Witness—"Never said a der— never said nuthin' at all."

District Attorney—"Well, tell us about the fight between them."

Witness—"Thar warn't no fite atween 'em that I seed."

District Attorney—"Do you mean to say that there was no fight between Truitt and Foster at the tan-yard that day in your presence?"

Witness—"I do for a fac, 'squire; nary fite that I seed."

District Attorney—"And have you told all you saw and heard on that occasion?"

Witness—"I think near about all, 'squire."

District Attorney (disgustedly)—"Stand aside, sir."

Tableau Vivant.—1. The Second 'Story Window.

Counsel for Defense—"Wait a moment, Jerry. I would like to ask you a question or two. You say defendant Foster here didn't say a word when Truitt told him he was not an honest man?"

Witness—"Never whimpered, 'squire, leastways not that I hearn."

Counsel for Defense—"And never struck or offered to strike Truitt?"

Witness—"No, 'squire, I didn't say that adzactly. I sed thar warn't no fight atween 'em that I seed."

Counsel for Defense—"Well, Foster didn't strike him, did he?"

Witness—"Well, you may bet your bottom dollar, 'squire, he did. After he breshed the dust offen the seat uv his britches, he hauled back with his fist and knocked Bill Truitt as cold as a wedge, and nearly mauled the life outen him. I believe in my soul he would have killed him ef it hadn't er been fur me pullin' uv him offen him. Jack's as true grit as ever cracked corn, and his daddy was afore him."

District Attorney (his face beaming with smiles)—"Well, what happened after you pulled the defendant off Truitt?"

Witness—"Well, Jack told him ef he didn't cl'ar outen them diggins and ef ever he sot eyes on him again he'd brake every bone in his dog-skin, and Bill struck a dog trot, and I reckon he's runnin' till yit, fur I've never sot eyes on him sence."

"ON THY FAIR BOSOM, SILVER LAKE,
THE WILD SWAN SPREADS HIS SNOWY SAIL."—J. FRANCIS MURPHY.

THREE STAGES IN AMERICAN LITERARY DEVELOPMENT.

THE three little ships that, on a misty afternoon in December, 1606, dropped down the Thames with sails set for an unknown country, carried any freight but that of books. Book-makers were there in less proportion than on board the solitary vessel that, in 1620, took a more northerly course, and cast anchor at last off the bleak and sullen shore of Massachusetts; but for both alike the stress of those early years left small energy or time for any composition beyond the reports that, at stated intervals, went back to the mother country. The work of the pioneer is for muscles first, brain having small opportunity, save as director; and it required more than one generation before authorship could become the business of any, not even the clergy being excepted from the stress of hard manual labor.

Yet, for the first departure, an enthusiasm of hope and faith filled many hearts. The England of that day had not been too kindly toward her men of letters, who were then, as now, also men of dreams, looking for something better than the best she had to offer, and who, in the early years of the seventeenth century, gathered in London as the centre least touched by the bigotry and narrowness of one party, the wild laxity and folly of the other. "The very air of London must have been electric with the daily words of those immortals whose casual talk upon the pavement by the street-side was a coinage of speech richer, more virile, more expressive than has been known on this planet since the great days of Athenian poetry, eloquence and mirth." There were "wits, dramatists, scholars, orators, singers, philosophers." For every one of them was the faith of something undefined, yet infinitely precious, to be born of all the mysterious influences in that new land to which all eyes turned, and old Michael Drayton's ringing ode on their departure held also a prophecy:

"In kenning of the shore,
Thanks to God first given,
O you, the happiest men,
Be frolic then;
Let cannons roar,
Frighting the wide heaven.

"And in regions far
Such heroes bring ye forth
As those from whom we came;
And plant our name
Under that star
Not known unto our north.

"And as there plenty grows
Of laurel everywhere—
Apollo's sacred tree—
You, it may see,
A poet's brows to crown
That may sing there."

The men who in passing over to America could not cease to be Englishmen, were the friends and associates—the intellectual equals in many points of this extraordinary assemblage of brilliant and audacious intellects, and chief among them was the man at whose name we are all inclined to smile—Captain John Smith. So many myths have hid the real man from view—some of them, it must be admitted, of his own making—that we forget how vivid and resolute a personality he owned, and the pride we may well have in him as the writer of the first distinctively American book. His work was not only for Virginia, but for New England as well. His life was given to the interests of both. Defeated plans, baffled hopes, had no power to quench the absorbing love that filled him to the end, and, at the very last, he wrote of the American colonies: "By that acquaintance I have with them, I call them my children; for they have been my wife, my hawks, hounds, my cards, my dice, and, in total, my best content, as indifferent to my heart as my left hand to my right."

Certain qualities, most prominent then, have, after a long disappearance, become once more, in degree at least, characteristic of the time. The book man of to-day is quite as likely to be also the man of affairs, and the pale and cloistered student of the past is rather a memory than a present fact. History thus repeats itself as usual, and the story of the literary men of the nineteenth century has many points in common with that of the seventeenth.

In those early days of which we write, when Puritan and Cavalier sought our shores, both eager for truer liberty, the first comers were in large part of an order described by one of the most brilliant as well as most accurate writers of our time, who characterizes Smith "as belonging to that noble type of manhood of which the Elizabethan age produced so many examples—the man of action who was also the man of letters; the man of letters who was also a man of action; the wholesomest type of manhood anywhere to be found; body and brain both active, both cultivated; the mind not made fastidious and morbid by too much bookishness, nor coarse and dull by too little; not a doer who is dumb, not a speech-maker who cannot do; the knowledge that comes of books, widened and freshened by the knowledge that comes of experience; the literary sense fortified by common sense; the bashfulness and delicacy of the scholar hovering as a finer presence above the forceful audacity of the man of the world; at once bookman, penman, swordsman, diplomat, sailor, courtier, orator. Of this type of manhood, spacious, strong, refined and sane, were the best men of the Elizabethan time, George Gascoigne, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Walter Raleigh, and, in a modified sense, Hakluyt, Bacon, Sackville, Shakspeare, Ben Jonson and nearly all the rest."

They demanded a "spherical excellence," easier then than now, and attained by many a student of that day, and to this Captain John aspired, one at least of his contemporaries giving proof of faith that he had attained it in lines written on him and his book on the history of Virginia and New England:

"Like Caesar, now thou writ'st what thou hast done.
These acts, this book, will live while there's a sun."

The history is picturesque, and often amusing. As a writer he was always "racy, terse, fearless;" but, save to the special student, there is little value to the present student, unless he be a searcher after the spirit that moved not only the man, but, through him, the time he moulded. For such reader will still be felt "the impression of a certain personal largeness . . . magnanimity, affluence, sense and executive force. Over all his personal associates in American adventure he seems to tower, by the natural loftiness and reach of the perception with which he grasped the significance of their vast enterprise and the means to its success. . . . He had the faults of an impulsive, irascible, egotistic and imaginative nature; he sometimes bought human praise at too high a price, but he had great abilities in word and deed; his nature was, upon the whole, generous and noble; and during the first two decades of the seventeenth century, he did more than any other Englishman to make an American nation and an American literature possible."

Behind the stockade at Jamestown, only the most persistent bent toward letters had chance of surviving. Joyful as the landing had been, the colony had no sturdy backbone of practical workers. Their first summer was unutterably forlorn, the beauty and fertility that had seemed to promise to the sea-sad eyes a life of instant ease, bringing with it only a "horrible trail of homesickness, discord, starvation, pestilence and Indian hostility." No common purpose united them, as in the Northern colony. Save for the leaders, individual profit had been the only ambition or intention. Work had no place in the scheme of life, and even when ship after ship discharged its load of immigrants matters were hardly mended. Perpetual discord became the law. Smith fled from the tumults which he had no power to quiet, and a long succession of soon-discouraged officers waged a species of hand-to-hand conflict with the wild elements that made up the colony. One poet, George Sandys, whose name and work are still of meaning and value to the student, found leisure, borrowed from the night, for a translation of Ovid's "Metamorphoses," commended by both Dryden and Pope, and which passed at once through eight editions, but there were no others.

Twenty years of colonial life had ended when he returned to England, and the spirit of the early founders had well nigh disappeared. Literary work had died with it. A few had small libraries, chiefly Latin classics, but a curious torpor had settled down, the reasons for which are now evident. There was no constant intercourse, as in New England. The "policy of dispersion" was the law, for every man aspired to be a large land-owner, and, in the midst of his tract of half-cleared land, had small communication with any but his inferiors. Within fifty years any intellectual standard had practically ceased to exist. The Governor, Sir William Berkeley, whose long rule meant death to progress, thundered against the printing-press, and believed absolutely in the "fine old conservative policy of keeping subjects ignorant in order to keep them submissive." For thirty-six years his energies were bent in this direction. Protest of any sort simply intensified his purpose, and when 1670 dawned he had the happiness of making to the English Commissioners a reply that has become immortal, though hardly in the sense anticipated, when he wrote: "I thank God there are no free schools, nor printing; and I hope we shall not have these hundred years; for learning has brought disobedience and heresy and sects into the world, and printing has divulged them and libels against the best government. God keep us from both."

A dark prayer, and answered as fully as men's own acts can fulfill their prayers. The brilliant men who had passed from the scene had no successors. The few malcontents were silenced by a law which made "even the first thrust of the pressman's lever a crime," and until 1729 there was neither printing nor desire for printing in any general sense. The point where our literature began had become apparently its burial-place; the historians and poets and students of an earlier generation were not only unheeded but forgotten, and a hundred years of intellectual barrenness, with another hundred, before even partial recovery could be apparent, were the portion of Virginia and all the states she influenced or controlled. No power could have made it otherwise. "Had much literature been produced there would it not have been a miracle? The units of the community isolated; little chance for mind to kindle mind; no schools; no literary institutions, high or low; no public libraries; no printing-press; no intellectual freedom; no religious freedom; the forces of society tending to create two great classes—a class of vast land-owners, haughty, hospitable, indolent, passionate, given to field sports and politics; and a class of impoverished white plebeians and black serfs; these constitute a situation out of which may be evolved country gentlemen, loud-lunged and jolly fox-hunters, militia heroes, men of boundless domestic heartiness and social grace, astute and imperious politicians, fiery orators, and, by-and-by, here and there, perhaps after awhile, a few amateur literary men—but no literary class, and almost no literature.”

The northern colony had known strange chances also, but every circumstance and accident of its life fostered the literary spirit and made the student the most honored member of the community. The Mayflower brought a larger proportion of men with literary antecedents and tendencies than had landed on the Virginia coast; and though every detail of life was fuller of hard work, privation and danger—climate being even more against them than Indians or any other misery of the early years—the proportion remained much the same. It is often claimed that this early environment was utterly opposed to any possibility of literary development. On the contrary, “those environments were, for a certain class of mind, extremely wholesome and stimulating.” Hawthorne has written somewhere: “New England was then in a state incomparably more picturesque than at present, or than it has been within the memory of man.” And Tyler, in his brilliant analysis of early colonial forces, takes much the same ground: “There were about them many of the tokens and forces of a picturesque, romantic and impressive life; the infinite solitudes of the wilderness, its mystery, its peace; the near presence of nature, vast, potent, unassailed; the strange problems presented to them by savage character and savage life; their own escape from great cities, from crowds, from mean competition; the luxury of having room enough; the delight of being free; the urgent interest of all the Protestant world in their undertaking; the hopes of humanity already looking thither; the coming to them of scholars, saints, statesmen, philosophers.”

Yet even for these men there were restraints that today seem shameful and degrading. Harvard College had been made responsible for the good behavior of the printing-press set up in 1639, and for twenty-three years this seemed sufficient. Finally two official licensers were appointed, whose business was to read and pronounce a verdict either for or against everything proposed for publication. One might fancy these hindrances sufficient, but intolerance gained with every year of restriction, and when finally the officers were induced, by arguments which must have been singularly powerful, to allow the printing of an edition of “The Invitation of Christ,” a howl arose from every council and general assembly, whether of laws or divinity, and the unlucky book was characterized as one written “by a popish minister, wherein is contained some things that are less safe to be infused amongst the people of this place;” and the authorities ordered not only a thorough revisal of its contents, but a cessation of all work on the printing-press. Common sense at last came to the rescue, but legal restraints on printing were not abolished in Massachusetts until twenty-one years before the Declaration of Independence.

As with Virginia the early years were most fertile in work of any interest to the present time, and naturally so. Fresh from the life not only of books but of knowledge of “the central currents of the world’s best thinking,” these influences could not die out in the generation nearest them. For any writer some history of the colony was the first instinct, and William Bradford holds the same relation to New England as Captain John Smith to Virginia—the racy, incisive, picturesque diction of the latter being a key-note to their colonial life, as symbolic as the measured, restrained and solemn periods of the Puritan writer. Argument had become a necessity of life. It had been forced upon them in England in the endeavor to define their position not only to the Cavalier element but to themselves, and became finally so rooted a mental habit that “even on the brink of any momentous enterprise they would stop and argue the case if a suspicion occurred to them that things were not right."

They were never meek and dreamy saints, but, on the contrary, "rather pragmatical and disputatious persons, with all the edges and corners of their characters left sharp, with all their opinions very definitely formed, and with their habits of frank utterance quite thoroughly matured." But for Bradford, and Morton, and Johnson, and other equally worthy and honored names, this disputatious tendency was a surface matter, and the deeper traits were of an order that make petty peculiarities forgotten. For Bradford, especially, was "an untroubled command of strong and manly speech. . . . The daily food of his spirit was noble. He uttered himself without effort, like a free man, a sage and a Christian," and his voice was that of many who followed him. Loving the mother country with passion, the sense of exile long remained with them—a double exile, since they had first taken firm hold in Leyden, and parted from its ease and prosperity with words which hold the pathos and quiet endurance still the undertone of much New England life. "So they left that goodly and pleasant city which had been their resting-place near twelve years; but they knew they were pilgrims, and looked not much on these things, but lift up their eyes to the heavens, their dearest country, and quieted their spirits."

John Winthrop, who, a few years later, became gov-the hands of the clergy, who came to be the only class with much leisure for study. The range of subjects treated dwindled more and more from year to year. The breadth and vigor of the early days were lost, the pragmatism and disputatious element gaining more and more ground. Unfortunately "they stood aloof with a sort of horror from the richest and most exhilarating types of classic writing in their own tongue." The Hebrew Scriptures and many classics of Roman and Greek literature were still allowed; but no genuine literary development could take place where the sinewy and vital thought of their own nation was set aside as unworthy of consideration. The esthetic sense dwindled and pined. Standards of judgment altered. The capacity for discrimination lessened. Theological quibbling made much of the literature of the day, though there was much more than quibbling. But the keenest minds, no matter how vivid and beautiful their intelligence, were certain that neither man as a body, nor the world as a home, were anything but lack evils, ruined by the fall of Adam, and to be ignored and despised with every power and faculty. Faith in God came to be faith in "a microscopic and picayune Providence," governing the meanest detail of the elects' existence, and faith in man had no place in any scheme of life or thought. If a poem were written it came to be merely some transcription from the Bible, or an epitaph or elegy on some departed saint.

In spite of themselves, however, humor, the Saxon birthright, refused to be suppressed, and asserted itself in unexpected ways, as in Nathanael Ward's "Simple Cobbler of Agawam." What the cobbler saw was chiefly the theological difficulties of the time. Discord and confusion seemed to have settled upon the earth, and "looking out over English Christendom, he saw nothing but a chaos of jangling opinions, upstart novelties, lawless manners, illimitable changes in codes, institutions and creeds." He declaims ferociously against freedom of opinion, and "the fathers of the inquisition might have reveled over the first twenty-five pages of this Protestant book, that actually blaze with the eloquent savagery and rapture of religious intolerance." He laughed in the midst of this declamation, but it was rather a sardonic laugh, and soon checked by fresh consideration of man's vileness.

Liberty had received many a blow from the hands of these men, who had fled from home and country to secure it, but it could not die while their own principles were remembered, and constantly at one point or another, irrepressible men and women rose up, bent upon free thought and free speech, and shaming even the most determined and intolerant spirit. One of these men, outspoken by nature, recorded his mind in some two thousand printed pages, and Roger Williams even to-day ernor of the colony, left records rather in the nature of journals than history, but of greatest value in forming any correct conception or estimate of the time, and one portion of them included his speech, in 1645, before the general court after his acquittal of the charge of having exceeded his authority as deputy governor. A certain passage, containing his statement of the nature of liberty, has been pronounced by both English and American thinkers far beyond the definition of Blackstone, and fully on a par with the noblest utterances of John Locke or Algernon Sidney.

As time went on authorship passed naturally into looms up with all the more power because we have become "rather fatigued by the monotony of so vast a throng of sages and saints, all quite immaculate, all equally prim and stiff in their Puritan starch and uniform, all equally automatic and freezing." It is most comfortable to find any one defying the rigid and formal law of the time, whether spoken or implied, and we have positive "relief in the easy swing of this man's gait, the limberness of his personal movement, his escape from the pasteboard proprieties, his spontaneity, his impetuosity, his indiscretions, his frank acknowledgements that he really had a few things yet to learn." He demanded spiritual liberty, and though, as time went on, he learned to use gentler phrases, he was always a century or two ahead of his age. The mirthfulness of his early days passed, as well it might, but a better possession—cheerfulness—remained to the end. Exile never embittered him, and the writings that are his legacy "show an habitual upwardness of mental movement; they grow rich in all gentle, gracious, and magnanimous qualities as the years increase upon him."

His influence upon New England was a profound one, and the seed sown bore fruit long after his mortal body had crumbled into dust; but it was chiefly in theological lines, to which all thought now tended. Poetry, so far as drama or lyric verse was concerned, had been forsworn by the soul of every true Puritan, but "of course poetry was planted there too deep even for his theological grub-hooks to root out. If, however, his theology drove poetry out of many forms in which it had been used to reside, poetry itself practiced a noble revenge by taking up its abode in his theology." Stedman gives a masterly analysis of this time in the opening essay of his "Victorian Poets," showing the shackles all minds wore, and comparing the time when "even nature's laws were compelled to bow to church fanaticism," to the happier day in which "science, freedom of thought, refinement and material progress have moved along together."

We have seen how the power of keen and delicate literary judgment or discrimination died insensibly. The first era of literary development passed with the first founders of the Republic, and original thought and expression lay dormant, save in theological directions. As with all new forms of life, the second stage was an imitative one, and the few outside the clergy who essayed writing at all copied the worst models of the Johnsonian period. Verse was still welcome, and the verse-makers of the colonial time were many. Even venerable clergymen like Peter Bulkley gave way to its influence. Ostensible poems were written by more than one governor; John Cotton yielded to the spell, though he hid the fact discreetly by writing his English verses in Greek characters, and confining them to the blank leaves of his almanac. Debarred from all ordinary amusements or occupations, the irrepressible need of expression effervesced in rhymes as rugged and unlovely as the writers, and ream upon ream of verse accumulated. Had it found permanent form, our libraries would have been even more encumbered than at present, but fortunately most of it has perished. Elegies and epitaphs were its favorite method, and the "most elaborate and painful jests," every conceivable and some inconceivable quirks and solemn puns made up their substance. The obituary poet of the present is sufficiently conspicuous in the daily papers which are available for his flights, but the leading poets of time do not feel that it is incumbent upon them to evolve stanzas in a casual way on every mournful occasion. In that elder day allegories, anagrams, acrostics—all intended to have a consolatory effect on mourning friends—flowed from every clerical pen, adding a new terror to death and a new burden to life, but received with a species of solemn glee by the readers. Of one given to this habit Cotton Mather writes that he "had so nimble a faculty of putting his devout thoughts into verse that he signalized himself by . . . sending poems to all persons, in all places, on all occasions, . . . wherein if the curious relished the piety sometimes rather than the poetry, the capacity of the most therein to be accommodated must be considered." Another poet had presently the opportunity to "embalm his memory in some congenial verses," and wrote an epitaph, and ended with a full description of "His care to guide his flock and feed his lambs,

By words, works, prayers, psalms, alms and anagrams."

THE PINES—R. SWAIN GIFFORD.

BISHOP HATTO AND THE RATS—JOHN LA FARGE.

To this period belongs a poetic phenomenon—a metrical horror known as “The Bay Psalm Book,” being the first English book ever issued from an American printing-press. Tyler has given with his accustomed happy facility of phrase the most truthful description yet made of a production that formed for years the chief poetical reading of the average New Englander, and undoubtedly did more to lower taste and make inferior verse seem praiseworthy than any and all other causes. He writes: “In turning over these venerable pages, one suffers by sympathy something of the obvious toil of the undaunted men who, in the very teeth of nature, did all this; and whose appalling sincerity must, in our eyes, cover a multitude of such sins as sentences wrenched about end for end, clauses heaved up and abandoned in chaos, words disemboweled or split quite in two in the middle, and dissonant combinations of sound that are the despair of such poor vocal organs as are granted to human beings. The verses, indeed, seem to have been hammered out on an anvil, by blows from a blacksmith’s sledge. Everywhere in the book is manifest the agony it cost the writers to find two words that would rhyme—more or less; and so often as this arduous feat is achieved, the poetic athlete appears to pause awhile from sheer exhaustion, panting heavily for breath. Let us now read, for our improvement, a part of the Fifty-eighth Psalm:

"The wicked are estranged from the womb, they goe astray as soone as ever they are borne, uttering lyes are they.
Their poyson's like serpents poyson, they like deafe Aspe her eare that stops. Though Charmer wisely charm, his voice she will not heare.
Within their mouth, doe thou their teeth, break out, o God most strong, doe thou Jehovah, the great teeth break of the lions young."

It is easy to see that the poetry of the time was simply "metrical theology and chronology and politics and physics." Anne Bradstreet lighted up the dreary mass with some gleams of genuine poetic power and beauty, but even she staggered under the weight of a period that forbade natural and simple utterance, and forced every mind into a straight jacket not only of thought but expression. Her work awakened keen enthusiasm among the bright young scholars of New England, who had insight enough to recognize her as the one shining example of poetic power in that generation, and who wrote innumerable elegies and threnodies on her life and work. Pope was now in full tide of success, and with Thomson, Watts and Young found hosts of sympathetic and admiring readers who would have turned in horror from the pages of Shakspeare or the early dramatists. The measure adopted by Pope charmed the popular mind, and while it helped to smooth the asperities of Puritan verse, became also the easy vehicle of the commonplace. There were hints here and there of something better to come, and in the many examples of verse remaining it is easy to discern a coming era of free thought and more musical expression. Peter Folger had sent out from the fogs of Nantucket a defiant and rollicking voice; John Rogers and Urian Oakes, both poets and both Harvard presidents, had done something better than mere rhyme, but it remained for another pastor, teacher and physician to sound a note that roused all New England. Michael Wigglesworth might have been immortal, could the genius born in him have been fed and trained by any of the "sane and mighty masters of English song;" but, born to the inheritance of a narrow and ferocious creed, with no power left to even admit the existence of the beautiful, he was "forever incapable of giving utterance to his genius—except in a dialect unworthy of it," and became simply "the explicit and unshrinking rhymers of the five points of Calvinism."

Cotton Mather describes him as "a feeble little shadow of a man." He was "the embodiment of what was great, earnest and sad in colonial New England." He was tenderly sympathetic, and his own life, made up mostly of sorrow and pain, filled him with longing to help others. "A sensitive, firm, wide-ranging, unresting spirit, he looks out mournfully over the throngs of men that fill the world, all of them totally depraved, all of them caught, from farthest eternity, in the adamant meshes of God's decrees; the most of them also being doomed in advance by those decrees to an endless existence of ineffable torment; and upon this situation of affairs the excellent Michael Wigglesworth proposes to make poetry." His "Day of Doom," a horribly realistic description of every terror of the expected judgment, was written in a swinging ballad measure that took instant hold of the popular mind. No book ever printed in America has met with a proportionate commercial success. "The eighteen hundred copies of the first edition were sold within a single year; which implies the purchase of a copy of 'The Day of Doom' by at least every thirty-fifth person in New England. . . . Since that time the book has been repeatedly published, at least once in England and at least eight times in America, the last time being 1867."

It penetrated finally all parts of the country where Puritan faith or manners prevailed. It was an intellectual influence beyond anything we can now imagine.

EMERSON'S HOME AT CONCORD.

It was learned by heart along with the catechism, and for a hundred years was found on every book-shelf, no matter how sparsely furnished otherwise. Even after the Revolution, which produced the usual effect of all war in bringing in unrestrained thought, it was still a source of terror, and thrilled and prepared all readers for the equally fearful pictures drawn by Edwards and his successors.

With the ending of both wars literary interests flagged, not only in New England, but at all points, and a long season of dearth followed the work of men like Franklin and the brilliant group of the Revolutionary period. With increasing prosperity came commonplace lives that are the usual result of comfortable surroundings and circumstances. Books were made in abundance, but of a quality that justly enough provoked the British question at which we rose in wrath, "Who reads an American book?" Under all the apparent stagnation many forces were at work, but American as well as English students had no faith that such stage was the necessity of development, and that a generation of truer thinkers, poets and philosophers than any yet known were soon to say their first word to an American public. In the meantime intellectual starvation was the portion of all who were at a distance from the great centres. Communication was still hampered—railroads and telegraphs hardly more than a dream. The farmer depended on his Bible and almanac, and perhaps a copy of "The Pilgrim's Progress," for such intellectual food as he took time to indulge in. The middle class fared not much better, until annuals took the popular fancy, and every table held its "Gem," or "Treasury," or "Token."

Smile as one may at the quality of these productions, they are of far more value and did a better work than any casual on-looker will admit. If sentimentality was their staple, at least it was an advance upon "The Day of Doom." The smooth and decorous steel engravings and mezzotints were the first step in an art education that is bringing us, in spite of inexperience and crudeness, side by side with those who have had fifty years to our one of knowledge; and the first work of our masters, whether in poetry or prose found a welcome in these pages.

Hawthorne's name was found in successive years of "The Token," a Boston annual published by S. G. Goodrich, better known as "Peter Parley;" and Longfellow and Holmes and Whittier and Emerson have all used the same channels. Popular annuals were the entering wedge, and the people received them gladly. To look forward to the coming of a literary guest once a year paved the way for a welcome to a monthly one. "Graham's Magazine," "Sartain's," and a list of forgotten ventures were all heralds of a day nearing and brightening, and made more possible with every fresh attempt to speak as Americans and not as imitators. More and more were books becoming an essential for every household; for many simply because "it looked well to have them about," but for many more because genuine love for them had been born.

The American is always a pioneer. As yet he has found no time to take root in any one spot. His books may be dear to him, but he leans strongly to any form that holds much in little, simply because they too must be travelers and occupy as little space as possible. Encyclopedias, compilations of one sort and another, anything that compresses information or instruction is hailed by the American nomad, who to-day is in Vermont and to-morrow en route for Mexico. He reads as he goes, and thus devours periodicals, rejoicing in the paper covers and throwing them aside when finished. Cheap libraries and series of every description meet the same need, and no people on earth have such ill digested smatterings of information as the Americans, who, even fifty years ago, had next to nothing.

But decry the tendency as one may, it has done infinitely valuable work in elevating popular taste, and in such work nothing has had larger part than the numerous encyclopedias of poetry, beginning years ago with Dr. Griswold's now antiquated collections. Then came Dana's "Household Book of Poetry," which became a model for succeeding collections, and through its excellence of design and the critical skill that marks its frequent revision retains a wide popularity. The fashion immediately secured public recognition and took on many forms, till now every large firm has its own collection, and the buyer who takes up first one and then another would like to possess them all, each one having some special value and merit. As a result of the almost universal ownership of such collections, verse-making is again as marked a characteristic of Americans as in the ante-Revolutionary days, but of a far different order. The editor, whose chief business is rejection, finds a large proportion of what must go to the wastebasket smooth, easy and often excellent rhyme. Its poverty of thought is commonly the fatal weakness. The volumes of verse that nobody has time to read hold the same qualities and more. The gift of expression is a popular one, and when one takes up a collection like that made by Epes Sargent, and known as "Harper's Cyclopaedia of British and American Poetry,"⁽¹⁾ the amount of meludious and often beautiful verse by authors unknown save for their embalment there, is a perpetual surprise, though the discrimination that placed it there is no surprise to those who knew this modest but brilliant critic.

Naturally the deepest interest attaches to those collections made by poets themselves, and thus "Bryant's Library of Poetry and Song"⁽²⁾ takes the precedence with many because of its editor's acknowledged literary taste and discriminating judgment. Its illustrations also are of a high order. The demand was so great that Mr. Bryant thoroughly revised a new edition in 1876, in many cases copying out poems with his own hand; and the book, as a whole, represents the utmost that his literary taste and knowledge had to give. That of the Harpers has its peculiar value also, in that it gave larger space to American verse, and enrolled many otherwise unknown names on its list. "Parnassus," which represented Emerson's personal tastes alone, was eagerly welcomed as a glimpse into the mind of the beloved philosopher, and Whittier's "Songs of Three Centuries," still more limited in plan and bulk, found equal welcome. "The Cambridge Book of Poetry and Song,"¹ prepared on a new plan, which gives authors alphabetically, instead of chronologically, or by classification, according to motive or theme, has been edited by Charlotte F. Bates, the author of much delicate and tender verse, and has been made a volume as sumptuous and satisfactory as its numerous predecessors. It is hard to choose between them, and the distracted buyer will repeat involuntarily:

"How happy could I be with either Were t'other dear charmer away!"

The chief point to be made here is not the relative or individual value of these many candidates for public favor, but the fact that the masters in English song are and have for years been the daily companions of a large proportion of our people, and one of the silent but strong and wide-reaching forces that have laid the foundation for much of the American capacity for appreciation that puzzles foreign critics.

Our third stage of literary development may be summed up in the "annual" period—a stage of negation and inadequacy and hopelessness; or we may ignore that fallow-time, and count our third period as beginning with Emerson and Longfellow and Bryant and the master still with us. In either case, our work has but begun. The era of criticism, now upon us, seemingly as disastrous as the "annual" stage, is also fallow-time. America has better words to come, and, noble as have been the voices of our near past, American literature must, if true to its birthright, mean a power second to none—a strength and beauty as inspiring as that the old Greeks knew as daily food, but with something the Greek never knew—the spirit of humanity speaking in every word of work to come, and making all effort for the inspiration, as well as for the healing of the nations.

HELEN CAMPBELL.

BEYOND YELLOW LILIES.

BY NANNIE HUSTON BANKS.

MADAME sighs; puts out two brown little hands before her, and wags her head.

"I car-not stay een theze place! I do hate eet, from ze bottom of my heart! So dead-lie dull! so triste! so lone-lie! Yes-tar-day—"

This word is accomplished with great care and deliberation.

"—eet did fall on me!"

I stare in silent wonder. Madame's English, Madame's inflections, are bewildering at all times; and to-day I may be duller than usual, because of the heat. Gradually, however, Madame's meaning dawns upon me. The loneliness overcame her yesterday, is what she means to say.

Madame is a Parisienne; a tiny, withered atom of Frenchy humanity, which some wind of chance has blown across the Atlantic. We—Madame and I—are fellow-teachers in a Tennessee school, and excellent friends—anomalous as friendships may seem between a French widow and a Yankee spinster.

I am the Yankee spinster.

Madame is a kindly little soul, and it is rather spiteful of me to remember the soubriquet, "Gibber-jabber," bestowed upon her by a disrespectful pupil. But Madame is voluble with the inimitable click-clacky volubility of her nation.

How hot it is!

It might be a trifle cooler, perhaps, if Madame could be induced to leave off knitting that perennial red woolen stocking, which she knits in the exasperating German fashion—with the wool over the left hand. Madame learned our language—so she proudly informs me—before coming to America; and taught it in ein Fraülein Brettchen schule. Madame learned to knit of the Fraüleins; as to the English which the Fraüleins learned of Madame —!

Here my imagination fails; and I fall to speculating how old she is, this tiny brown woman, with the light figure and the springy walk of a girl of sixteen.

I am rive, an acute person, and I soon cease speculating upon the unfathomable.

How hot it is!

In apathetic wretchedness I gaze through the window at the bare, blackened, treeless wall of rock towering before it—at the heated, mote-flecked atmosphere shimmering against the surface of the cliff, like the air about the mouth of a furnace.

This, then, is Crystal Springs! whither Madame and I, together with some half hundred other unfortunates, have been inveigled by glowing advertisements. In these advertisements we—Madame and I—thought we had found the solution of a problem which had occasioned us some uneasiness. This problem was where to spend the vacation. Strange, is it not, and rather piteous, that one should be so utterly alone in the world—so desolate? Yet Madame and I are just so utterly alone—just so desolate.

Crystal Springs! Green fields, mossy dells, and cool, rippling waters—a vision of Arcadia rose before our tired eyes.

Only fifty miles from the school, and eight dollars a week! Anxiously I listened while Madame made the calculation. Yes, we could afford it. So we came.

And this is Crystal Springs!

The hotel, a mere shell of boards, stands, unsheltered, shutterless, in the blazing, broiling sun. Crystal Springs, a single languid stream, oozing from an ancient "gum" under a crazy shed, is a mile away, down a dreary stretch of sun-baked, cinder-strewn railroad track. Twice a day we tramp patiently over this intervening mile, with the heroic endurance peculiar to Americans in pursuit of recreation.

I have observed this peculiarity in no other nation; and certainly Madame does not share it. She has a cheery nature, but Crystal Springs would depress the spirits of a lark. And to-day Madame's discontent breaks out in a rage; albeit, an effervescent French rage, which is now fast subsiding into plaintiveness. A wet handkerchief is spread over her head.

"Hélas! I shall haf ze a-pop-lexy!"

Then a tap on the door. Madame forgets her sufferings, chiefest of which is ennui, and trips blithely to the door. A grinning negro hands her a letter. Negroes are "proned," as they express it, to grin at Madame; and very oddly does she look, with the corner of the handkerchief dangling about her brown face.

"Zat which I haf ees ze lettre of Mademoiselle!"

A letter is an event to Madame and me. We have few correspondents—the world is not eager for the autographs of impecunious mediocrity.

I turn it over and over in the idiotic way common to those who receive few letters. At last I open it, and the signature is David Easten—my Cousin David—whose name I have not heard, whose handsome face I have not seen, for so many years. How long since I heard his name I cannot remember. But a sunny June day, twenty years ago, comes back, and I see a youth's slender form, clad in blue, marching to martial music down the village street; a child-maiden prone upon the earth among the lilacs in the old garden, weeping her heart out, and feeling that the end of all things has come.

Long quiet memories stir. I scarce comprehend the words I read aloud, though 'tis a commonplace letter enough:

"MY DEAR RUTH: I shall not reproach you for your uncousinly conduct in concealing your whereabouts until I can do so orally. By the merest chance, we learn you, with a friend, are stopping at Crystal Springs, and write immediately to beg you and your friend to come to us at once. My wife joins in a most cordial invitation to you both. I should have delivered the invitation in person, but for the approaching marriage of my daughter Marguerite, which renders it impossible for me to leave home just now. We shall expect you at your earliest convenience. It is only a few hours' run to Clayville.

"Most affectionately, your cousin,
"DAVID EASTEN."

David's wife! David's daughter! How strange it seems!

Mechanically my eyes go back to the parched cliffs; but my thoughts are far away, in our old New England home—David's home and mine. And very dearly we loved each other with all our childish hearts. The breeze comes over the beloved hills; I feel the salt air on my face.

Madame prances like an electrified goblin.

"Eh bien! Eh bien! een ze nac o' temps!"

So Madame says "in the nick of time." Then a shadow falls upon the radiant little brown face.

"Mais, ve ville go, ville ve not, chère mademoiselle?" pleadingly. "Ce matin, I do say to ze—what ees eet you do say en Anglais?—L'Aubergiste I do mean—cette vilaine femme down stair, who poi-zan us wiz sal-a-rautous. Ce matin, I do say to heer—avec bienséance, I assure you, mademoiselle—ze bread ees vile!"

Madame's pose is worthy La Française.

"What ees eet she do say to me? Eet is theze—'if you do not like ze ac-com-mo-da-tion, you can lief.'" Hé bien! Ve go! I turn my nose at heer!"

The half-intelligible tirade jars upon the memories the letter has stirred. And as it ends I turn fretfully upon Madame.

"I know nothing of these people," I say. "I have not seen my cousin for twenty years—his family never at all. How can I tell, then," I demand sharply, "whether or not it would be pleasant to visit them?"

The little Parisienne's answer disarms me.

"Eef zay are like Mademoiselle zay are charm-ing!"

I know I am not in the least charming; an ordinary and rather bad-tempered old maid instead. But no one save Madame ever says things like that to me. What can I do, except consent? And consent I do, smiling in a shamefaced way. There is small inducement to tarry at Crystal Springs, and I leave the time of departure to Madame.

Madame remembers the morning's unsuccessful encounter with the landlady, and says, "Now, at once!" so we set about packing our scanty belongings. The last garment is folded and our trunks locked as the dinner-bell rings. We are in no haste. We are acquainted with the menu of Crystal Springs—its invariable mutton and potatoes.

"Revenons à nos moutons, for ze las temps," says Madame, with her funny little French cluck of the tongue.

It is late in the afternoon of the same day that we are seated in the train. Madame gives a whisk of her skirts, and a stamp of both little feet, literally shaking off the dust of Crystal Springs.

At twilight we reach the Ohio River. Swollen by the June flood, it is a vast, yellow sea, flooding the lowlands on either side, far as the eye can reach.

We are "transferred," in railroad parlance, to the Cairo packet. The stuffy, hot cabin is intolerable. We drag our chairs out upon the guards, and watch the mighty drift-strewn river. Waves from the bow rush by, white with foam, reddened now and then by the engine fires. Lights glimmer in the shadowy houses on the Kentucky shore, and set me dreaming, with foolish self-torture, of the "might have been." If David had never left our New England hills; if he had never come among the people who live in those shadowy houses; if he had never met the Kentucky girl he had married; if our childish love had grown into something stronger—

"Gare!" Madame's warning breaks shrilly in upon an old maid's silly dreams.

"Ve vill tak our death; ze rivere air eez so damp."

Late in the night I am aroused from sleep by a lull in the whir of the boat's machinery. Rising upon my elbow, I look through the transom over the outer stateroom door. The high embankment against which the boat is lying swarms with people, visible by the light of the burning pitch upon the bow. A clear, loud voice says:

"Here 's another break in the levee! Shawnee will be under ten foot water in twenty-four hours!"

Just after breakfast we reached our destination. Clayville is the typical southwestern Kentucky village, straggling along under towering bluffs. It cannot be a pretty town seen under most favorable circumstances; now, partially submerged, it is inexpressibly dreary.

With much puffing and wheezing the little steamer effects a landing against a house on the river front. There are no other passengers for Clayville, so Madame and I disembark, by walking from the upper deck of the packet to the flat roof of the piazza. The watery deep between is bridged by the stage plank.

Stranded amid a watery waste, standing upon the roof, we gaze after the swiftly-receding packet in blank dismay. But rescue is coming. A kindly, bucolic countenance at a second-story window beams upon u—

"This way, ladies; step this way!" the man calls. "The wharf-boat lit out las' night. Most anything's liable to light out when the Wabash gets on a high. Can't no ropes hold agin' her. She's the Ole Boy, she is!"

By the assistance of this communicative, free-and-easy young man, we scramble through the window and follow him down stairs, or rather half-way down. The hall is, of course, flooded; a queer little flat-bottom boat is tied to the newel-post, and rocks still in the waves made by the packet.

"Wazer effery vare; ville eet tak ze house away?" ruefully and apprehensively.

The young man stares hard at Madame; never before, apparently, has he met the elderly *Parisienn*e; but he understands readily enough.

"Lord, no! you needn't be skeered. 'Tain't nuthin' to be skeered at. The river always comes over Clayville—ef it goes anywheres—and 'tain't never tuk no houses away yit!"

This colloquy takes place upon the stair; and we further explain that we wish to reach Mr. David Easten's. Our guide—so he informs us—is the porter of the village hotel; but will take us to Mr. Easten's in his boat, if we like.

We don't like in the least, but there seems no other way. We take our places in the boat; the man, by means of a long pole, pilots us safely through the doorway; our novel barque is on the highway, and we start.

Madame makes the best of things; she may possibly remember the trip is not of my planning. She calmly surveys the landscape; then says, with an air of deceitful admiration:

"Eet eez like Venice!"

Our gondolier stares harder than ever.

The houses on either side of the street have a forlorn, deserted look, owing to the fact that the inhabitants have either vacated them or retired to the second floors.

As we pass I muse upon the political economy which puts a town where it must go into the river once, sometimes twice, per annum. Another more careful and discriminating glance at the débris floating in adjacent back yards demonstrates the superior judgment of the city fathers, who builded better than I knew.

"Here we air!" cries the gondolier. And there, in the water, we very nearly are, indeed! The boat strikes dry land with a thump, which almost tumbles us overboard.

The munificent sum of a quarter is paid our gondolier, and we start up the steep path leading to the gate. Ascent of a steep hill convinces, as no argument can do, that one is no longer so young as one was. Madame, in her jaunty way, trips smiling on before; but I notice with grim satisfaction that she too is panting when we reach the gate.

Just inside is a dense thicket of yellow lilies, tall and rank. The great golden flowers and long ribbon-like leaves lie trodden across the path. Through the dank tangle of flowers and weeds we struggle, and almost stumble into the open doorway before we see it.

The house is an ambitious structure of wood, with many fantastic turrets and gable ends. It is over-run by honeysuckle and gay June roses. The air is heavy with their perfume. The hall is wide and long, with a door at each end. A Brussels carpet covers floor and stairs; bright Japanese panels hang on the wall. This much is seen at a glance, while vainly groping for a bell. Finding none, I knock. A swarm of children pour out of an adjoining room.

"Does Mr. David Easten live here?" I ask.

There is no answer from the children, who huddle up against the wall, like a covey of partridges, regarding us with shy curiosity. Then a voice says:

"What is the matter? what are you children doing out there?" And a beautiful young woman comes into the hall. She hesitates a moment upon seeing us, then comes forward—a gracious young queen. "Will you not come in?" she says.

I introduce myself and Madame. Her manner grows at once more cordial.

"I am most happy to see you," she says. "Father hasn't ceased talking of you since he learned where you were. He would have been bitterly disappointed if you had not come, and he would have gone to meet you this morning. He spoke of it, but we convinced him he was unreasonable; you could scarcely reach here before to-morrow"—leading the way into the sitting-room. Upon the threshold she pauses and says: "I believe I have forgotten to tell you my name; I am Marguerite Easten."

We cross the large, luxuriously furnished room and are introduced to her mother, a limp, prostrate figure, lying, book in hand, upon a satin couch.

And this is my Cousin David's wife! But when she speaks—that such voice and manner can belong to such a person is incredible. The composure, the graceful ease of une grande dame, the voice—it is impossible to describe it. It has the round, melodious sweetness of the harp, as Italians play it. Nothing spoken by such a voice can seem dull or common.

"And at last I have the happiness of seeing the cousin Ruth, of whose praises I have many a time been so fiercely jealous. And this is your friend?"—with a winning smile and extended hand to Madame.

"We have been expecting your visit with so much pleasure, all of us, but most especially my husband, who has been as impatient as a child for your coming ever since he learned where you were. He is down in town now—we had persuaded him you could not possibly reach here this morning—but will be in presently. Have seats."

Comfortable chairs are hospitably drawn forward, and a genial, grateful glow—which happier, more fortunate women can scarcely understand—comes about my desolate heart at this cordial welcome. There are Bohemians from choice and Bohemians from necessity—fate. I am of the latter, and have never been able to overcome longings for the domestic life, which can never be mine.

"Children," says Mrs. Easten's lovely voice, "come, speak to the ladies."

They skirmish a little among themselves in the corner and do not come. The mother doesn't notice. She talks to Madame. She has been abroad, the charming voice is saying, and has lived in Madame's beloved Paris.

Marguerite is my vis-à-vis. The girl is marvelously beautiful. A statuesque-white, sensuous beauty—pale, flaxen hair, without a tinge of gold; great velvety-black eyes, long-lashed and heavy-lidded; ivory-white face, utterly colorless, save the vivid red of the perfect lips. The slender hands folded upon her lap have none of the usual restlessness of youth—they are motionless. She has a drooping way with these heavy lids. Her eyes rest upon the motionless hands.

I make a little dry talk. I am by no means a talkative person, and not in the least interested in the swarm, for whom, in fact, I have conceived a strong aversion; but no other topic suggests itself to my limited imagination, and one must talk. So I inquire blandly:

"Are there no children between you and these little ones?"

"None living," Marguerite responds.

Succumbed early to the maternal régime, I think, eyeing the unkempt survivors. But one doesn't say such things, and I politely remark:

"There is considerable difference in age between you and—"

"Annette," supplies Marguerite.

Then we both glance at the children. It is quite impossible to identify Annette by a bird's-eye view of her back.

Through the doorway now comes a large, purple-faced man. He bows, looks at Madame, then longer at me, but there is no recognition in his eyes, and there can only be pain in mine as the fear seizes me that this is my cousin David. It is, indeed, he.

"My husband. Why! don't you know each other after all?" Mrs. Easten says. "It's your cousin Ruth!"

"Dear Ruth! dear Ruth!" He takes my hands in his, and his voice trembles. "How could it be possible for me to forget you—the only sister I ever knew? Of course I knew you. I was blinded coming so suddenly from the sunshine into the darkened room."

I control myself as well as I can, press my quivering lips together, steady my voice, and say:

"I knew you at once," which is true in the letter—not in the spirit.

He salutes Madame with old-time courtliness, then draw his chair beside mine. We of the civilized world can't shriek, and groan, and beat our breasts, and tear our hair out over disillusionment. Fancy the stout, middle-aged father of a family and a precise, gray-haired spinster making such clamor!

The conventional smile is the badge of civilization. I don mine as quickly as may be. Is the meeting as painful to Cousin David as to me? I never know. Shocked, dazed by the changes time has wrought—which I should have expected, but have not—I sit looking at him, wondering if he thinks me as greatly changed, and am not in the least reassured by his next words.

"What have you been doing all these years, Ruth? You are blooming—blooming as a rose. Look at me! I'm gray as a badger!"

Mrs. Easten listens to our talk with flattering attention; and presently, when there comes a pause in the conversation, she fills it with the smooth readiness which I so much admire—all the more for having rather a halting tongue of my own.

"Your visit, which would have been most welcome at any time, is singularly opportune, regarding it from our point of view—human nature is a very selfish thing, mes amis. And Marguerite is to be married Thursday; so we shall not only have your society after the marriage, to prevent our being lonely, but we shall have the benefit of your invaluable taste and advice before the grand event," with a sweet, musical laugh.

The remark includes Madame, who gives a twitter of delight. People like Madame and me are not used to have their taste and advice considered invaluable. At another time I would no doubt feel as flattered and charmed as Madame plainly does; but I am still stunned by the heart-sickening effort to identify the man beside me with the stripling of twenty years ago.

"Mademoiselle ees ferry young," is Madame's reply.

Cousin David has risen, and is leaving the room, but he stops at this, lays his hand upon Marguerite's head.

"True," he says; "Marguerite is young—not yet eighteen—but there are unusual circumstances in the case. This young woman," patting her head gently with his great hand, "has been engaged to Judge Granger since she wore long clothes—at least it would seem so—nobody remembers how it began or how it all came about."

While he speaks the girl's dark eyes meet his gravely, coolly. She does not smile or speak—there is not a trace of girlish shyness; not the faintest rose tint comes into the ivory white cheeks.

Madame and I unconsciously exchange glances, and are greatly abashed thereat.

Nothing more is said, and our bad manners escape observation. The swarm who have scampered out, come back in a noisy gallop to say dinner is ready.

We are quite an imposing procession as we go to the dining-room, the swarm bringing up the rear.

The room is large, and its appointments handsome, even elegant. In everything pertaining to this household there is evidence of profuse expenditure and unobjectionable taste, rendered futile by carelessness and neglect. On the table, splendid with silver, there is an abundant dinner, faultlessly prepared. Yet the cover of the grand silver coffee-urn is missing, and the smiling mistress of the house is but dimly visible through the mist.

The somewhat disorderly meal is over at last, and during the afternoon, when we repose in our airy, matting-covered chamber, with wreaths of climbing roses about the windows, filling the room with their spicy sweetness, Madame grows confidential and confides to me her amazement, that "Kan-tuc-i-ans" should eat bread hot enough to burn one's fingers.

"Is sont sal-aman-ders!" she says.

"Ruth," says Cousin David at tea, "how would Madame and yourself like to drive over to the mines tonight? Not to the mines, exactly, but to the miners' church. There is a revival going on over there, which makes the welkin ring; so I've been told. I have not attended. The drive will be pleasant, and you may be amused by the new types of humanity which you will see there. I fancy you have never seen people like them. What say you?"

"Pardonne! I ville not go; I ville stay wiz ze little ones," hastily from Madame.

She has not the remotest intention of expressing obstinacy or rudeness. Madame comes of a nation which calls its mother-in-law "beautiful mother," and is the politest of her polite nation. Madame's inflections are singularly unfortunate, that is all.

But it is not because of these inflections that I fix my eyes upon Madame's face, sternly, suspiciously, and see it grow red under its brownness.

Madame's nation is polite, but not Protestant; and her persistent avoidance of Protestant churches arouses suspicions of the Scarlet Woman's lurking influence. Madame and I have discussed this point fluently, not to say hotly; hence the flush upon Madame's quaint little countenance. I declare "I shall be delighted to go," with such aggressive firmness that Cousin David is puzzled.

Then I cast a glance "stern and high," upon poor little Madame, who meets it with an imploring, deprecating one; and of a sudden I realize what a narrow-minded, bigoted dragon I am.

"Wait for me at the door, cousin," Mrs. Easten says, as we leave the tea-table. "It's cooler at the front door. I will be out as soon as I can make preparations for the drive."

I find Marguerite sitting at the front door. She raises her beautiful eyes, with a faint smile, as I sit down upon the step above her, but does not speak.

How ineffably beautiful the girl is! And men say women never see a woman's beauty. We see it often; almost always, it must be admitted, with such sharp pangs of envy, such bitter jealousy and heart-burning as forbid a look of admiration. But, not see! We note, with discerning appraisement of its value, its power, each individual one of the silken lashes round beauty's eyes!

How beautiful Marguerite's lashes are—dark, long, and curling! The girl's dark eyes have gone across the Ohio—into "Egypt"—where the sun is just sinking out of sight, beyond the ghostly cottonwoods which line the Illinois shore. Gorgeous banners of orange and scarlet hang in the western sky, and the vivid hues, roseate and golden, fall upon the girl's face, fleckless, flawless in its young beauty—its ivory pallor, its scarlet lips, its glorious eyes, "lint-white locks," curling fluffily round this marvelous face, under the brim of a broad white hat; a white muslin gown, a lace fichu simply crossed; motionless, folded hands.

A rattle of wheels, and Cousin David's voice calls out from beyond the yellow lilies:

"All aboard for the mines!"

Mrs. Easten comes out at last, and by dint of much pushing, reaches a front seat in the open carriage. Cousin David sits beside her, and Marguerite and I occupy the back seat. We wave adieu to Madame and her youthful charges, and rattle away—literally rattle away. The wheels of this handsome carriage are like four huge castanets. Now, to the well-regulated Yankee mind rattling wheels are little short of a disgrace. But my companions do not refer to the trifling circumstance; and presently, when we go more slowly, the noise slackens.

It is a hot, still night, so still not a leaf rustles upon the trees along the wayside; a flutter and whisk from roosting birds now and then. There is no moon, but the stars shine glorious in the deep purple sky. The muffled, measured beat of the horses' feet in the deep dust is the only sound that breaks the stillness of the sweet summer night.

Cousin David draws up the team as we reach the top of a steep hill.

"There," he says, "is Curlew Chapel!"

The country meeting-house lies below us—a long, black shadow, sharply outlined against the star-lit sky. The windows glow with light.

"And there, just beyond—you can see the grave-stones gleaming—is Curlew burial-ground.

Then the strangest thing happens! Just as our eyes rest upon the burial-ground there arises upon the motionless air of the breathless summer night, a long, quivering, agonized shriek.

With fast-beating hearts we listen! And the unearthly wail scarcely dies away before there is another, and another! There are many voices now, and the very tree-tops seem stirred by the terrifying volume of sound. I am first to find voice, and gasp out:

"For Heaven's sake, what can it be!"

"I do not know," says Cousin David. "We will drive on and see."

We clatter down the hill and up to the church door. The horses are quickly made fast, and in a moment more we stand within the church. It is brilliantly lighted; doors and windows wide open; the air pulsating with groans and shrieks and cries—and not a human being in sight! The church is vacant!

Aghast we stand, staring blankly into each other's faces.

Mrs. Easten comes up the steps. She has been forgotten in our speedy descent from the carriage, and has only just now accomplished it.

"The sounds come from behind the church," she pants.

Round the church we go. I am not a courageous person. I am the last of the Indian file. Suddenly we find ourselves in the graveyard, and have discovered the source of the mysterious sounds—the source, not the cause.

A more weird, ghastly, uncanny scene than this, which meets our wondering gaze, cannot be conceived.

By the dim, uncertain light of the stars we behold a vast multitude of phantom-like forms—a leaping, struggling, shrieking mass of beings—whether ghost or human I cannot tell. A dark figure sitting upon a tombstone of the old-fashioned "box" kind seems human, since he holds a pipe in his mouth.

Sick and faint from the nervous shock, with trembling limbs, I can scarcely stand, and, perforce, because I can no longer do so, sink upon the gruesome resting-place, beside the dark figure, who is apparently merely a spectator. The composure of this silhouette partially reassures me; and, as my superstitious terrors pass away, anger rises.

"What are these people doing?" I ask my silent partner of the tombstone, with much asperity.

The long, dark form edges away as far as the length of the slab will allow.

"Gittin' 'ligion!" he tersely responds.

Oh, that's it, is it!" with great scorn. "And, pray, what are they getting it out here in the dark like bedlamites for?"

For some unknown reason, my undisguised disapproval is apparently agreeable to my taciturn companion. He grows more communicative.

"Well, yer see, 'bout time meetin' oughter bergun ter night, sum uv them mourners they cum out here ter ther buryin'-groun' fur secut pra'r. Well, they got so happy they got ter shoutin'. Sum more cum, en they got ter hollerin'; en they kep' a-cumin', en they kep' a-hollerin' 'til hit's jist like yer see."

The dark figure returns to silence and his pipe. Before me the strange tide ebbs and flows, surging swiftly from the church wall to the graveyard fence and back again, tumbling over graves and over each other.

As my nerves grow steadier, and my scattered wits return, the chaos begins to assume shape and meaning. One maneuver is repeated many times. Two shadows rush into each other's arms and cling together, swaying rhythmically from side to side to a sort of wild, shrieking chant, inexpressibly thrilling. Others come and cling to these two, and still others. The swaying and the chanting grow faster and faster, until they fall, a voiceless, gasping heap.

My partner of the tombstone and other spectators go forward and assist the fallen to rise. A tall female figure flits wildly about, but what she does I cannot determine by the starlight.

There is an unexpected movement toward the church, and we are borne along with the tide. Non-participants fill the doors, windows, line the walls, and stand upon benches. The mad crowd of devotees pour into the aisles, and are spurred to fresh endeavor.

The pulpit is piled high with hats and bonnets. There is no other use for it to-night; no service is attempted. On the pulpit-steps sits a grim-faced man, with a sleeping babe upon his lap, and bolt upright beside him sits Tasso, Cousin David's dog, with pricked ears, giving excited little yelps as the the din waxes harder.

A small man in the aisle close to the pulpit gradually works loose his arms, which are pinioned by the crush, and brings his hands together high above his head with a sounding concussion and the shrill cry, "Hoo-pee!"

Tasso bolts through the nearest window, and flees into outer darkness. Cousin David laughs loud and long.

"Tasso thought the little man was 'sic-in' him," he says.

I cannot join in the laugh. Grotesque, absurd as the scene is, the tensi in the drawn faces of these poor enthusiasts is too real and piteous.

The female figure which I had noticed in the graveyard whirls past, with streaming hair and uplifted arms. I have barely time to see she is young and well-favored, when she falls, almost at my feet.

A gaunt miner, with blackened face and lamp in his cap, leisurely descends from his perch in the window, stoops over the woman, and raises her head. Cousin David's kind heart prompts him to interfere, and he says:

"Take her out—she will be smothered in here."

"'Tain't no use. Soon ez she cums to, she'll be at it agin," is the miner's surly response; and, as he speaks, I recognize my partner of the tombstone. Finally, however, he does carry the woman out, assisted by Cousin David.

The spectacle has grown intolerable; I can bear it no longer. Surely, I think, Marguerite must also be eager to get away from it all. I lean forward and lay my hand upon her arm. She does not turn at my touch, and my gaze instinctively follows hers, which is fixed with a strange intentness upon a singular looking man across the aisle.

He stands on a bench near a lamp; the light falls full upon him, and I see him distinctly. A young man of medium height, remarkably slender, with peculiarly high, square shoulders. Long dark hair, curling a little at the ends, nearly touches these high shoulders. His features clear-cut, delicate and pale bronze. One hand rests in the breast of his closely buttoned coat. His eyes are lowered upon the frantic crowd, and something like a sneer hovers about his sensitive, beardless lips.

While my gaze rests upon his face his eyes are suddenly turned on me. In my already overstrained nervousness, I am so startled I tighten my grasp on Marguerite's arm, and almost cry out. The man's eyes are the largest, the most luminous I have ever seen, and look absolutely white! So light are they in color—so strange in this smooth, dark face.

"Who is it, Marguerite?"—the words break unconsciously from my lips. "Who is that young man across the aisle?"

She does not turn or reply, only shivers, this hot June night.

Just then Cousin David beckons us from the door. Slowly, and with difficulty, we make our way out and start homeward. We are rather a silent party. There is a faint breeze now, and flying clouds obscure the stars in the purple sky.

At a bend in the road a horseman passes us. Horse and rider flit by, like spectres in the black shade of the trees; but, swiftly as they go, I catch a glimpse of a peculiar, high-shouldered form, and my smouldering curiosity breaks out:

"Who is that man?"

No one replies. Mrs. Easten is asleep, I conclude, from the dangerous manner in which she wobbles over the wheels.

Marguerite is silent.

Her father turns his head toward her, and with some surprise repeats the question. Then she answers: "Millard Reeve."

Next morning we are down stairs before the household is awake. We wander through the large old-fashioned garden. The morning is close and warm, and the odor of the flowers is almost overpowering—not alone the spicy, aromatic sweetness of the myriad June roses and penetrating, far-reaching perfume of the honeysuckle, but the rich, heavy fragrance of a long row of stately lilies. In the years that follow, whenever this time comes back to me, I smell those lilies again.

I have never seen so many together. There is a long row almost across the lower side of the garden, close against the hedge which surrounds it.

Through the close greenness of the hedge can be seen the yellow water of the river creeping hourly higher.

Sweet-voiced and smiling, Mrs. Easten comes to give us a gay good morning, and lead the way to breakfast.

I proffer my assistance toward preparation for the wedding, and am eagerly seconded by Madame: "Is there nothing we can do? Is the trousseau quite complete?"

"I don't know—I think so. A woman down in town—the dressmaker—went to Cairo for my things. Mother hadn't time to go. I suppose they are done."

This is said with languid indifference, while Marguerite still gazes listlessly through the honeysuckle.

Of course I ask what the wedding dress is to be.

"A white brocade. Mother chose that from the samples sent us, because it reminded her of a gown in a great picture she had seen abroad."

I glance sharply at the girl's pale face, but she is quite earnest; and I begin to think this wondrously beautiful creature rather a dull person—with small sense of humor, certainly.

The rest of the morning is passed in our own cool, rose-scented chamber; and in the afternoon Cousin David drives his wife, Madame and me into town. Our route is circuitous, and we are able in this way to avoid the deepest water; yet the wheels dip and lurch alarmingly at times.

Cousin David draws up the horses, that we may view at our leisure what to us is a novel scene. A cross street just in front is much lower than that upon which the carriage stands, and the water much deeper. It is covered with craft of various and novel kinds. Among the latter is what Cousin David informs us is called a "gunnel"—a long flat log, propelled by a pole. Here and there is a skiff; one comes suddenly round a corner; is rowed up to the steps of a building near, and a tall man springs from the boat to the steps.

"Hello, Granger!" Cousin David calls; "back a little sooner than you expected!"

We are presented to the bridegroom elect, who stands bowing, hat in hand, upon the steps.

How red his hair looks, with the June sunshine upon it! And a long red beard! Why shouldn't he have red hair and a long red beard? Why, indeed! Yet here am I distinctly conscious of—disapproval.

"Yes," he is saying in the dry, carefully-modulated voice of the middle-aged lawyer, "by leaving Vance judge pro tem. I was enabled to get away a few hours earlier. I will be up to-night."

He passes into his office as the horses are turned. As they turn, and the wheels go into deeper water, I glance apprehensively in that direction, and become aware that "Faust" is passing. He stands on a gunnel; he is regarding us closely, and when my eyes meet his, his hand goes up at once to his hat.

"How d'ye?" is cousin David's careless greeting to Millard Reeve, the schoolmaster.

Then we drive far into the country, and it is night-fall when we return. Marguerite stands, white-robed, among the yellow lilies in the dusk.

Do my eyes deceive me? or do I see a peculiar, high-shouldered figure vanishing among the swiftly falling shades of night? When we are in the brilliantly lighted supper room this chimera fades. I give myself an arousing shake. Am I bewitched, that I see this man everywhere?

After a little, Judge Granger comes; sits, with crossed knees and folded arms, squarely in his chair, talking sensibly of matter-of-fact things. All the family are in the room except Marguerite. "She will be down stairs presently," her mother has said. But an hour goes by and she does not come. No one seems to think her absence strange. I am strangely nervous and restless; I catch myself straining my ears for sounds from Marguerite's room overhead. But all is still. Crops versus high water, politics and the docket, fall like a foreign language upon my listening ear; then I slip unobserved from my seat near the door and go to the front steps.

It is quite dark now. Gusts of hot air, damp from the river, lift the hair from my heated face. Storm-clouds, inky black, are piling up mountain high in Egypt. Distant floating lights are on the river, whose awful roar is so distinctly heard in the silence of night.

A flutter of white garments at the gate; a form glides by me into the house, wraith-like, noiseless. With a start I push the hair from my forehead, rub my eyes and gaze down the hall after the retreating form. It is Marguerite! Then a sudden terror falls upon me—horror of some intangible, terrible thing.

Pooh! it's nervousness, the electricity. "Will it rain to-night?" I ask of Cousin David, as the others come out, leaving the affianced alone. He looks at the sky in grave scrutiny.

"I fear so," he says. "The farmers have given up the crops, and a heavy rain now would endanger their homes. There has been already a clean sweep of the fences and corn-pens in the river bottoms."

Ascending the stair I involuntarily glance through the open door of the sitting-room. Judge Granger leans forward, talking in a low tone to Marguerite, whose face I cannot see.
